On the contrary, A gloss on the words, Faith without works is dead (James 2. 20) adds, "by which it lives once more."² Therefore faith which was lifeless and without form hitherto, becomes formed and living.

I answer that, There have been various opinions on this question. For some have said³ that formed and formless faith are distinct habits, but that when formed faith comes, formless faith is done away, and that, in like manner, when a man sins mortally after having formed faith, a new habit of formless faith is infused into him by God. But it seems unfitting that grace should deprive man of a gift of God by coming to him, and that a gift of God should be infused into man on account of a mortal sin.

Consequently others have said⁴ that formed and formless faith are indeed distinct habits, but that, all the same, when formed faith comes the habit of formless faith is not taken away, and that it remains together with the habit of formed faith in the same object. Yet again it seems unreasonable that the habit of formless faith should remain inactive in a person having formed faith.

We must therefore hold differently that formed and formless faith are one and the same habit. The reason is that a habit is differentiated by that which directly pertains to that habit. Now since faith is a perfection of the intellect, that pertains directly to faith which pertains to the intellect. Again, what pertains to the will does not pertain directly to faith, so as to be able to differentiate the habit of faith. But the distinction of formed from formless faith is in respect of something pertaining to the will, that is, charity, and not in respect of something pertaining to the intellect. Therefore formed and formless faith are not distinct habits.

Reply Obj. 1. The saying of the Apostle refers to those imperfect things from which imperfection is inseparable, for then, when the perfect comes the imperfect must be done away. Thus with the advent of clear vision, faith is done away, because its very notion is of the things that appear not. When, however, imperfection is not inseparable from the imperfect thing, the same identical thing which was imperfect becomes perfect. Thus childhood is not of the very notion of man, and consequently the same identical subject who was a child, becomes a man. Now formlessness is not of the very notion of faith, but is accidental to it, as stated above. Therefore unformed faith itself becomes formed.

Reply Obj. 2. That which makes an animal live is inseparable from an animal, because it is its essential form, namely the soul. Consequently a dead thing cannot become a living thing, and a living and a dead thing differ specifically. On the other hand, that which gives faith its form, or makes it live, is not of the essence of faith. Hence there is no comparison.

Reply Obj. 3. Grace causes faith not only when faith begins anew to be in a man, but also as long as faith lasts. For it has been said above (Part I, Q. CIV, A. 1; Part I-II, Q. CIX, A. 9), that God is always working man's justification, even as the sun is always lighting up the air. Hence grace is not less effective when it comes to a believer than when it comes to an unbeliever, since it causes faith in both, in the former by confirming and perfecting it, in the latter by creating it anew.

We might also reply that it is accidental, namely, on account of the disposition of the subject, that grace does not cause faith in one who has it already; just as, on the other hand, a second mortal sin does not take away grace from one who has already lost it through a previous mortal sin.

Reply Obj. 4. When formed faith becomes unformed, faith is not changed, but rather its subject, the soul, which at one time has faith without charity, and at another time, with charity.

ARTICLE 5. Whether Faith Is a Virtue?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It seems that faith is not a virtue.

Objection 1. For virtue is ordered to the good, since "it is virtue that makes its subject good," as the Philosopher states.¹ But faith is ordered to the true. Therefore faith is not a virtue.

Obj. 2. Further, Infused virtue is more perfect than acquired virtue. Now faith, on account of its imperfection, is not placed among the acquired intellectual virtues, as the Philosopher states.² Much less, therefore, can it be considered an infused virtue.

Obj. 3. Further, formed and formless faith are of the same species, as stated above (A. 4). Now formless faith is not a virtue, since it is not connected with the other virtues. Therefore neither is formed faith a virtue.

Obj. 4. Further, The gratuitous graces and the fruits are distinct from the virtues. But faith is numbered among the gratuitous graces (I Cor. 12. 9) and likewise among the fruits (Gal. 5. 23). Therefore faith is not a virtue.

On the contrary, Man is justified by the virtues, since "justice is all virtue" as the Philosopher states.³ Now man is justified by faith according to Rom. 5. 1: Being justified therefore by faith let us have peace, etc. Therefore faith is a virtue.

I answer that, As shown above (Part I-II, Q. LVI, A. 3), it is by human virtue that human acts are rendered good. Hence, any habit that is always the principle of a good act, may be called a human virtue. Such a habit is formed faith. For since to believe is an act of the intellect assenting to the truth at the command of the will, two things are required that this act may be perfect, one of which is that the intellect should infallibly tend to its object, which is the true, while the other is that the will should be infallibly directed to the last end, on account of which it assents to the true. And both of these are to be found in the act of formed faith. For it is of the very notion of faith that the intellect should always tend to the true, since nothing false can be the object of faith, as proved above (Q. I, A. 3); while the effect of charity, which is the form of faith, is that the soul has its will always directed to a good end. Therefore formed faith is a virtue.

On the other hand, unformed faith is not a virtue, because, though the act of unformed faith has its due perfection on the part of the intellect, it has not its due perfection as regards the will; just as, if temperance is in the concupiscible part, without prudence being in the rational part, temperance is not a virtue, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXV, A. 1), because the act of temperance requires both an act of reason, and an act of the concupiscible part, even as the act of faith requires an act of the will, and an act of the intellect.

Reply Obj. 1. The truth is itself the good of the intellect, since it is its perfection, and consequently faith has a relation to some good in so far as it determines the intellect to the true. Furthermore, it has a relation to the good considered as the object of the will, in so far as it is formed by charity.

Reply Obj. 2. The faith of which the Philosopher speaks is based on human reasoning in a conclusion which does not follow of necessity from its premisses; and which can be false. Hence faith of this kind is not a virtue. On the other hand, the faith of which we are speaking is based on the Divine Truth, which is infallible, and consequently its object cannot be anything false. And therefore faith of this kind can be a virtue.

Reply Obj. 3. Formed and formless faith do not differ specifically, as though they belonged to different species. But they differ as perfect and imperfect within the same species. Hence

formless faith, being imperfect, does not satisfy the conditions of a perfect virtue, for "virtue is a kind of perfection."¹

Reply Obj. 4. Some say that faith which is numbered among the gratuitous graces is unformed faith.² But this is said without reason, since the gratuitous graces, which are mentioned in that passage, are not common to all the members of the Church. Hence the Apostle says: There are diversities of graces, and again: To one is given this grace and to another that (I Cor. 12. 4). Now formless faith is common to all the members of the Church, because formlessness is not part of its substance, if we consider it as a gratuitous gift. We must, therefore, say that in that passage, faith denotes a certain excellence of faith for instance, "constancy in faith," according to a gloss,³ or the word of faith.

Faith is numbered among the fruits, in so far as it gives a certain pleasure in its act by reason of its certainty, and so the gloss on the fifth chapter to the Galatians, where the fruits are enumerated, explains faith as being "certainty about the unseen"⁴

ARTICLE 6. Whether Faith Is One Virtue?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that faith is not one.

Objection 1. For just as faith is a gift of God according to Eph. 2. 8, so also wisdom and knowledge are numbered among God's gifts according to Isa. 11. 2. Now wisdom and knowledge differ in this, that wisdom is about eternal things, and knowledge about temporal things, as Augustine states (De Trin. xii, 14, 15).⁵ Since then, faith is about eternal things, and also about some temporal things, it seems that faith is not one virtue but divided into several parts.

Obj. 2. Further, Confession is an act of faith, as stated above (Q. III, A. 1). Now confession of faith is not one and the same for all, since what we confess as past, the fathers of old confessed as yet to come, as appears from Isa. 7. 14: Behold a virgin shall conceive. Therefore faith is not one.

Obj. 3. Further, Faith is common to all believers in Christ. But one accident cannot be in many subjects. Therefore all cannot have one faith.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (Eph. 4. 5): One Lord, one faith.

I answer that, If we take faith as a habit, we can consider it in two ways. First on the part of the object, and thus there is one faith. Because the formal object of faith is the First Truth, by adhering to which we believe whatever is contained in the faith. Secondly, on the part of the subject, and thus faith is differentiated according as it is in various subjects. Now it is evident that faith, just as any other habit, takes its species from the formal aspect of its object, but is individualized by its subject. Hence if we take faith for the habit by which we believe, it is one specifically, but differs numerically according to its various subjects. If, on the other hand, we take faith for that which is believed, then, again, there is one faith, since what is believed by all is one thing, for though the things believed, which all agree in believing, may be different from one another, yet they are all reduced to one.

Reply Obj. 1. Temporal matters which are proposed to be believed do not pertain to the object of faith, except in relation to something eternal, namely the First Truth, as stated above (Q. I, A. 1). Hence there is one faith of things both temporal and eternal. It is different with wisdom and knowledge, which consider temporal and eternal matters under the proper aspects of each.

Reply Obj. 2 This difference of past and future arises, not from any difference in the thing believed, but from the different relationships of believers to the one thing believed, as also we have mentioned above (Part I-II, Q. CIII, A. 4).

Reply Obj. 3. This objection considers numerical diversity of faith.

ARTICLE 7. Whether Faith Is the First of the Virtues?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It would seem that faith is not the first of the virtues.

Objection 1. For a gloss on Luke 12. 4, I say to you My friends, says that "fortitude is the foundation of faith."⁶ Now the foundation precedes that which is founded on it. Therefore faith is not the first of the virtues.

Obj. 2. Further, A gloss on Psalm 36., Be not emulous, says that "hope leads on to faith."¹ Now hope is a virtue, as we shall state further on (Q. XVII, A. 1). Therefore faith is not the first of the virtues.

Obj. 3. Further, It was stated above (A. 2) that the intellect of the believer is moved, out of obedience to God, to assent to matters of faith. Now obedience also is a virtue. Therefore faith is not the first virtue.

Obj. 4. Further, Not formless but formed faith is the foundation, as a gloss remarks on I Cor. 3. 11.² Now faith is formed by charity, as stated above (A. 3). Therefore it is owing to charity that faith is the foundation. And so charity is the foundation even more than faith is (for the foundation is the first part of a building) and consequently it seems to precede faith.

Obj. 5. Further, The order of habits is taken from the order of acts. Now, in the act of faith, the act of the will which is perfected by charity, precedes the act of the intellect, which is perfected by faith, as the cause which precedes its effect. Therefore charity precedes faith. Therefore faith is not the first of the virtues.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (Heb. 11. 1) that faith is the substance of things to be hoped for. Now the substance of a thing is that which comes first. Therefore faith is first among the virtues.

I answer that, One thing can precede another in two ways: first, by its very nature; secondly, by accident. Faith, by its very nature, precedes all other virtues. For since the end is the principle in matters of action, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XIII, A. 3; Q. XXXIV, A. 4, reply 1), the theological virtues, the object of which is the last end, must precede all the others. Again, the last end must of necessity be present to the intellect before it is present to the will, since the will has no inclination for anything except in so far as it is apprehended by the intellect. Hence, as the last end is present in the will by hope and charity, and in the intellect, by faith, the first of all the virtues must, of necessity, be faith, because natural knowledge cannot reach God as the object of heavenly bliss, which is the aspect under which hope and charity tend towards Him.

On the other hand, some virtues can precede faith accidentally. For an accidental cause precedes its effect accidentally. Now that which removes an obstacle is a kind of accidental cause, according to the Philosopher,³ and in this sense certain virtues may be said to precede faith accidentally, in so far as they remove obstacles to belief. Thus fortitude removes the inordinate fear that hinders faith; humility removes pride, by which a man refuses to submit himself to the truth of faith. The same may be said of some other virtues, although there are no real virtues, unless faith be presupposed, as Augustine states (Contra Julian. iv).⁴

This suffices for the Reply to the First Objection.

Reply Obj. 2. Hope cannot lead to faith absolutely. For one cannot hope to obtain eternal happiness, unless one believes this possible, since hope does not tend to the impossible, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XL, A. 1). It is, however, possible for one to be led by hope to persevere in faith, or to hold firmly to faith; and it is in this sense that hope is said to lead to faith.

Reply Obj. 3. Obedience is twofold. Sometimes it denotes the inclination of the will to fulfil God's commandments. In this way it is not a special virtue, but is a general condition of every virtue, since all acts of virtue come under the precepts of the Divine law, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. C, A. 2); and thus it is requisite for faith. In another way, obedience denotes an inclination to fulfil the commandments considered as a duty. In this way it is a special virtue, and a part of justice, for a man does his duty towards his superior when he obeys him; and thus obedience follows faith, by which man knows that God is his superior, Whom he ought to obey.

Reply Obj. 4. To be a foundation a thing requires not only to come first, but also to be joined to the other parts of the building, since the building would not be founded on it unless the other parts were connected to it. Now the connecting bond of the spiritual edifice is charity, according to Coloss. 3. 14: Above all . . . things have charity which is the bond of perfection. Consequently faith without charity cannot be the foundation. And yet it does not follow that charity precedes faith.

Reply Obj. 5. Some act of the will is required before faith, but not an act of the will moulded by charity. This latter act presupposes faith, because the will cannot tend to God with perfect love, unless the intellect possesses right faith about Him.

ARTICLE 8. Whether Faith Is More Certain Than Science and the Other Intellectual Virtues?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It would seem that faith is not more certain than science and the other intellectual virtues.

Objection 1. For doubt is opposed to certitude, and so a thing would seem to be the more certain through being less doubtful, just as a thing is the whiter, the less it has of an admixture of black. Now understanding, science and also wisdom are free of any doubt about their objects; but the believer may sometimes suffer a movement of doubt, and doubt about matters of faith. Therefore faith is no more certain than the intellectual virtues.

Obj. 2. Further, Sight is more certain than hearing. But faith is through hearing according to Rom. 10. 17; but understanding, science, and wisdom imply some kind of intellectual sight. Therefore science and understanding are more certain than faith.

Obj. 3. Further, In matters concerning the intellect, the more perfect is the more certain. Now understanding is more perfect than faith, since faith is the way to understanding, according to another version of Isa. 7. 9:¹ If you will not believe, you shall not understand (Vulg.,—continue): and Augustine says (De Trin. xiv)² that faith is strengthened by science. Therefore it seems that science or understanding is more certain than faith.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (1 Thess. 2. 15): When you had received of us the word of the hearing, that is, by faith . . . you received it not as the word of men, but, as it is indeed, the word of God. Now nothing is more certain than the word of God. Therefore science is not more certain than faith; nor is anything else.

I answer that, As stated above (Part I-II, Q. LVII, A. 4, Reply 2; A. 5, Reply 3), two of the intellectual virtues are about contingent matter, namely prudence and art. Faith comes before these in point of certitude, by reason of its matter, since it is about eternal things, which never change. But the other three intellectual virtues, namely wisdom, science and understanding, are about necessary things, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LVII, A. 5, Reply 3) But it must be observed that wisdom, science and understanding may be taken in two ways; first, as intellectual virtues, according to the Philosopher;³ secondly, as gifts of the Holy Ghost. If we consider them in the first way, we must note that certitude can be looked at in two ways. First, on the part of its cause, and thus a thing which has a more certain cause, is itself more certain. In this way faith is more certain than those three virtues, because it is founded on the Divine truth, while the above three virtues are based on human reason. Secondly, certitude may be considered on the part of the subject, and thus the more a man's intellect lays hold of a thing, the more certain it is. In this way, faith is less certain, because matters of faith are above the human intellect, while the objects of the above three virtues are not. Since, however, a thing is judged absolutely with regard to its cause, but relatively, with respect to a disposition on the part of the subject, it follows that faith is more certain absolutely, while the others are more certain relatively, that is, for us. Likewise if these three be taken as gifts received in this present life, they are related to faith as to their principle which they presuppose, so that again, in this way, faith is more certain.

Reply Obj. 1. This doubt is not on the part of the cause of faith, but on our part, in so far as we do not fully grasp matters of faith with our intellect.

Reply Obj. 2. Other things being equal sight is more certain than hearing. But if (the authority of) the person from whom we hear greatly surpasses that of the seer's sight, hearing is more certain than sight. Thus a man of little science is more certain about what he hears on the authority of an expert in science, than about what is apparent to him according to his own reason. And much more is a man certain about what he hears from God, Who cannot be deceived, than about what he sees with his own reason, which can be mistaken.

Reply Obj. 3. The gifts of understanding and knowledge are more perfect than the knowledge of faith in the point of their greater clearness, but not in regard to more certain adhering, because the whole certitude of the gifts of understanding and knowledge, arises from the certitude of faith, even as the certitude of the knowledge of conclusions arises from the certitude of the principles. But in so far as science, wisdom and understanding are intellectual virtues, they are based upon the natural light of reason, which falls short of the certitude of God's word, on which faith is founded.

QUESTION V

OF THOSE WHO HAVE FAITH

(In Four Articles)

WE must now consider those who have faith, under which head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether there was faith in the angels, or in man, in their original state? (2) Whether the demons have faith? (3) Whether those heretics who err in one article, have faith in the others? (4) Whether among those who have faith, one has it more than another?

ARTICLE 1. Whether There was Faith in the Angels, or in Man, in Their Original State?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that there was no faith, either in the angels, or in man, in their original state.

Objection 1. For Hugh of S. Victor says in his Sentences (De Sacram. i)¹ that "man cannot see God or things that are in God, because he closes his eyes to contemplation." Now the angels, in their original state, before they were either confirmed in grace, or had fallen from it, had their eyes opened to contemplation, since they saw things in the Word, according to Augustine (Gen. ad lit. ii, 8).² Likewise the first man, while in the state of innocence, seemingly had his eyes open to contemplation; for Hugh of S. Victor says³ that in his original state "man knew his Creator, not by the mere outward perception of hearing, but by inward inspiration, not as now believers seek an absent God by faith, but by seeing Him clearly present to his contemplation." Therefore there was no faith in the angels and man in their original state.

Obj. 2. Further, The knowledge of faith is dark and obscure, according to I Cor. 13. 12: We see now through a glass in a dark manner. Now in their original state there was no obscurity either in the angels or in man, because darkness is a punishment of sin. Therefore there could be no faith in the angels or in man, in their original state.

Obj. 3. Further, The Apostle says (Rom. 10. 17) that faith . . . cometh by hearing. Now this could not apply to angels and man in their original state, for then they could not hear anything from another. Therefore, in that state, there was no faith either in man or in the angels.

On the contrary, It is written (Heb. 11. 6): He that cometh to God, must believe. Now the original state of angels and man was one of approach to God. Therefore they had need of faith.

I answer that, Some say that there was no faith in the angels before they were confirmed in grace or fell from it, and in man before he sinned, by reason of the manifest contemplation that they had of Divine things.⁴ Since, however, faith is the evidence of things that appear not, according to the Apostle (Heb. 11. 1), and since "by faith we believe what we see not," according to Augustine (Tract. xli in Joann.; QQ. Evang. ii, qu. 39),⁵ that manifestation alone excludes faith, which renders apparent or seen the principal object of faith. Now the principal object of faith is the First Truth, the sight of which gives the happiness of heaven and takes the place of faith. Consequently, as the angels before their confirmation in grace, and man before sin, did not possess the happiness by which God is seen in His Essence, it is evident that the knowledge they possessed was not such as to exclude faith.

It follows, then, that the absence of faith in them could only be explained by their being altogether ignorant of the object of faith. And if man and the angels were created in a purely natural state, as some hold,⁶ perhaps one might hold that there was no faith in the angels before their confirmation in grace, or in man before sin, because the knowledge of faith surpasses not only a man's but even an angel's natural knowledge about God.

Since, however, we stated in the First Part (Q. LXII, A. 3; Q. XCV, A. 1) that man and the angels were created with the gift of grace, we must say that there was in them a certain beginning of hoped-for happiness, by reason of grace received but not yet consummated, which happiness was begun in their will by hope and charity, and in the intellect by faith, as stated above (Q. IV, A. 7). Consequently we must hold that the angels had faith before they were confirmed, and man, before he sinned.

Nevertheless we must observe that in the object of faith, there is something formal, as it were, namely the First Truth surpassing all the natural knowledge of a creature, and something material, namely, the thing to which we assent while adhering to the First Truth. With regard to the former, before obtaining the happiness to come, faith is common to all who have knowledge of God, by adhering to the First Truth.

But with regard to the things which are proposed as the material object of faith, some are believed by one, and known plainly by another, even in the present state, as we have shown above (Q. 1, A. 5). In this respect, too, it may be said that the angels before being confirmed, and man, before sin, possessed clear knowledge about certain points in the Divine mysteries, which now we cannot know except by believing them.

Reply Obj. 1. Although the words of Hugh of S. Victor are those of a master, and have the force of an authority, yet it may be said that the contemplation which removes the need of faith, is heavenly contemplation, by which the supernatural truth is seen in its essence. Now the angels did not possess this contemplation before they were confirmed, nor did man before he sinned. Yet their contemplation was of a higher order than ours, for by its means they approached nearer to God, and had manifest knowledge of more of the Divine effects and mysteries than we can have knowledge of. Hence faith was not in them so that they sought an absent God as we seek Him, since by the light of wisdom He was more present to them than He is to us, although He was not so present to them as He is to the Blessed by the light of glory.

Reply Obj. 2. There was no darkness of sin or punishment in the original state of man and the angels, but there was a certain natural obscurity in the human and angelic intellect, in so far as every creature is darkness in comparison with the immensity of the Divine light. And this obscurity suffices for the notion of faith.

Reply Obj. 3. In the original state there was no hearing anything from man speaking outwardly, but there was from God inspiring inwardly; thus the prophets heard, as expressed by the Psalm (84. 9): I will hear what the Lord God will speak in me.

ARTICLE 2. Whether in the Demons There Is Faith?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that the demons have no faith.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (De Prædest. Sanct. v)¹ that "faith depends on the believer's will." But this is a good will, since by it man wishes to believe in God. Since then no deliberate will of the demons is good, as stated above (Part I, Q. LXIV, A. 2, reply 5), it seems that in the demons there is no faith.

Obj. 2. Further, Faith is a gift of Divine grace, according to Eph. 2. 8: By grace you are saved through faith, . . . for it is the gift of God. Now, according to a gloss on Osee 3. 1, They look to strange gods, and love the husks of the grapes, the demons lost their gifts of grace by sinning.² Therefore faith did not remain in the demons after they sinned.

Obj. 3. Further, Unbelief would seem to be graver than other sins, as Augustine observes (Tract. lxxxix in Joann.)³ on John 15. 22, If I had not come and spoken to them, they would not have sin: but now they have no excuse for their sin. Now the sin of unbelief is in some men. Consequently, if the demons have faith, some men would be guilty of a sin graver than that of the demons, which seems unreasonable. Therefore in the demons there is no faith.

I answer that, As stated above (Q. 1, A. 4; Q. 11, A. 1), the believer's intellect assents to that which he believes, not because he sees it either in itself, or by resolving it to first self-evident principles, but because his will commands his intellect to assent. Now, that the will moves the intellect to assent, may be due to two causes. First, through the will being directed to the good, and in this way, to believe is a praiseworthy action. Secondly, because the intellect is convinced that it ought to believe what is said, though that conviction is not based on the evidence of the thing. Thus if a prophet, while preaching the word of God, were to foretell something and were to give a sign, by raising a dead person to life, the intellect of a witness would be convinced so as to recognize clearly that God, Who does not lie, was speaking, although the thing itself foretold would not be evident in itself, and consequently the character of faith would not be removed.

Accordingly we must say that faith is commended in the first sense in the faithful of Christ. And in this way faith is not in the demons, but only in the second way, for they see many evident signs, by which they recognize that the teaching of the Church is from God, although they do not see the things themselves that the Church teaches, for instance that there are three Persons in God, and so forth.

Reply Obj. 1. The demons are, in a way, compelled to believe, by the evidence of signs, and so their will deserves no praise for their belief.

Reply Obj. 2. Faith, which is a gift of grace, inclines man to believe by giving him a certain affection for the good, even when that faith is formless. Consequently the faith which the demons have, is not a gift of grace. Rather are they compelled to believe through their natural intellectual acumen.

Reply Obj. 3. The very fact that the signs of faith are so evident, that the demons are compelled to believe, is displeasing to them, so that their malice is by no means diminished by their belief.

ARTICLE 3. Whether a Man Who Disbelieves One Article of Faith, Can Have Formless Faith in the Other Articles?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that a heretic who disbelieves one article of faith, can have formless faith in the other articles.

Objection 1. For the natural intellect of a heretic is not more able than that of a catholic. Now a catholic's intellect needs the aid of the gift of faith in order to believe any article whatever of faith. Therefore it seems that heretics cannot believe any articles of faith without the gift of formless faith.

Obj. 2. Further, Just as faith contains many articles, so does one science, namely geometry, contain many conclusions. Now a man may possess the science of geometry as to some geometrical conclusions, and yet be ignorant of other conclusions. Therefore a man can believe some articles of faith without believing the others.

Obj. 3. Further, Just as man obeys God in believing the articles of faith, so does he also in keeping the commandments of the Law. Now a man can obey some commandments, and disobey others. Therefore he can believe some articles, and disbelieve others.

On the contrary, Just as mortal sin is contrary to charity, so is disbelief in one article of faith contrary to faith. Now charity does not remain in a man after one mortal sin. Therefore neither does faith, after a man disbelieves one article.

I answer that, Neither formed nor formless faith remains in a heretic who disbelieves one article of faith. The reason of this is that the species of every habit depends on the formal character of the object, without which the species of the habit cannot remain. Now the formal object of faith is the First Truth, as manifested in Holy Writ and the teaching of the Church, which proceeds from the First Truth. Consequently whoever does not adhere, as to an infallible and Divine rule, to the teaching of the Church, which proceeds from the First Truth manifested in Holy Writ, has not the habit of faith but holds that which is of faith otherwise than by faith. In the same way, for example, it is evident that a man whose mind holds a conclusion without knowing how it is proved, has not scientific knowledge, but merely an opinion about it. Now it is manifest that he who adheres to the teaching of the Church, as to an infallible rule, assents to whatever the Church teaches. Otherwise, if of the things taught by the Church, he holds what he chooses to hold, and rejects what he chooses to reject, he no longer adheres to the teaching of the Church as to an infallible rule, but to his own will. Hence it is evident that a heretic who obstinately disbelieves one article of faith is not prepared to follow the teaching of the Church in all things. But if he is not obstinate, he is no longer in heresy but only in error. Therefore it is clear that such a heretic with regard to one article has no faith in the other articles, but only a kind of opinion in accordance with his own will.

Reply Obj. 1 A heretic does not hold the other articles of faith, about which he does not err, in the same way as one of the faithful does, namely by adhering simply to the Divine Truth, because in order to do so, a man needs the help of the habit of faith. But he holds the things that are of faith, by his own will and judgment.

Reply Obj. 2. The various conclusions of a science have their respective means of demonstration, one of which may be known without another, so that we may know some conclusions of a science without knowing the others. On the other hand faith adheres to all the articles of faith by reason of one means, namely, on account of the First Truth proposed to us in the Scriptures, according to the teaching of the Church who has the right understanding of them. Hence whoever abandons this means is altogether lacking in faith.

Reply Obj. 3 The various precepts of the Law may be referred either to their respective proximate motives, and thus one can be kept without another or to one primary motive, which is perfect obedience to God, in which a man fails whenever he breaks one commandment, according to James 2. 10: Whosoever shall . . . offend in one point is become guilty of all.

ARTICLE 4. Whether Faith Can Be Greater in One Man Than in Another?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that faith cannot be greater in one man than in another.

Objection 1. For the quantity of a habit is taken from its object. Now whoever has faith believes everything that is of faith, since by failing in one point, a man loses his faith altogether, as stated above (A. 3). Therefore it seems that faith cannot be greater in one than in another.

Obj. 2. Further, Those things which consist in something supreme cannot be more or less. Now faith consists in something supreme, because it requires that man should adhere to the First Truth above all things. Therefore faith cannot be more or less.

Obj. 3. Further, Faith is to knowledge by grace as the understanding of principles is to natural knowledge, since the articles of faith are the first principles of knowledge by grace, as was shown above (Q. 1, A. 7). Now the understanding of principles is possessed in equal degree by all men. Therefore faith is possessed in equal degree by all the faithful.

On the contrary, Wherever we find great and little, there we find more and less. Now in the matter of faith we find great and little, for Our Lord said to Peter (Matt. 14. 31): O thou of little faith, why didst thou doubt? And to the woman he said (Matt. 15. 28): O woman, great is thy faith! Therefore faith can be greater in one than in another.

I answer that, As stated above (Part I-II, Q. LII, AA. 1, 2; Q. CXII, A. 4), the quantity of a habit may be considered from two points of view: first, on the part of the object; secondly, on the part of its participation by the subject. Now the object of faith may be considered in two ways: first, in respect of its formal aspect, secondly, in respect of the material object which is proposed to be believed. Now the formal object of faith is one and simple, namely the First Truth, as stated above (Q. 1, A. 1). Hence in this respect there is no diversity of faith among believers, but it is specifically one in all, as stated above (Q. IV, A. 6). But the things which are proposed as the matter of our belief are many and can be received more or less explicitly. And in this respect one man can believe explicitly more things than another, so that faith can be greater in one man on account of its being more explicit.

If, on the other hand, we consider faith from the point of view of its participation by the subject, this happens in two ways, since the act of faith proceeds both from the intellect and from the will, as stated above (A. 2; Q. 1, A. 4; Q. IV, AA. 1, 2). Consequently a man's faith may be described as being greater, in one way, on the part of his intellect, on account of its greater certitude and firmness, and, in another way, on the part of his will, on account of his greater promptitude, devotion, or confidence.

Reply Obj. 1. A man who obstinately disbelieves a thing that is of faith, has not the habit of faith, and yet he who does not explicitly believe all, while he is prepared to believe all, has that habit. In this respect, one man has greater faith than another, on the part of the object, in so far as he believes more things, as stated above.

Reply Obj. 2. It is of the notion of faith that one should give the first place to the First Truth. But among those who do this, some submit to it with greater certitude and devotion than others. And in this way faith is greater in one than in another.

Reply Obj. 3. The understanding of principles results from man's very nature, which is equally shared by all. But faith results from the gift of grace, which is not equally in all, as explained above (Part I-II, Q. CXII, A. 4). Hence the comparison fails. Nevertheless the truth of principles is more known to one than to another, according to the greater capacity of intellect.

QUESTION VI OF THE CAUSE OF FAITH (In Two Articles)

WE must now consider the cause of faith, under which head there are two points of inquiry: (1) Whether faith is infused into man by God? (2) Whether formless faith is a gift of God?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Faith Is Infused into Man by God?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that faith is not infused into man by God.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (De Trin. XIV. 1)¹ that science "begets faith in us, and nourishes, defends and strengthens it." Now those things which science begets in us seem to be acquired rather than infused. Therefore faith does not seem to be in us by Divine infusion.

Obj. 2. Further, That to which man attains by hearing and seeing, seems to be acquired by him. Now man attains to belief both by seeing miracles and by hearing the teachings of faith. For it is written (John 4. 53): The father . . . knew that it was at the same hour, that Jesus said to him, Thy son liveth; and himself be- lieved, and his whole house; and (Rom. 10. 17) it is said that faith is through hearing. Therefore man attains to faith by acquiring it.

Obj. 3. Further, That which depends on a man's will can be acquired by him. But "faith depends on the believer's will," according to Augustine (De Prædest. Sanct. v).¹ Therefore faith can be acquired by man.

On the contrary, It is written (Eph. 2. 8. 9): By grace you are saved through faith, and that not of yourselves . . . that no man may glory . . . for it is the gift of God.

I answer that, Two things are requisite for faith. First, that the things which are of faith should be proposed to man. This is necessary in order that man believe anything explicitly. The second thing requisite for faith is the assent of the believer to the things which are proposed to him. Accordingly, as regards the first of these, faith must be from God. Because those things which are of faith surpass human reason, and hence they do not come to man's knowledge unless God reveal them. To some, indeed, they are revealed by God immediately, as those things which were to the apostles and prophets, while to some they are proposed by God in sending preachers of the faith, according to Rom. 10. 15: How shall they preach, unless they be sent?

As regards the second, namely, man's assent to the things which are of faith, we may observe a twofold cause, either one of external inducement, such as seeing a miracle, or being persuaded by someone to embrace the faith. Neither of these is a sufficient cause, since of those who see the same miracle, or who hear the same sermon, some believe, and some do not. Hence we must assert another interior cause, which moves man inwardly to assent to matters of faith.

The Pelagians held² that this cause was nothing else than man's free choice. And consequently they said that the beginning of faith is from ourselves, in so far as, namely, it is in our power to be ready to assent to things which are of faith, but that the consummation of faith is from God, Who proposes to us the things we have to believe. But this is false, for, since man, by assenting to matters of faith, is raised above his nature, this must exist in him from some supernatural principle moving him inwardly, and this is God. Therefore faith, as regards the assent which is the chief act of faith, is from God moving man inwardly by grace.

Reply Obj. 1. Science begets and nourishes faith, by way of the external persuasion afforded by science. But the chief and proper cause of faith is that which moves man inwardly to assent.

Reply Obj. 2. This argument again refers to the cause that proposes outwardly the things that are of faith, or persuades man to believe by words or deeds.

Reply Obj. 3. To believe does indeed depend on the will of the believer. But man's will needs to be prepared by God with grace, in order that he may be raised to things which are above his nature, as stated above.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Formless Faith Is a Gift of God?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that formless faith is not a gift of God.

Objection 1. For it is written (Deut. 32. 4) that the works of God are perfect. Now formless faith is something imperfect. Therefore it is not the work of God.

Obj. 2. Further, Just as an act is said to be deformed through lacking its due form, so too is faith called formless when it lacks the form due to it. Now the deformed act of sin is not from God, as stated above (Part I-II, q. LXXIX, A. 2. reply 2). Therefore neither is formless faith from God.

Obj. 3. Further, Whomsoever God heals, He heals wholly, for it is written (John 7. 23): If a man receive circumcision on the sabbath-day, that the law of Moses may not be broken; are you angry at Me because I have healed the whole man on the sabbath-day? Now faith heals man from unbelief. Therefore whoever receives from God the gift of faith is at the same time healed from all his sins. But this is not done except by formed faith. Therefore formed faith alone is a gift of God, and consequently formless faith is not from God.

On the contrary, A gloss on I Cor. 13. 2 says³ that "the faith which lacks charity is a gift of God." Now this is formless faith. Therefore formless faith is a gift of God.

I answer that, Formlessness is a privation. Now it must be noted that privation sometimes pertains to the notion of the species, and sometimes not, but comes to a thing already possessed of its proper species. Thus privation of the due equilibrium of the humours is of the very notion of the species of sickness, while darkness is not of the notion of a diaphanous body, but comes to it. Since, therefore, when we assign the cause of a thing, we intend to assign the cause of that thing as existing in its proper species, it follows that what is not the cause of a privation cannot be assigned as the cause of the thing to which that privation belongs as existing in the very notion of its species. For we cannot assign as the cause of a sickness something which is not the cause of a disturbance in the humours, though we can assign as cause of a diaphanous body something which is not the cause of the darkness, which is not in the notion of the diaphanous body.

Now the formlessness of faith does not pertain to the notion of the species of faith, since faith is said to be formless through lack of an extrinsic form, as stated above (Q. IV, A. 4). Consequently the cause of formless faith is that which is the cause of faith absolutely so called, and this is God, as stated above (A. 1). It follows, therefore, that formless faith is a gift of God.

Reply Obj. 1. Formless faith, though it is not absolutely perfect with the perfection of a virtue, is, nevertheless, perfect with a perfection that suffices for the notion of faith.

Reply Obj. 2. The deformity of an act is of the notion of the act's species, considered as a moral act, as stated above (Part I, Q. XLVIII, A. 1, reply 2; Part I-II, Q. XVIII, A. 5). For an act is said to be deformed through being deprived of an intrinsic form, namely the due commensuration of the act's circumstances. Hence we cannot say that God is the cause of a deformed act, for He is not the cause of its deformity, though He is the cause of the act as such.

We may also reply that deformity denotes not only privation of a due form, but also a contrary disposition; and thus deformity is compared to the act as falsehood is to faith. Hence, just as the deformed act is not from God, so neither is a false faith. And as formless faith is from God, so too, acts that are good generically, though not formed by charity, as is frequently the case in sinners, are from God.

Reply Obj. 3. He who receives faith from God without charity, is healed from unbelief, not absolutely (because the sin of his previous unbelief is not removed) but in part, namely, in the point of ceasing from committing such and such a sin. Thus it happens frequently that a man ceases from one act of sin through God causing him thus to cease without ceasing from another act of sin, through the suggestion of his own malice. And in this way sometimes it is granted by God to a man to believe, and yet he is not granted the gift of charity, just as also the gift of prophecy, or the like, is given to some without charity.

QUESTION VII

OF THE EFFECTS OF FAITH

(In Two Articles)

WE must now consider the effects of faith, under which head there are two points of inquiry: (1) Whether fear is an effect of faith? (2) Whether the heart is purified by faith?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Fear Is an Effect of Faith?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that fear is not an effect of faith.

Objection 1. For an effect does not precede its cause. Now fear precedes faith, for it is written (Ecclus. 2. 8): Ye that fear the Lord, believe in Him. Therefore fear is not an effect of faith.

Obj. 2. Further, The same thing is not the cause of contraries. Now fear and hope are contraries, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XXIII, A. 2), and faith begets hope, as a gloss observes on Matt. 1. 2.¹ Therefore fear is not an effect of faith.

Obj. 3. Further, One contrary does not cause another. Now the object of faith is a good which is the First Truth, while the object of fear is an evil, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XLII, A. 1). Again, acts take their species from the object, according to what was stated above (Part I-II, Q. XLIII, A. 2). Therefore faith is not a cause of fear.

On the contrary, It is written (James 2. 19). The devils . . . believe and tremble.

I answer that, Fear is a movement of the appetitive power, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XLI, A. 1). Now the principle of all appetitive movements is good or evil apprehended, and consequently the principle of fear and of every appetitive movement must be an apprehension. Again, through faith there arises in us an apprehension of certain punishments for evils, which are inflicted in accordance with the Divine judgment. In this way, then, faith is a cause of the fear by which one dreads to be punished by God. And this is servile fear.

It is also a cause of filial fear, according to which one dreads to be separated from God, or by which one shrinks from equalling oneself to Him, and holds Him in reverence, in so far as faith makes us appreciate God as an unfathomable and supreme good, separation from which is the greatest evil, and to which it is wicked to wish to be equalled. Of the first fear, namely, servile fear, formless faith is the cause, while formed faith is the cause of the second, namely filial fear, because it makes man adhere to God and to be subject to Him by charity.

Reply Obj. 1. Fear of God cannot universally precede faith, because if we knew nothing at all about Him, with regard to rewards and punishments, concerning which faith teaches us, we should in no way fear Him. If, however, faith be presupposed in reference to certain articles of faith, for example the Divine excellence, then reverential fear follows, the result of which is that man submits his intellect to God, so as to believe in all the Divine promises. Hence the text quoted continues: And your reward shall not be made void.

Reply Obj. 2. The same thing in respect of contraries can be the cause of contraries, but not under the same aspect. Now faith begets hope, in so far as it enables us to appreciate the prize which God awards to the just, while it is the cause of fear, in so far as it makes us appreciate the punishments which He intends to inflict on sinners.

Reply Obj. 3. The primary and formal object of faith is the good which is the First Truth. But the material object of faith includes also certain evils; for instance, that it is an evil either not to submit to God, or to be separated from Him, and that sinners will suffer evils of punishment from God. In this way faith can be the cause of fear.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Faith Has the Effect of Purifying the Heart?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that faith does not purify the heart.

Objection 1. For purity of the heart pertains chiefly to the affections, while faith is in the intellect. Therefore faith has not the effect of purifying the heart.

Obj. 2. Further, That which purifies the heart is incompatible with impurity. But faith is compatible with the impurity of sin, as may be seen in those who have formless faith. Therefore faith does not purify the heart.

Obj. 3. Further, If faith were to purify the human heart in any way, it would chiefly purify the intellect of man. Now it does not purify the intellect from obscurity, since it is a veiled knowledge. Therefore faith in no way purifies the heart.

On the contrary, Peter said (Acts 15. 9): Purifying their hearts by faith.

I answer that, A thing is impure through being mixed with baser things; for silver is not called impure, when mixed with gold, which betters it, but when mixed with lead or tin. Now it is evident that the rational creature is more excellent than all transient and corporeal creatures; so that it becomes impure through subjecting itself to transient things by loving them. From this impurity the rational creature is purified by means of a contrary movement, when it tends to that which is above it, namely, God. The first beginning of this movement is faith, since he that cometh to God must believe that He is, according to Heb. 11. 6. Hence the first beginning of the heart's purifying is faith. And if faith is perfected through being formed by charity, the heart will thus be perfectly purified.

Reply Obj. 1. Things that are in the intellect are the principles of those which are in the affection, in so far as the apprehended good moves the appetite.

Reply Obj. 2. Even formless faith excludes a certain impurity which is contrary to it, namely that of error, and which consists in the human intellect adhering inordinately to things below itself, through wishing to measure Divine things by the rule of sensible things. But when it is formed by charity, then it is incompatible with any kind of impurity, because charity covereth all sins (Prov. 10. 12).

Reply Obj. 3. The obscurity of faith does not pertain to the impurity of sin, but rather to the natural defect of the human intellect, according to the present state of life.

QUESTION VIII

OF THE GIFT OF UNDERSTANDING (In Eight Articles)

WE must now consider the gifts of understanding and knowledge, which correspond to the virtue of faith. With regard to the gift of understanding there are eight points of inquiry: (1) Whether understanding is a gift of the Holy Ghost? (2) Whether it can be together with faith in the same person? (3) Whether the understanding which is a gift of the Holy Ghost, is only speculative, or practical also? (4) Whether all who are in a state of grace have the gift of understanding? (5) Whether this gift is to be found in those who are without grace? (6) Of the relationship of the gift of understanding to the other gifts. (7) Which of the beatitudes corresponds to this gift? (8)

Which of the fruits?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Understanding Is a Gift of the Holy Ghost?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that understanding is not a gift of the Holy Ghost.

Objection 1. For the gifts of grace are distinct from the gifts of nature, since they are given in addition to the latter. Now understanding is a natural habit of the soul, by which self-evident principles are known, as stated in the Ethics.¹ Therefore it should not be counted among the gifts of the Holy Ghost.

Obj. 2. Further, The Divine gifts are shared by creatures according to their proportion and mode, as Dionysius states (Div. Nom. iv).² Now the mode of human nature is to know the truth, not absolutely (which pertains to the notion of understanding), but discursively (which is proper to reason), as Dionysius explains (Div. Nom. vii).³ Therefore the Divine knowledge which is bestowed on man should be called a gift of reason rather than a gift of understanding.

Obj. 3. Further, In the powers of the soul the understanding is divided against the will.⁴ Now no gift of the Holy Ghost is called after the will. Therefore no gift of the Holy Ghost should receive the name of understanding.

On the contrary, It is written (Isa. 11, 2): The Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the Spirit of wisdom and of understanding.

I answer that, The word intellectus (understanding) implies an innermost knowledge, for intelligere (to understand) is the same as intus legere (to read inwardly). This is clear to anyone who considers the difference between intellect and sense, because sensitive knowledge is concerned with external sensible qualities, while intellectual knowledge penetrates into the very essence of a thing, because "the object of the intellect is what a thing is," as stated in the book on the Soul.⁵

Now there are many kinds of things that are hidden within, to find which human knowledge has to penetrate within so to speak. Thus, under the accidents lies hidden the nature of the substantial thing, under words lies hidden their meaning, under likenesses and figures the truth they denote lies hidden (because intelligible things are in a certain way inward as compared with sensible things which are perceived externally), and effects lie hidden in their causes, and vice versa. Hence we may speak of understanding with regard to all these things.

Since, however, human knowledge begins with sense, from the outside of things as it were, it is evident that the stronger the light of the understanding, the further can it penetrate into the heart of things. Now the natural light of our understanding is of finite power. And so it can reach just to a certain fixed point. Consequently man needs a supernatural light, in order to penetrate further still so as to know what it cannot know by its natural light. And this supernatural light which is bestowed on man is called the gift of understanding.

Reply Obj. 1. The natural light instilled within us manifests only certain common principles, which are known naturally. But since man is ordained to supernatural happiness, as stated above (Q. 11, A. 3; Part I-II, Q. 111, A. 8), man needs to reach to certain higher truths, for which he requires the gift of understanding.

Reply Obj. 2. The discourse of reason always begins from an understanding and ends at an understanding, because we reason by proceeding from certain understood principles, and the discourse of reason is perfected when we come to understand what we did not know before. Hence the act of reasoning proceeds from something previously understood. Now a gift of grace does not proceed from the light of nature, but is added to it as perfecting it. Therefore this addition is not called reason but rather understanding, since the superadded light is, in comparison with what we know supernaturally, what the natural light is, in regard to those things which we know from the first.

Reply Obj. 3. Will denotes absolutely a movement of the appetite without the determination of any excellence. But understanding denotes a certain excellence of a knowledge that penetrates into the heart of things. Hence the supernatural gift is called after the understanding rather than after the will.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the Gift of Understanding Is Compatible With Faith?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that the gift of understanding is incompatible with faith.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (QQ. lxxxiii, qu. 15)⁶ that "the thing which is understood is bounded by the comprehension of

him who understands it." But the thing which is believed is not comprehended, according to the word of the Apostle to the Philippians (3. 12): Not as though I had already comprehended (Douay.—attained), or were already perfect. Therefore it seems that faith and understanding are incompatible in the same subject.

Obj. 2. Further, Whatever is understood is seen by the understanding. But faith is of things that appear not, as stated above (Q. I. A. 4; Q. IV, A. 1). Therefore faith is incompatible with understanding in the same subject.

Obj. 3. Further, Understanding is more certain than science. But science and faith are incompatible in the same subject, as stated above (Q. I, A. 5). Much less, therefore, can understanding and faith be in the same subject.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Moral. i)¹ that "understanding enlightens the mind concerning the things it has heard." Now one who has faith can be enlightened in his mind concerning what he has heard; thus it is written (Luke 24. 27, 32) that Our Lord opened the scriptures to His disciples, that they might understand them. Therefore understanding is compatible with faith.

I answer that, We need to make a twofold distinction here: one on the side of faith, the other on the part of understanding. On the side of faith the distinction to be made is that certain things, of themselves, come directly under faith, because they surpass natural reason, such as the mystery of three Persons in one God, and the incarnation of God the Son. But other things come under faith through being subordinate, in one way or another, to those just mentioned; for instance, all that is contained in the Divine Scriptures. On the part of understanding the distinction to be observed is that there are two ways in which we may be said to understand. In one way, we understand a thing perfectly, when we arrive at knowing the essence of the thing we understand, and the very truth considered in itself of the proposition understood. In this way, so long as the state of faith lasts, we cannot understand those things which fall directly under faith, although certain other things that are subordinate to faith can be understood even in this way.

In another way we understand a thing imperfectly, when the essence of a thing or the truth of a proposition is not known as to its quiddity or mode of being, and yet we know that according to the outward appearances, they do not contradict the truth; in so far, namely, as we understand that on account of the things that appear externally, we should not depart from matters of faith. In this way, even during the state of faith, nothing hinders us from understanding even those things which fall directly under faith.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections; for the first three argue in reference to perfect understanding, while the last refers to the understanding of matters subordinate to faith.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the Gift of Understanding Is Speculative Only, or Also Practical?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that understanding, considered as a gift of the Holy Ghost, is not practical, but only speculative.

Objection 1. For, according to Gregory (Moral. i. 32),² understanding "penetrates certain more exalted things." But the practical intellect is occupied, not with exalted, but with lowly things, namely singulars, about which actions are concerned. Therefore understanding, considered as a gift, is not practical.

Obj. 2. Further, The gift of understanding is something more excellent than the intellectual virtue of understanding. But the intellectual virtue of understanding is concerned with none but necessary things according to the Philosopher.³ Much more, therefore, is the gift of understanding concerned with none but necessary matters. Now the practical intellect is not about necessary things, but about things which may be otherwise than they are, and which may result from man's activity. Therefore the gift of understanding is not practical.

Obj. 3. Further, The gift of understanding enlightens the mind in matters which surpass natural reason. Now human activities, with which the practical intellect is concerned, do not surpass natural reason, which directs in matters of action, as was made clear above (Part I-II, Q. LVIII, A. 2; Q. LXXI, A. 6). Therefore the gift of understanding is not practical.

On the contrary, It is written (Ps. 110. 10): A good understanding to all that do it.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 2), the gift of understanding is not only about those things which come under faith first and principally, but also about all things subordinate to faith. Now good actions have a certain relationship to faith, for faith worketh through charity, according to the Apostle (Gal. 5. 6). Hence the gift of understanding extends also to certain actions, not as though it turned about them principally, but in so far as the rule of our actions are the eternal ideas, to which the higher reason, which is perfected by the gift of understanding, adheres, by contemplating and consulting them, as Augustine states (De Trin. xii, 7).¹

³ Ethics, VI, 6 (1140^b31).

Reply Obj. 1. The things with which human actions are concerned are not surpassingly exalted considered in themselves, but, as referred to the rule of the eternal law, and to the end of Divine happiness, they are exalted so that they can be the matter of understanding.

Reply Obj. 2. The excellence of the gift of understanding consists precisely in its considering eternal or necessary intelligibles not only as they are in themselves, but also as they are rules of human actions, because a knowing power is the more excellent, according to the greater number of things to which it extends.

Reply Obj. 3. The rule of human actions is the human reason and the eternal law, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXII, A. 6). Now the eternal law surpasses human reason, so that the knowledge of human actions, as ruled by the eternal law, surpasses the natural reason, and requires the supernatural light of a gift of the Holy Ghost.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the Gift of Understanding Is in All Who Are in a State of Grace?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that the gift of understanding is not in all who are in a state of grace.

Objection 1. For Gregory says (Moral. ii, 49)² that "the gift of understanding is given as a remedy against dullness of the mind." Now many who are in a state of grace suffer from dullness of the mind. Therefore the gift of understanding is not in all who are in a state of grace.

Obj. 2. Further, Of all things that are connected with knowledge, faith alone seems to be necessary for salvation, since by faith Christ dwells in our hearts, according to Eph. 3. 17. Now the gift of understanding is not in everyone that has faith; indeed, those who have faith ought to pray that they may understand, as Augustine says (De Trin. xv, 26).³ Therefore the gift of understanding is not necessary for salvation, and, consequently, is not in all who are in a state of grace.

Obj. 3. Further, Those things which are common to all who are in a state of grace are never withdrawn from them. Now the grace of understanding and of the other gifts "sometimes withdraws itself profitably, for, at times, when the mind is puffed up with understanding sublime things, it becomes sluggish and dull in base and vile things," as Gregory observes (Moral. ii, 49).⁴ Therefore the gift of understanding is not in all who are in a state of grace.

On the contrary, It is written (Ps. 81. 5): They have not known or understood, they walk on in darkness. But no one who is in a state of grace walks in darkness, according to John 8. 12: He that followeth Me, walketh not in darkness. Therefore no one who is in a state of grace is without the gift of understanding.

I answer that, In all who are in a state of grace, there must be rectitude of the will, since "grace prepares man's will for good," according to Augustine (Contra Julian. Pelag. iv, 3).⁵ Now the will cannot be rightly directed to good unless there be already some knowledge of the truth, since the object of the will is the good understood, as stated in the book on the Soul.⁶ Again, just as the Holy Ghost directs man's will by the gift of charity, so as to move it directly to some supernatural good, so also, by the gift of understanding He enlightens the human mind so that it knows some supernatural truth, to which the right will needs to tend. Therefore, just as the gift of charity is in all those who have sanctifying grace, so also is the gift of understanding.

Reply Obj. 1. Some who have sanctifying grace may suffer dullness of mind with regard to things that are not necessary for salvation; but with regard to those that are necessary for salvation, they are sufficiently instructed by the Holy Ghost, according to 1 John 2. 27: His unction teacheth you of all things.

Reply Obj. 2. Although not all who have faith understand fully the things that are proposed to be believed, yet they understand that they ought to believe them, and that they ought in no way to deviate from them.

Reply Obj. 3. With regard to things necessary for salvation, the gift of understanding never withdraws from holy persons. But, in order that they may have no incentive to pride, it does withdraw sometimes with regard to other things, so that their intellect is unable to penetrate all things clearly.

ARTICLE 5. Whether the Gift of Understanding Is Found Also in Those Who Have Not Sanctifying Grace?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that the gift of understanding is found also in those who have not sanctifying grace.

Objection 1. For Augustine, in expounding the words of Ps. 118. 20: My soul hath coveted to long for Thy justifications, says: "Understanding flies ahead, and man's will is weak and slow to follow."¹ But in all who have sanctifying grace, the will is prompt on account of charity. Therefore the gift of understanding can be in those who have not sanctifying grace.

Obj. 2. Further, It is written (Dan. 10. 1) that there is need of understanding in a (prophetic) vision, and thus it seems that there is no prophecy without the gift of understanding. But there can be no prophecy without sanctifying grace, as evidenced by Matt. 7. 22, where those who say: We have prophesied in Thy name, (Vulg.—Have we not prophesied in Thy name?) are answered with the words: I never knew you. Therefore the gift of understanding can be without sanctifying grace.

Obj. 3. Further, The gift of understanding corresponds to the virtue of faith, according to Isa. 7. 9, following another reading:² If you will not believe you shall not understand. Now faith can be without sanctifying grace. Therefore the gift of understanding can be without it.

On the contrary, Our Lord said (John 6. 45): Every one that hath heard of the Father, and hath learned, cometh to Me. Now it is by the intellect, as Gregory observes (Moral. i, 32),³ that we learn or understand what we hear. Therefore whoever has the gift of understanding comes to Christ, which is impossible without sanctifying grace. Therefore the gift of understanding cannot be without sanctifying grace.

I answer that, As stated above (Part I-II, q. LXVIII, aa. 1, 2, 3) the gifts of the Holy Ghost perfect the soul, according as it is amenable to the motion of the Holy Ghost. Accordingly, then, the intellectual light of grace is called the gift of understanding, in so far as man's understanding is easily moved by the Holy Ghost, the consideration of which movement consists in a true apprehension of the end. Therefore unless the human intellect is moved by the Holy Ghost so far as to have a right estimation of the end, it has not yet obtained the gift of understanding, however much the Holy Ghost may have enlightened it in regard to other truths that are preambles to the faith.

Now to have a right estimation about the last end one must not be in error about the end, and must adhere to it firmly as to the greatest good. And no one can do this without sanctifying grace, even as in moral matters a man has a right estimate about the end through a habit of virtue. Therefore no one has the gift of understanding without sanctifying grace.

Reply Obj. 1. By understanding Augustine means any kind of intellectual light. However this does not extend to the perfect notion of a gift, unless the mind of man be led so far as to have a right estimate about the end.

Reply Obj. 2. The understanding that is requisite for prophecy is a kind of enlightenment of the mind with regard to the things revealed to the prophet. But it is not an enlightenment of the mind with regard to a right estimate about the last end, which belongs to the gift of understanding.

Reply Obj. 3. Faith implies only assent to what is proposed, but understanding implies a certain perception of the truth, which perception, except in one who has sanctifying grace, cannot regard the end, as stated above. Hence the comparison between understanding and faith fails.

ARTICLE 6. Whether the Gift of Understanding Is Distinct From the Other Gifts?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that the gift of understanding is not distinct from the other gifts.

Objection 1. For there is no distinction between things whose opposites are not distinct. Now wisdom is contrary to folly, understanding is contrary to dulness, counsel is contrary to rashness, knowledge is contrary to ignorance, as Gregory states (Moral. ii, 49).⁴ But there would seem to be no difference between folly, dulness, ignorance and rashness. Therefore neither does understanding differ from the other gifts.

Obj. 2. Further, The intellectual virtue of understanding differs from the other intellectual virtues in that it is proper to it to be about self-evident principles. But the gift of understanding is not about any self-evident principles, since the natural habit of first principles suffices in respect of those matters which are naturally self-evident. But with respect of such things as are supernatural, faith is sufficient

since the articles of faith are like first principles in supernatural knowledge, as stated above (Q. I, A. 7). Therefore the gift of understanding does not differ from the other intellectual gifts.

Obj. 3. Further, All intellectual knowledge is either speculative or practical. Now the gift of understanding is related to both, as stated above (A. 3). Therefore it is not distinct from the other intellectual gifts, but comprises them all.

On the contrary, When several things are enumerated together they must be, in some way, distinct from one another, because distinction is the principle of number. Now the gift of understanding is enumerated together with the other gifts, as appears from Isa 11. 2. Therefore the gift of understanding is distinct from the other gifts.

I answer that, The difference between the gift of understanding and three of the others, namely piety, fortitude, and fear, is evident, since the gift of understanding pertains to the cognitive power, while the three others pertain to the appetitive power. But the difference between this gift of understanding and the remaining three, namely wisdom, knowledge, and counsel, which also pertain to the cognitive power, is not so evident.

To some,¹ it seems that the gift of understanding differs from the gifts of knowledge and counsel, in that these two pertain to practical knowledge, while the gift of understanding pertains to speculative knowledge; and that it differs from the gift of wisdom, which also pertains to speculative knowledge, in that wisdom is concerned with judgment, while understanding renders the mind apt to grasp the things that are proposed, and to penetrate into their very heart. And in this sense we have assigned the number of the gifts, above (Part I-II, Q. LXVIII, A. 4).

But if we consider the matter carefully, the gift of understanding is concerned not only with speculative, but also with practical matters, as stated above (A. 3), and, likewise, the gift of knowledge regards both matters, as we shall show further on (Q. IX, A. 3). And, consequently, we must take their distinction in some other way. For all these four gifts are ordered to supernatural knowledge, which, in us, takes its foundation from faith. Now faith is through hearing (Rom. 10. 17). Hence some things must be proposed to be believed by man, not as seen, but as heard, to which he assents by faith. Now faith, first and principally, is about the First Truth, secondarily, about certain considerations concerning creatures, and furthermore extends to the direction of human actions, in so far as it works through charity, as appears from what has been said above (A. 3; Q. IV, A. 2, reply 3).

Accordingly on the part of the things proposed to faith for belief, two things are requisite on our part. First, that they be penetrated or grasped by the intellect, and this pertains to the gift of understanding. Secondly, it is necessary that man should judge these things rightly, that he should esteem that he ought to adhere to these things, and to withdraw from their opposites. And this judgment, with regard to Divine things pertains to the gift of wisdom, but with regard to created things, pertains to the gift of knowledge, and as to its application to individual works, pertains to the gift of counsel.

Reply Obj. 1 The foregoing difference between those four gifts is clearly in agreement with the distinction of those things which Gregory assigns as their opposites. For dulness is contrary to sharpness, since an intellect is said, by a figure, to be sharp, when it is able to penetrate into the heart of the things that are proposed to it. Hence it is dulness of mind that renders the mind unable to pierce into the heart of a thing. A man is said to be a fool if he judges wrongly about the common end of life, and so folly is properly opposed to wisdom, which makes us judge rightly about the universal cause. Ignorance implies a defect in the mind, even about any particular things whatever, so that it is contrary to knowledge, which gives man a right judgment about particular causes, namely about creatures. Rashness is clearly opposed to counsel, by which man does not proceed to action before deliberating with his reason.

Reply Obj. 2. The gift of understanding is about the first principles of that knowledge which is conferred by grace; but otherwise than faith, because it pertains to faith to assent to them, while it pertains to the gift of understanding to pierce with the mind the things that are said.

Reply Obj. 3. The gift of understanding pertains to both kinds of knowledge, namely, speculative and practical, not as to the judgment, but as to apprehension, by grasping what is said.

ARTICLE 7. Whether the Sixth Beatitude, "Blessed Are the Clean of Heart," etc., Corresponds to the Gift of Understanding?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It seems that the sixth beatitude, Blessed are the clean of heart, for they shall see God, does not correspond to the gift of understanding.

Objection 1. Because cleanness of heart seems to pertain chiefly to the appetite. But the gift of understanding pertains, not to the appetite, but rather to the intellectual power. Therefore this beatitude does not correspond to the gift of understanding.

Obj. 2. Further, It is written (Acts 15. 9): Purifying their hearts by faith. Now cleanness of heart is acquired by the heart being purified. Therefore this beatitude is related to the virtue of faith rather than to the gift of understanding.

Obj. 3. Further, The gifts of the Holy Ghost perfect man in the present state of life. But the sight of God does not belong to the present life, since it is that which gives happiness to the Blessed, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. III, A. 8). Therefore the sixth beatitude which comprises the sight of God, does not correspond to the gift of understanding.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Serm. Dom. in Monte, i, 4):¹ "The sixth work of the Holy Ghost which is understanding, is applicable to the clean of heart, whose eye being purified, they can see what eye hath not seen."

I answer that, Two things are contained in the sixth beatitude, as also in the others, one by way of merit, namely, cleanness of heart; the other by way of reward, namely, the sight of God, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXIX, A. 2), and each of these, in some way, corresponds to the gift of understanding.

For cleanness is twofold. One is a preamble and a disposition to seeing God, and consists in the heart being cleansed of inordinate affections. And this cleanness of heart is effected by the virtues and gifts belonging to the appetitive power. The other cleanness of heart is a kind of complement to the sight of God; such is the cleanness of the mind that is purged of phantasms and errors, so as to receive the truths which are proposed to it about God, no longer by way of corporeal phantasms, nor infected with heretical misrepresentations. And this cleanness is the result of the gift of understanding.

Again, the sight of God is twofold. One is perfect, by which God's Essence is seen. The other is imperfect, by which, though we do not see what God is, yet we see what He is not and by which, the more perfectly we know God in this life, the more we understand that He surpasses all that the mind comprehends. Each of these visions of God pertains to the gift of understanding; the first, to the gift of understanding in its state of perfection, as possessed in heaven; the second, to the gift of understanding in its state of origin, as possessed by wayfarers.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections. For the first two arguments refer to the first kind of cleanness; while the third refers to the perfect vision of God. Moreover the gifts both perfect us in this life by kind of beginning, and will be fulfilled, as stated above (cf. Part I-II, Q. LXIX, A. 2).

ARTICLE 8. Whether Faith, Among the Fruits, Corresponds to the Gift of Understanding?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It would seem that, among the fruits, faith does not correspond to the gift of understanding.

Objection 1. For understanding is the fruit of faith, since it is written (Isa. 7. 9) according to another reading.² If you will not believe you shall not understand, where our version has: If you will not believe, you shall not continue. Therefore faith is not the fruit of understanding.

Obj. 2. Further, That which precedes is not the fruit of what follows. But faith seems to precede understanding, since it is the foundation of the entire spiritual edifice, as stated above (Q. IV, A. 7; Part I-II, Q. LXVII, A. 2, reply 2). Therefore faith is not the fruit of understanding.

Obj. 3. Further, More gifts pertain to the intellect than to the appetite. Now, among the fruits, only one pertains to the intellect, namely, faith, while all the others pertain to the appetite. Therefore faith, it seems, does not pertain to understanding more than to wisdom, knowledge or counsel.

On the contrary, The end of a thing is its fruit. Now the gift of understanding seems to be ordered chiefly to the certitude of faith, which certitude is counted as a fruit. For a gloss on Gal. 5. 22 says that the faith which is a fruit, is certitude about the unseen.³ Therefore faith, among the fruits, corresponds to the gift of understanding.

I answer that, The fruits of the Spirit, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXX, A. 1), when we were discussing them, are so called because they are something ultimate and delightful, produced in us by the power of the Holy Ghost. Now the ultimate and delightful has the nature of an end, which is the proper object of the will. And consequently that which is ultimate and delightful with regard to the will, must be, after a fashion, the fruit of all the other things that pertain to the other powers. According, therefore, to this kind of gift or virtue that perfects a power, we may distinguish a double fruit: one, pertaining to the same power; the other, the last of all as it were, pertaining to the will. In this way we must conclude that the fruit which properly corresponds to the gift of understanding is faith, that is, the certitude of faith; while the fruit that corresponds to it last of all is joy, which pertains to the will.

Reply Obj. 1. Understanding is the fruit of faith, taken as a virtue. But we are not taking faith in this sense here, but for a kind of certitude of faith, to which man attains by the gift of understanding.

Reply Obj. 2. Faith cannot altogether precede understanding, for it would be impossible to assent by believing what is proposed to be believed without understanding it in some way. However, the perfection of understanding follows the virtue of faith, which perfection of understanding is itself followed by a kind of certainty of faith.

Reply Obj. 3. The fruit of practical knowledge cannot consist in that very knowledge, since knowledge of that kind is known not for its own sake, but for the sake of something else. On the other hand, speculative knowledge has its fruit in its very self, which fruit is the certitude about the thing known. Hence the gift of counsel, which pertains only to practical knowledge, has no corresponding fruit of its own; while the gifts of wisdom, understanding and knowledge, which can pertain also to speculative knowledge, have but one corresponding fruit, which is certainly denoted by the name of faith. The reason why there are several fruits pertaining to the appetitive faculty, is because, as already stated, the character of end, which the word fruit implies, pertains to the appetitive rather than to the intellective part.

QUESTION IX OF THE GIFT OF KNOWLEDGE (In Four Articles)

WE must now consider the gift of knowledge, under which head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether knowledge is a gift? (2) Whether it is about Divine things? (3) Whether it is speculative or practical? (4) Which beatitude corresponds to it?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Knowledge Is a Gift?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that knowledge is not a gift.

Objection 1. For the gifts of the Holy Ghost surpass the natural faculty. But knowledge implies an effect of natural reason; for the Philosopher says¹ that "a demonstration is a syllogism which produces knowledge." Therefore knowledge is not a gift of the Holy Ghost.

Obj. 2. Further, The gifts of the Holy Ghost are common to all holy persons, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXVIII, A. 5). Now Augustine says (De Trin. xiv, 1)² that "many of the faithful lack knowledge though they have faith." Therefore knowledge is not a gift.

Obj. 3. Further, The gifts are more perfect than the virtues, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXVIII, A. 8). Therefore one gift suffices for the perfection of one virtue. Now the gift of understanding corresponds to the virtue of faith, as stated above (Q. VIII, A. 5, reply 3). Therefore the gift of knowledge does not correspond to that virtue, nor does it appear to what other virtue it can correspond. Since, then, the gifts are perfections of virtues, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXVIII, AA. 1, 2), it seems that knowledge is not a gift.

On the contrary Knowledge is counted among the seven gifts, Isa. 11. 2.

I answer that, Grace is more perfect than nature, and, therefore, does not fail in those things in which man can be perfected by nature. Now, when a man, by his natural reason, assents by his intellect to some truth, he is perfected in two ways in respect of that truth: first, because he grasps it, secondly, because he has a sure judgment of it. Accordingly, two things are requisite in order that the human intellect may perfectly assent to the truth of the faith: one of these is that he should have a sound grasp of the things that are proposed to be believed, and this pertains to the gift of understanding, as stated above (Q. VIII, A. 6); while the other is that he should have a sure and right judgment on them, so as to discern what is to be believed from what is not to be believed, and for this the gift of knowledge is required.

Reply Obj. 1. Certitude of knowledge varies in various natures, according to the various conditions of each nature. For man forms a sure judgment about a truth by the discursive process of his reason, and so human knowledge is acquired by means of demonstrative reasoning. On the other hand, in God, there is a right judgment of truth, without any discursive process, by simple intuition, as was stated in the First Part (Q. xiv, A. 7); therefore God's knowledge is not discursive, or argumentative, but absolute and simple; and to this knowledge is likened that which is a gift of the Holy Ghost, since it is a participated likeness of it.

Reply Obj. 2. A twofold knowledge may be had about matters of belief. One is the knowledge of what one ought to believe, by discerning things to be believed from things not to be believed. In this way knowledge is a gift and is common to all holy persons. The other is a knowledge about matters of belief, by which one knows not only what one ought to believe, but also how to make the faith known, how to induce others to believe, and confute those who deny the faith. This knowledge is numbered among the gratuitous graces, which are not given to all, but to some. Hence Augustine, after the words quoted, adds: "It is one thing for a man merely to know what he ought to believe, and another to know how to dispense what he believes to the godly, and to defend it against the ungodly."

Reply Obj. 3. The gifts are more perfect than the moral and intellectual virtues. They are not more perfect than the theological virtues, but rather all the gifts are ordered to the perfection of the theological virtues, as to their end. Hence it is not unreasonable if several gifts are ordered to one theological virtue.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the Gift of Knowledge Is About Divine Things?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that the gift of knowledge is about Divine things.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (De Trin. xiv, 1)¹ that "knowledge begets, nourishes and strengthens faith." Now faith is about Divine things, because its object is the First Truth, as stated above (Q. 1, A. 1). Therefore the gift of knowledge also is about Divine things.

Obj. 2. Further, The gift of knowledge is more excellent than acquired knowledge. But there is an acquired knowledge about Divine things, for instance, the science of metaphysics. Much more therefore is the gift of knowledge about Divine things.

Obj. 3. Further, According to Rom. 1. 20, the invisible things of God . . . are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made. If therefore there is knowledge about created things, it seems that there is also knowledge of Divine things.

On the contrary, Augustine says²: "The knowledge of Divine things may be properly called wisdom, and the knowledge of human affairs may properly receive the name of knowledge."

I answer that, A sure judgment about a thing is formed chiefly from its cause, and so the order of judgments should be according to the order of causes. For just as the first cause is the cause of the second, so ought the judgment about a second cause be formed through the first cause. Nor is it possible to judge of the first cause through any other cause. Therefore the judgment which is formed through the first cause is the first and most perfect judgment.

Now in those things where we find something most perfect, the common name of the genus is appropriated for those things which fall short of the most perfect, and some special name is adapted to the most perfect thing, as is the case in Logic. For in the genus of convertible terms, that which signifies "what a thing is," is given the special name of "definition," but the convertible terms which fall short of this, retain the common name, and are called "proper" terms.

Accordingly, since the word knowledge implies certitude of judgment, as stated above (A. 1, reply 1), if this certitude of the judgment is derived from the highest cause, the knowledge has a special name, which is wisdom. For a wise man in any branch of knowledge is one who knows the highest cause of that kind of knowledge, and is able to judge of all matters by that cause; and a wise man absolutely, is one who knows the cause which is absolutely highest, namely God. Hence the knowledge of Divine things is called wisdom, while the knowledge of human things is called knowledge (scientia), this being the common name denoting certitude of judgment, and appropriated to the judgment which is formed through second causes. Accordingly, if we take knowledge in this way, it is a distinct gift from the gift of wisdom, so that the gift of knowledge is only about human or created things.

Reply Obj. 1. Although matters of faith are Divine and eternal, yet faith itself is something temporal in the mind of the believer. Hence to know what one ought to believe, pertains to the gift of knowledge, but to know in themselves the very things we believe, by a kind of union with them, pertains to the gift of wisdom.

Therefore the gift of wisdom corresponds more to charity which unites man's mind to God.

Reply Obj. 2. This argument takes knowledge in the generic acceptation of the term. It is not thus that knowledge is a special gift, but according as it is restricted to judgments formed through created things.

Reply Obj. 3. As stated above (Q. 1, A. 1), every cognitive habit regards formally the means through which things are known, and materially, the things that are known through the means. And since that which is formal is of most account, it follows that those sciences which draw conclusions about physical matter (materia naturalis) from mathematical principles, are counted rather among the mathematical sciences as being more like to them, though as to their matter they have more in common with the natural sciences; and for this reason it is stated in the *Physics*¹ that they are "more akin to physics (magis naturales)."² Accordingly, since man knows God through His creatures, this seems to pertain to knowledge, to which it belongs formally, rather than to wisdom, to which it belongs materially; and, conversely, when we judge of creatures according to Divine things, this pertains to wisdom rather than to knowledge.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the Gift of Knowledge Is Practical Knowledge?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that the knowledge which is numbered among the gifts is practical knowledge.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (De Trin. xii, 14)³ that "knowledge is concerned with the actions in which we make use of external things." But the knowledge which is concerned about actions is practical. Therefore the knowledge which is a gift is practical.

Obj. 2. Further, Gregory says (Moral. i, 32):⁴ "Knowledge is nought if it hath not its use for piety, . . . and piety is very useless if it lacks the discernment of knowledge." Now it follows from this authority that knowledge directs piety. But this cannot apply to a speculative science. Therefore the knowledge which is a gift is not speculative but practical.

Obj. 3. Further, The gifts of the Holy Ghost are only in the just, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXXXVIII, A. 5). But speculative knowledge can be also in the unjust, according to James 4. 17: To him . . . who knoweth to do good, and doth it not, to him it is a sin. Therefore the knowledge which is a gift is not speculative but practical.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Moral. i, loc. cit.): "Knowledge on her own day prepares a feast, because she overcomes the fast of ignorance in the mind." Now ignorance is not entirely removed, except by both kinds of knowledge, namely, speculative and practical. Therefore the knowledge which is a gift is both speculative and practical.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1), the gift of knowledge, like the gift of understanding, is ordered to the certitude of faith. Now faith consists primarily and principally in speculation, in so far, namely, as it is founded on the First Truth. But since the First Truth is also the last end for the sake of which our works are done, hence it is that faith extends to works, according to Gal. 5. 6: Faith . . . worketh by charity. The consequence is that the gift of knowledge also, primarily and principally indeed, regards speculation, in so far, namely, as man knows what he ought to hold by faith; yet, secondarily, it extends to works, since we are directed in our actions by the knowledge of matters of faith, and of conclusions drawn from them.

Reply Obj. 1. Augustine is speaking of the gift of knowledge in so far as it extends to works; for action is ascribed to knowledge, yet not action solely, nor primarily; and in this way it directs piety.

Hence the Reply to the Second Objection is clear.

Reply Obj. 3. As we have already stated (Q. VIII, A. 5) about the gift of understanding, not everyone who understands, has the gift of understanding, but only he that understands through a habit of grace. And so we must take note, with regard to the gift of knowledge, that they alone have the gift of knowledge, who judge rightly about matters of faith and action, through the grace bestowed on them, so as never to wander from the rectitude of justice. And this is the knowledge of holy things, according to Wisd. 10. 10: She conducted the just . . . through the right ways . . . and gave him the knowledge of holy things.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the Third Beatitude, "Blessed Are They That Mourn," etc., Corresponds to the Gift of Knowledge?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that the third beatitude, Blessed are they that mourn (Matt. 5. 5), does not correspond to the gift of knowledge.

Objection 1. For, even as evil is the cause of sorrow and grief, so is good the cause of joy. Now knowledge brings to light good rather than evil, since the latter is known through evil: for "the straight line rules both itself and the crooked line."¹ Therefore this beatitude does not suitably correspond to the gift of knowledge.

Obj. 2. Further, Consideration of truth is an act of knowledge. Now there is no sadness in the consideration of truth, but rather joy, since it is written (Wisd. 8. 16): Her conversation hath no bitterness, nor her company any tediousness, but joy and gladness. Therefore this beatitude does not suitably correspond with the gift of knowledge.

Obj. 3. Further, The gift of knowledge consists in speculation, before operation. Now, in so far as it consists in speculation, sorrow does not correspond to it, since "the speculative intellect is not concerned about things to be sought or avoided."² Therefore the aforesaid beatitude is not suitably reckoned to correspond with the gift of knowledge.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Serm. Dom. in Monte, iv).³ "Knowledge befits the mourner, who has discovered that he has been mastered by the evil which he coveted as though it were good."

I answer that, Right judgment about creatures belongs properly to knowledge. Now it is through creatures that man's turning away from God is occasioned, according to Wisd. 14. 11: Creatures . . . are turned to an abomination . . . and a snare to the feet of the unwise, of those, namely, who do not judge rightly about creatures, since they deem the perfect good to consist in them. Hence they sin by placing their last end in them, and lose the true good. It is by forming a right judgment of creatures that man becomes aware of this loss, which judgment he exercises through the gift of knowledge. Hence the beatitude of sorrow is said to correspond to the gift of knowledge.

Reply Obj. 1. Created goods do not cause spiritual joy, except in so far as they are referred to the Divine good, which is the proper cause of spiritual joy. Hence spiritual peace and the resulting joy correspond directly to the gift of wisdom. But to the gift of knowledge there corresponds, in the first place, sorrow for past errors, and, in consequence, consolation, since, by his right judgment, man directs creatures to the Divine good. For this reason sorrow is set forth in this beatitude, as the merit, and the resulting consolation, as the reward. And this is begun in this life, and is perfected in the life to come.

Reply Obj. 2. Man rejoices in the very consideration of truth; and yet he may sometimes grieve for the thing, the truth of which he considers. It is thus that sorrow is ascribed to knowledge.

Reply Obj. 3. No beatitude corresponds to knowledge, in so far as it consists in speculation, because man's happiness consists, not in considering creatures, but in contemplating God. But man's happiness does consist somewhat in the right use of creatures, and in well-ordered love of them; and this I say with regard to the happiness of a wayfarer. Hence happiness relating to contemplation is not ascribed to knowledge, but to understanding and wisdom, which are about Divine things.

QUESTION X

OF UNBELIEF IN GENERAL

(In Twelve Articles)

IN due sequence we must consider the contrary vices. And first, unbelief, which is contrary to faith; secondly, blasphemy, which is opposed to confession of faith (Q. XIII); thirdly, ignorance and dulness of mind, which are contrary to knowledge and understanding (Q. XV).

As to the first, we must consider (1) Unbelief in general; (2) heresy (Q. XI), (3) apostasy from the faith (Q. XII).

Under the first head there are twelve points of inquiry: (1) Whether unbelief is a sin? (2) What is its subject? (3) Whether it is the greatest of sins? (4) Whether every action of unbelievers is a sin? (5) Of the species of unbelief. (6) Of their comparison, one with another. (7) Whether we ought to dispute about faith with unbelievers? (8) Whether they ought to be compelled to the faith? (9) Whether we ought to have communication with them? (10) Whether unbelievers can have authority over Christians? (11) Whether the rites of unbelievers should be tolerated? (12) Whether the children of unbelievers are to be baptized against their parents' will?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Unbelief Is a Sin?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that unbelief is not a sin.

Objection 1. For every sin is contrary to nature, as Damascene proves (De Fide Orthod.

³ PL 34, 1234.

ii, 4).¹ Now unbelief seems not to be contrary to nature; for Augustine says (De Prædest. Sanct. v)² that "to be capable of having faith, just as to be capable of having charity, is natural to all men; whereas to have faith, even as to have charity, belongs to the grace of the faithful." Therefore not to have faith, which is to be an unbeliever, is not a sin.

Obj. 2. Further, No one sins in that which he cannot avoid, since every sin is voluntary. Now it is not in a man's power to avoid unbelief, for he cannot avoid it unless he have faith, because the Apostle says ((Rom. 10. 14): How shall they believe in Him, of Whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear without a preacher? Therefore unbelief does not seem to be a sin.

Obj. 3. Further, As stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXXXIV, A. 4), there are seven capital sins, to which all sins are reduced. But unbelief does not seem to be comprised under any of them. Therefore unbelief is not a sin.

On the contrary, Vice is opposed to virtue. Now faith is a virtue, and unbelief is opposed to it. Therefore unbelief is a sin.

I answer that, Unbelief may be taken in two ways. First, by way of pure negation, so that a man be called an unbeliever merely because he has not the faith. Secondly, unbelief may be taken by way of opposition to the faith, in which sense a man refuses to hear the faith, or despises it, according to Isa. 53. 1: Who hath believed our report? It is this that realizes the notion of unbelief, and it is in this sense that unbelief is a sin.

If, however, we take it by way of pure negation, as we find it in those who have heard nothing about the faith, it bears the character, not of sin, but of punishment, because such an ignorance of Divine things is a result of the sin of our first parent. If unbelievers of this kind are damned, it is on account of other sins, which cannot be taken away without faith, but not on account of their sin of unbelief. Hence Our Lord said (John 15. 22): If I had not come, and spoken to them, they would not have sin; which Augustine expounds (Tract. lxxxix in Joann.)³ as referring to "the sin whereby they believed not in Christ."

Reply Obj. 1. To have the faith is not part of human nature, but it is part of human nature that man's mind should not go against his inner instinct, and the outward preaching of the truth. Hence, in this way, unbelief is contrary to nature.

Reply Obj. 2. This argument takes unbelief as denoting a simple negation.

Reply Obj. 3. Unbelief, in so far as it is a sin, arises from pride, through which man is unwilling to subject his intellect to the rules of faith, and to sound interpretation of the Fathers. Hence Gregory says (Moral. xxxi, 45)⁴ that "presumptuous innovations arise from vainglory."

It might also be replied that just as the theological virtues are not reduced to the cardinal virtues, but precede them, so too, the vices opposed to the theological virtues are not reduced to the capital vices.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Unbelief Is in the Intellect As Its Subject?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that unbelief is not in the intellect as its subject.

Objection 1. For every sin is in the will, according to Augustine (De Duabus Anim. x, xi.)⁵ Now unbelief is a sin, as stated above (A. 1). Therefore unbelief resides in the will and not in the intellect.

Obj. 2. Further, Unbelief is sinful through contempt of the preaching of faith. But contempt pertains to the will. Therefore unbelief is in the will.

Obj. 3. Further, A gloss on II Cor. 11. 14. Satan . . . transformeth himself into an angel of light, says that "if a wicked angel pretend to be a good angel, and be taken for a good angel, it is not a dangerous or an unhealthy error, if he does or says what is becoming to a good angel."⁶ This seems to be because of the rectitude of the will of the man who adheres to the angel, since his intention is to adhere to a good angel. Therefore the sin of unbelief seems to consist entirely in a perverse will. Consequently, it does not reside in the intellect.

On the contrary, Things which are contrary to one another are in the same subject. Now faith, to which unbelief is opposed, resides in the intellect. Therefore unbelief also is in the intellect.

I answer that, As stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXXXIV, AA. 1, 2), sin is said to be in the power which is the principle of the sinful act. Now a sinful act may have two principles. One is its first and universal principle, which commands all acts of sin; and this is the will, because every sin is voluntary. The other principle of the sinful act is the proper and proximate principle which elicits the sinful act; thus the concupiscible part is the principle of gluttony and lust, and so these sins are said to be in the concupiscible part. Now dissent, which is the act proper to unbelief, is an act of the intellect, moved, however, by the will, just as assent is. Therefore unbelief, like faith, is in the intellect as its proximate subject. But it is in the will as its first moving principle, in which way every sin is said to be in the will.

Hence the Reply to the First Objection is clear.

Reply Obj. 2. The will's contempt causes the intellect's dissent, which completes the notion of unbelief. Hence the cause of unbelief is in the will, while unbelief itself is in the intellect.

Reply Obj. 3. He that believes a wicked angel to be a good one does not dissent from a matter of faith, because "his bodily senses are deceived, while his mind does not depart from a true and right judgment," as the gloss observes (ibid.). But, according to the same authority, to adhere to Satan when he begins to invite one to his state, that is, wickedness and error, is not without sin.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Unbelief Is the Greatest of Sins?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that unbelief is not the greatest of sins.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (De Bapt. contra. Donat. iv, 20):¹ "I should hesitate to decide whether a very wicked catholic ought to be preferred to a heretic, in whose life one finds nothing reprehensible beyond the fact that he is a heretic." But a heretic is an unbeliever. Therefore we ought not to say absolutely that unbelief is the greatest of sins.

Obj. 2. Further, That which diminishes or excuses a sin, is not, it seems, the greatest of sins. Now unbelief excuses or diminishes sin, for the Apostle says (I Tim. 1. 12, 13): I . . . before was a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and contumelious; but I obtained . . . mercy . . . because I did it ignorantly in my unbelief. Therefore unbelief is not the greatest of sins.

Obj. 3. Further, The greater sin deserves the greater punishment, according to Deut. 25. 2: According to the measure of the sin shall the measure also of the stripes be. Now a greater punishment is due to believers than to unbelievers, according to Heb. 10. 29: How much more, do you think, he deserveth worse punishments, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath esteemed the blood of the testament unclean, by which he was sanctified? Therefore unbelief is not the greatest of sins.

On the contrary, Augustine, commenting on John 15. 22, If I had not come, and spoken to them, they would not have sin, says (Tract. lxxxix in Joann.):² "Under the general name, He refers to a singularly great sin. For this, namely, infidelity, is the sin to which all others may be traced." Therefore unbelief is the greatest of sins.

I answer that, Every sin consists formally in turning away from God, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXXI, A. 6; Q. LXXXIII, A. 3). Hence the more a sin severs man from God, the graver it is. Now man is most separated from God by unbelief, because he has not even true knowledge of God; and by false knowledge of God, man does not approach Him, but is severed from Him. Nor is it possible for one who has a false opinion of God to know Him in any way at all, because the object of his opinion is not God. Therefore it is clear that the sin of unbelief is greater than any sin that occurs in the perversion of morals. This does not apply to the sins that are opposed to the theological virtues, as we shall state further on (Q. XXXIV, A. 2, reply 2; XXXIX, A. 2, reply 3).

Reply Obj. 1. Nothing hinders a sin that is more grave in its genus from being less grave in respect of some circumstances. Hence Augustine hesitated to decide between a bad catholic, and a heretic not sinning otherwise, because, although the heretic's sin is more grave generically, it can be lessened by a circumstance; and, conversely, the sin of the catholic can, by some circumstance, be aggravated.

Reply Obj. 2. Unbelief includes both ignorance, as an accessory, and resistance to matters of faith, and in the latter respect it is a most grave sin. In respect, however, of this ignorance, it has a certain reason for excuse, especially when a man does not sin from malice, as was the case with the Apostle.

Reply Obj. 3. An unbeliever is more severely punished for his sin of unbelief than another sinner is for any sin whatever, if we consider the kind of sin. But in the case of another sin, for example, adultery, committed by a believer, and by an unbeliever, the believer, other things being equal, sins more gravely than the unbeliever, both on account of his knowledge of the truth through faith, and on account of the sacraments of faith with which he has been imbued, and which he insults by committing sin.

ARTICLE 4. Whether Every Act of an Unbeliever Is a Sin?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that each act of an unbeliever is a sin.

Objection 1. Because a gloss on Rom. 14. 23, All that is not of faith is sin, says: "The whole life of unbelievers is a sin."¹ Now the life of unbelievers consists of their actions. Therefore every action of an unbeliever is a sin.

Obj. 2. Further, Faith directs the intention. Now there can be no good save what comes from a right intention. Therefore, among unbelievers, no action can be good.

Obj. 3. Further, When that which precedes is corrupted, that which follows is corrupted also. Now an act of faith precedes the acts of all the virtues. Therefore, since there is no act of faith in unbelievers, they can do no good work, but sin in their every action.

On the contrary, It is said of Cornelius, while yet an unbeliever (Acts 10. 4, 31), that his alms were acceptable to God. Therefore not every action of an unbeliever is a sin, but some of his actions are good.

I answer that, As stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXXXV, AA. 2, 4) mortal sin takes away sanctifying grace, but does not wholly corrupt the good of nature. Since therefore, unbelief is a mortal sin, unbelievers are without grace indeed, yet some good of nature remains in them. Consequently it is evident that unbelievers cannot do those good works which proceed from grace, namely, meritorious works. Yet they can, to a certain extent, do those good works for which the good of nature suffices. Hence it does not follow that they sin in everything they do. But whenever they do anything out of their unbelief, then they sin. For even as one who has the faith, can commit an actual sin, venial or even mortal, which he does not refer to the end of faith, so too, an unbeliever can do a good deed in a matter which he does not refer to the end of his unbelief.

Reply Obj. 1. The words quoted must be taken to mean either that the life of unbelievers cannot be sinless, since without faith no sin is taken away, or that whatever they do out of unbelief, is a sin. Hence the same authority adds: "Because every one that lives or acts according to his unbelief, sins grievously (ibid.)."

Reply Obj. 2. Faith directs the intention with regard to the supernatural last end: but even the light of natural reason can direct the intention in respect of a connatural good.

Reply Obj. 3. Unbelief does not so wholly destroy natural reason in unbelievers but that some knowledge of the truth remains in them, which enables them to do deeds that are generically good. With regard, however, to Cornelius, it is to be observed that he was not an unbeliever; otherwise his works would not have been acceptable to God, Whom none can please without faith. Now he had implicit faith, as the truth of the Gospel was not yet made manifest. Hence Peter was sent to him to give him fuller instruction in the faith.

ARTICLE 5. Whether There Are Several Species of Unbelief?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It seems that there are not several species of unbelief.

Objection 1. For, since faith and unbelief are contrary to one another, they must be about the same thing. Now the formal object of faith is the First Truth, from which it derives its unity, although its matter contains many points of belief. Therefore the object of unbelief also is the First Truth, while the things which an unbeliever disbelieves are the matter of his unbelief. Now the specific difference depends not on material but on formal principles. Therefore there are not several species of unbelief, according to the various points which the unbeliever disbelieves.

Obj. 2. Further, It is possible to stray from the truth of faith in an infinite number of ways. If therefore the various species of unbelief correspond to the number of various errors, it would seem to follow that there is an infinite number of species of unbelief, and consequently, that we ought not to make these species the object of our consideration.

Obj. 3. Further, The same thing does not belong to different species. Now a man may be an unbeliever through erring about different points of faith. Therefore diversity of errors does not make a diversity of species of unbelief. And so there are not several species of unbelief.

On the contrary, Several species of vice are opposed to each virtue, because "good happens in one way, but evil in many ways," according to Dionysius (Div. Nom. iv)² and the Philosopher.³ Now faith is a virtue. Therefore several species of vice are opposed to it.

I answer that, As stated above (Part I-II, q. LXIV), every virtue consists in following some rule of human knowledge or operation. Now conformity to a rule happens one way in one matter, but a deviation from the rule happens in many ways, so that many vices are opposed to one virtue. The diversity of the vices that are opposed to each virtue may be considered in two ways. First, with regard to their different relations to the virtue, and in this way there are determinate species of vices contrary to a virtue. Thus to a moral virtue one vice is opposed by exceeding the virtue, and another, by falling short of the virtue. Secondly, the diversity of vices opposed to one virtue may be considered in respect of the corruption of the various conditions required for that virtue. In this way an infinite number of vices are opposed to one virtue, for example, temperance or fortitude, according to the infinite number of ways in which the various circumstances of a virtue may be corrupted, so that the rectitude of virtue is forsaken. For this reason the Pythagoreans held evil to be infinite.¹

Accordingly we must say that if unbelief be considered in relation to faith, there are several species of unbelief, determinate in number. For, since the sin of unbelief consists in resisting the faith, this may happen in two ways: either the faith is resisted before it has been accepted, and such is the unbelief of pagans or gentiles; or the Christian faith is resisted after it has been accepted, and this either in the figure, and such is the unbelief of the Jews, or in the very manifestation of truth, and such is the unbelief of heretics. Hence we may, in a general way, reckon these three as species of unbelief.

If, however, the species of unbelief be distinguished according to the various errors that occur in matters of faith, there are not determinate species of unbelief, for errors can be multiplied indefinitely, as Augustine observes (De Hæresibus).²

Reply Obj. 1. The formal aspect of a sin can be considered in two ways. First, according to the intention of the sinner, in which case the thing to which the sinner turns is the formal object of his sin, and determines the various species of that sin. Secondly, it may be considered as an evil, and in this case the good which is forsaken is the formal object of the sin, which, however, does not derive its species from this point of view; on the contrary it is a privation of a species. We must therefore reply that the object of unbelief is the First Truth considered as that which unbelief forsakes, but its formal object, considered as that to which unbelief turns, is the false opinion that it follows; and it is from this point of view that unbelief derives its various species. Hence, even as charity is one, because it adheres to the Sovereign Good, yet there are various species of vice opposed to charity, which turn away from the Sovereign Good by turning to various temporal goods, and also in respect of various inordinate relations to God; so too, faith is one virtue through adhering to the one First Truth, yet there are many species of unbelief, because unbelievers follow many false opinions.

Reply Obj. 2. This argument considers the various species of unbelief according to various points in which errors occur.

Reply Obj. 3. Since faith is one because it believes in many things in relation to one, so may unbelief, although it errs in many things, be one in so far as all those things are related to one. Yet nothing hinders one man from erring in various species of unbelief, even as one man may be subject to various vices, and to various bodily diseases.

ARTICLE 6. Whether the Unbelief of Pagans or Heathens Is Graver Than Other Kinds?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It seems that the unbelief of heathens or pagans is graver than other kinds.

Objection 1. For just as bodily disease is graver according as it endangers the health of a more important member of the body, so does sin appear to be graver, according as it is opposed to that which holds a more important place in virtue. Now that which is most important in faith, is belief in the unity of God, from which the heathens deviate by believing in many gods. Therefore their unbelief is the gravest of all.

Obj. 2. Further, Among heresies, the more detestable are those which contradict the truth of faith in more numerous and more important points. Thus the heresy of Arius, who separated the Godhead, was more detestable than that of Nestorius who severed the humanity of Christ from the Person of God the Son. Now the gentiles deny the faith in more numerous and more important points than Jews and heretics, since they do not accept the faith at all. Therefore their unbelief is the gravest.

Obj. 3. Further, Every good diminishes evil.

² Sect. 88 (PL 42, 50).

Now there is some good in the Jews, since they believe in the Old Testament as being from God, and there is some good in heretics, since they venerate the New Testament. Therefore they sin less grievously than gentiles, who receive neither Testament.

On the contrary, It is written (II Pet. 2. 21): It had been better for them not to have known the way of justice, than after they have known it, to turn back. Now the gentiles have not known the way of justice, but heretics and Jews have abandoned it after knowing it in some way. Therefore theirs is the graver sin.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 5), two things may be considered in unbelief. One of these is its relation to faith, and from this point of view, he who resists the faith after accepting it, sins more grievously against faith than he who resists it without having accepted it, just as he who fails to fulfil what he has promised, sins more grievously than if he had never promised it. In this way the unbelief of heretics, who confess their belief in the Gospel, and resist that faith by corrupting it, is a more grievous sin than that of the Jews, who have never accepted the Gospel faith. Since, however, they accepted the figure of that faith in the Old Law, which they corrupt by their false interpretations, their unbelief is a more grievous sin than that of the heathens, because the latter have not accepted the Gospel faith in any way at all.

The second thing to be considered in unbelief is the corruption of matters of faith. In this respect, since heathens err on more points than Jews, and these in more points than heretics, the unbelief of heathens is more grievous than the unbelief of the Jews, and that of the Jews than that of heretics, except perhaps in such cases as that of the Manichees, who, in matters of faith, err even more than heathens do.

Of these two gravities the first surpasses the second from the point of view of guilt, since, as stated above (A. 1) unbelief has the character of guilt, from its resisting faith, rather than from the mere absence of faith; for the latter, as was stated (A. 1) seems rather to bear the character of punishment. Hence, speaking absolutely, the unbelief of heretics is the worst.

This suffices for the Replies to the objections.

ARTICLE 7. Whether One Ought To Dispute With Unbelievers in Public?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It seems that one ought not to dispute with unbelievers in public.

Objection 1. For the Apostle says (II Tim. 2. 14): Contend not in words, for it is to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers. But it is impossible to dispute with unbelievers publicly without contending in words. Therefore one ought not to dispute publicly with unbelievers.

Obj. 2. Further, The law of Martianus Augustus¹ confirmed by the canons (De Sum. Trin. Cod. lib. i, leg. Nemo)² expresses itself thus: "It is an insult to the judgment of the most religious synod, if anyone ventures to debate or dispute in public about matters which have once been judged and disposed of." Now all matters of faith have been decided by the holy councils. Therefore it is an insult to the councils, and consequently a grave sin to presume to dispute in public about matters of faith.

Obj. 3. Further, Disputations are conducted by means of arguments. But an argument is a reason in settlement of a dubious matter. But things that are of faith, being most certain, ought not to be a matter of doubt. Therefore one ought not to dispute in public about matters of faith.

On the contrary, It is written (Acts 9. 22, 29) that Saul increased much more in strength, and confounded the Jews, and that he spoke . . . to the gentiles and disputed with the Greeks.

I answer that, In disputing about the faith, two things must be observed, one on the part of the disputant, the other on the part of his hearers. On the part of the disputant, we must consider his intention. For if he were to dispute as though he had doubts about the faith, and did not hold the truth of faith for certain, and as though he intended to probe it with arguments, without doubt he would sin, as being doubtful of the faith and an unbeliever. On the other hand, it is praiseworthy to dispute about the faith in order to confute errors, or even for practice.

On the part of the hearers we must consider whether those who hear the disputation are instructed and firm in the faith, or simple and wavering. As to those who are well instructed and firm in the faith, there can be no danger in disputing about the faith in their presence. But as to simple-minded people, we must make a distinction. For either they are provoked and molested by unbelievers, for instance Jews or heretics, or pagans, who strive to corrupt the faith in them, or else they are not subject to provocation in this matter, as in those countries where there are no unbelievers. In the first case it is necessary to dispute in public about the faith, provided there be those who are equal and adapted to the task of confuting errors, since in this way simple people are strengthened in the faith, and unbelievers are deprived of the opportunity to deceive, while if those who ought to withstand the perverters of the truth of faith were silent, this would tend to strengthen error. Hence Gregory says (Pastor. ii, 4):¹ "Even as a thoughtless speech gives rise to error, so does an indiscreet silence leave those in error who might have been instructed." On the other hand, in the second case it is dangerous to dispute in public about the faith, in the presence of simple people, whose faith for this very reason is more firm, that they have never heard anything differing from what they believe. Hence it is not expedient for them to hear what unbelievers have to say against the faith.

Reply Obj. 1. The Apostle does not entirely forbid disputations, but such as are disorderly, and consist of contentious words rather than of sound speeches.

Reply Obj. 2. That law forbade those public disputations about the faith which arise from doubting the faith, but not those which are for its safeguarding.

Reply Obj. 3. One ought to dispute about matters of faith not as though one doubted about them, but in order to make the truth known, and to confute errors. For, in order to confirm the faith, it is necessary sometimes to dispute with unbelievers, sometimes by defending the faith, according to I Pet. 3. 15: Being ready always to satisfy everyone that asketh you a reason of that hope and faith which is in you. (Vulg.,—Of that hope which is in you.) Sometimes again, it is necessary, in order to convince those who are in error, according to Tit. 1. 9: That he may be able to exhort in sound doctrine and to convince the gainsayers.

ARTICLE 8. Whether Unbelievers Ought To Be Compelled to the Faith?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It seems that unbelievers ought by no means to be compelled to the faith.

Objection 1. For it is written (Matt. 13. 28) that the servants of the householder, in whose field cockle had been sown, asked him: Wilt thou that we go and gather it up? and that he answered: No, lest perhaps gathering up the cockle, you root up the wheat also together with it; on which passage Chrysostom says (Hom. xlii in Matt.):² "Our Lord says this so as to forbid the slaying of men. For it is not right to slay heretics, because if you do you will necessarily slay many innocent persons." Therefore it seems that for the same reason unbelievers ought not to be compelled to the faith.

Obj. 2. Further, We read in the Decretals (Dist. xlv, can., De Judæis):³ "The holy synod prescribes, with regard to the Jews, that for the future, none are to be compelled to believe." Therefore, in like manner, neither should unbelievers be compelled to the faith.

Obj. 3. Further, Augustine says (Tract. xxvi in Joann.)⁴ that it is possible for a man to do other things against his will, "but he cannot believe unless he is willing." But the will cannot be compelled. Therefore it seems that unbelievers ought not to be compelled to the faith.

Obj. 4. It is said in God's person (Ezech. 18. 32): I desire not the death of the sinner (Vulg.,—of him that dieth). Now we ought to conform our will to the Divine will, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XIX, AA. 9, 10). Therefore we should not even wish unbelievers to be put to death.

On the contrary, It is written (Luke 14. 23): Go out into the highways and hedges; and compel them to come in. Now men enter into the house of God, that is, into Holy Church, by faith. Therefore some ought to be compelled to the faith.

I answer that, Among unbelievers there are some who have never received the faith, such as the heathens and the Jews, and these are by no means to be compelled to the faith, in order that they may believe, because to believe depends on the will. Nevertheless they should be compelled by the faithful, if it be possible to do so, so that they do not hinder the faith, by their blasphemies, or by their evil persuasions, or even by their open persecutions. It is for this reason that Christ's faithful often wage war with unbelievers, not indeed for the purpose of forcing them to believe, because even if they were to conquer them, and take them prisoners, they should still leave them free to believe, if they will, but in order to prevent them from hindering the faith of Christ. On the other hand, there are unbelievers who at some time have accepted the faith, and professed it, such as heretics and all apostates. Such should be submitted even to bodily compulsion, that they may fulfil what they have promised, and hold what they at one time received.

Reply Obj. 1. Some have understood the authority quoted to forbid, not the excommunication but the slaying of heretics, as appears from the words of Chrysostom. Augustine too, says

⁴ PL 35, 1607.

(Ep. ad Vincentian. xciii, 5)¹ of himself: "It was once my opinion that none should be compelled to union with Christ, that we should deal in words, and fight with arguments. However this opinion of mine is undone, not by words of contradiction, but by convincing examples. Because fear of the law was so profitable, that many say: Thanks be to the Lord Who has broken our chains asunder." Accordingly the meaning of Our Lord's words, Suffer both to grow until the harvest, must be gathered from those which precede, lest perhaps gathering up the cockle, you root up the wheat also together with it. For, as Augustine says (Contra Ep. Parmen. iii, 2)² these words show that "when this is not to be feared, that is to say, when a man's crime is so publicly known, and so hateful to all, that he has no defenders, or none such as might cause a schism, the severity of discipline should not slacken."

Reply Obj. 2. Those Jews who have in no way received the faith, ought by no means to be compelled to the faith. If, however, they have received it, they ought to be compelled to keep it, as is stated in the same chapter.

Reply Obj. 3. Just as taking a vow is a matter of will, and keeping a vow, a matter of obligation, so acceptance of the faith is a matter of the will, and keeping the faith, when once one has received it, is a matter of obligation. Therefore heretics should be compelled to keep the faith. Thus Augustine says to the Count Boniface (Ep. clxxxv).³ "What do these people mean by crying out continually: 'We may believe or not believe just as we choose. Whom did Christ compel?' They should remember that Christ at first compelled Paul and afterwards taught him."

Reply Obj. 4. As Augustine says in the same letter, "None of us wishes any heretic to perish. But the house of David did not deserve to have peace, unless his son Absalom had been killed in the war which he had raised against his father. Thus if the Catholic Church gathers together some to the perdition of others, she heals the sorrow of her maternal heart by the delivery of so many nations."⁴

ARTICLE 9. Whether it is Lawful to Communicate with Unbelievers?

We proceed thus to the Ninth Article: It would seem that it is lawful to communicate with unbelievers.

Objection 1. For the Apostle says (I Cor.

10. 27): If any of them that believe not, invite you, and you be willing to go, eat of anything that is set before you. And Chrysostom says (Hom. xxv super Epist. ad Heb.):⁵ "If you wish to go to dine with pagans, we permit it without any reservation." Now to sit at table with anyone is to communicate with him. Therefore it is lawful to communicate with unbelievers.

Obj. 2. Further, The Apostle says (I Cor. 5. 12): What have I to do to judge them that are without? Now unbelievers are without. When, therefore, the Church forbids the faithful to communicate with certain people, it seems that they ought not to be forbidden to communicate with unbelievers.

Obj. 3. Further, A master cannot employ his servant, unless he communicate with him, at least by word, since the master moves his servant by command. Now Christians can have unbelievers, either Jews, or pagans, or Saracens, for servants. Therefore they can lawfully communicate with them.

On the contrary, It is written (Deut. 7. 2, 3): Thou shalt make no league with them, nor show mercy to them; neither shalt thou make marriages with them: and a gloss on Levit. 15. 19, The woman who at the return of the month, etc., says: "It is so necessary to shun idolatry, that we should not come in touch with idolaters or their disciples, nor have any dealings with them."⁶

I answer that, Communication with a particular person is forbidden to the faithful, in two ways: first, as a punishment of the person with whom they are forbidden to communicate; secondly, for the safety of those who are forbidden to communicate with others. Both motives can be gathered from the Apostle's words (I Cor. 5. 6) For after he had pronounced sentence of excommunication, he adds as his reason Know you not that a little leaven corrupts the whole lump? and afterwards he adds the reason on the part of the punishment inflicted by the sentence of the Church when he says (verse 12): Do not you judge them that are within?

Accordingly, in the first way the Church does not forbid the faithful to communicate with unbelievers, who have not in any way received the Christian faith, namely, with pagans and Jews, because she has not the right to exercise spiritual judgment over them, but only temporal judgment, in the case when, while dwelling among Christians they are guilty of some misdemeanour, and are condemned by the faithful to some temporal punishment. But in this way, (that is, as a punishment), the Church forbids the faithful to communicate with those unbelievers who have forsaken the faith they once received, either by corrupting the faith, as heretics, or by entirely renouncing the faith, as apostates, because the Church pronounces sentence of excommunication on both.

With regard to the second way, it seems that one ought to distinguish according to the various conditions of persons, circumstances and time. For if some are firm in the faith so that it is to be hoped that their communicating with unbelievers will lead to the conversion of the latter rather than to the turning away of the faithful from the faith, these are not to be forbidden to communicate with unbelievers who have not received the faith, such as pagans or Jews, especially if there be some urgent necessity for so doing. But in the case of simple people and those who are weak in the faith, whose perversion is to be feared as a probable result, they should be forbidden to communicate with unbelievers, and especially to be on very familiar terms with them, or to communicate with them without necessity.

This suffices for the Reply to the First Objection.

Reply Obj. 2. The Church does not exercise judgment against unbelievers in the point of inflicting spiritual punishment on them, but she does exercise judgment over some of them in the matter of temporal punishment. It is under this head that sometimes the Church, for certain special sins, withdraws the faithful from communication with certain unbelievers.

Reply Obj. 3. There is more probability that a servant who is ruled by his master's commands will be converted to the faith of his master who is a believer, than if the case were the reverse, and so the faithful are not forbidden to have unbelieving servants. If, however, the master were in danger, through communicating with such a servant, he should send him away, according to Our Lord's command (Matt. 18. 8): If . . . thy foot scandalize thee, cut it off, and cast it from thee.

With regard to the argument in the contrary sense, the reply is that the Lord gave this command in reference to those nations into whose territory the Jews were about to enter. For the Jews were inclined to idolatry, so that it was to be feared lest, through frequent dealings with those nations, they should be estranged from the faith. Hence the text goes on (verse 4): For she will turn away thy son from following Me.

ARTICLE 10. Whether Unbelievers May Have Authority or Dominion over the Faithful?

We proceed thus to the Tenth Article: It seems that unbelievers may have authority or dominion over the faithful.

Objection 1. For the Apostle says (I Tim. 6. 1): Whosoever are servants under the yoke, let them count their masters worthy of all honour, and it is clear that he is speaking of unbelievers, since he adds (verse 2): But they that have believing masters, let them not despise them. Moreover it is written (I Pet. 2. 18): Servants be subject to your masters with all fear, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the forward. Now this command would not be contained in the apostolic teaching, unless unbelievers could have authority over the faithful. Therefore it seems that unbelievers can have authority over the faithful.

Obj. 2. Further, All the members of a prince's household are his subjects. Now some of the faithful were members of unbelieving princes' households, for we read in the Epistle to the Philippians (4. 22): All the saints salute you, especially they that are of Cæsar's household, referring to Nero, who was an unbeliever. Therefore unbelievers can have authority over the faithful.

Obj. 3. Further, According to the Philosopher¹ a slave is his master's instrument in human affairs, even as a craftsman's labourer is his instrument in matters concerning the working of his art. Now, in such matters, a believer can be subject to an unbeliever, for he may work on an unbeliever's farm. Therefore unbelievers may have authority over the faithful even as to dominion.

On the contrary, Those who are in authority can pronounce judgment on those over whom they are placed. But unbelievers cannot pronounce judgment on the faithful, for the Apostle says (I Cor. 6. 1): Dare any of you, having a matter against another, go to be judged before the unjust, that is, unbelievers, and not before the saints? Therefore it seems that unbelievers cannot have authority over the faithful.

I answer that, That this question may be considered in two ways. First, we may speak of dominion or authority of unbelievers over the faithful as of a thing to be established for the first time. This ought by no means to be allowed, since it would provoke scandal and endanger the faith, for subjects are easily influenced by their superiors to comply with their commands, unless the subjects are of great virtue; moreover unbelievers hold the faith in contempt, if they see the faithful fall away. Hence the Apostle forbade the faithful to go to law before an unbelieving judge. And so the Church altogether forbids unbelievers to acquire dominion over believers, or to have authority over them in any capacity whatever.

Secondly, we may speak of dominion or authority, as already in force. And here we must observe that dominion and authority are institutions of human law, while the distinction between faithful and unbelievers arises from the Divine law. Now the Divine law which is the law of grace, does not do away with human law which is the law of natural reason. Therefore the distinction between faithful and unbelievers, considered in itself, does not do away with dominion and authority of unbelievers over the faithful. Nevertheless this right of dominion or authority can be justly done away with by the sentence or ordination of the Church which has the authority of God, since unbelievers in virtue of their unbelief deserve to forfeit their power over the faithful who are converted into children of God.

This the Church does sometimes, and sometimes not. For among those unbelievers who are subject, even in temporal matters, to the Church and her members, the Church made the law that if the slave of a Jew became a Christian, he should forthwith receive his freedom, without paying any price, if he should be a vernaculus, that is, born in slavery; and likewise if, when yet an unbeliever, he had been bought for his service. If, however, he had been bought for sale, then he should be offered for sale within three months. Nor does the Church harm them in this, because since those Jews themselves are subject to the Church, she can dispose of their possessions, even as secular princes have enacted many laws to be observed by their subjects, in favour of liberty. On the other hand, the Church has not applied the above law to those unbelievers who are not subject to her or her members in temporal matters, although she has the right to do so: and this, in order to avoid scandal, for as Our Lord showed (Matt. 17. 25, 26) that He could be excused from paying the tribute, because the children are free, yet He ordered the tribute to be paid in order to avoid giving scandal. Thus Paul too, after saying that servants should honour their masters, adds, lest the name of the Lord and His doctrine be blasphemed.

This suffices for the Reply to the First Objection.

Reply Obj. 2. The authority of Cæsar preceded the distinction of faithful from unbelievers. Hence it was not cancelled by the conversion of some to the faith. Moreover it was a good thing that there should be some of the faithful in the emperor's household, that they might defend the rest of the faithful. Thus the Blessed Sebastian strengthened the hearts of Christians whom he saw faltering under torture, and, the while, remained hidden under the military cloak in the palace of Diocletian.

Reply Obj. 3. Slaves are subject to their masters for their whole lifetime, and are subject to their overseers in everything, while the craftsman's labourer is subject to him for certain special works. Hence it would be more dangerous for unbelievers to have dominion or authority over the faithful than that they should be allowed to employ them in some craft. Therefore the Church permits Christians to work on the land of Jews, because this does not entail their living together with them. Thus Solomon besought the King of Tyre to send master workmen to hew the trees as related in III Kings 5. Yet, if there be reason to fear that the faithful will be perverted by such communications and dealings, they should be absolutely forbidden.

ARTICLE 11. Whether the Rites of Unbelievers Ought To Be Tolerated?

We proceed thus to the Eleventh Article: It would seem that rites of unbelievers ought not to be tolerated.

Objection 1. For it is evident that unbelievers sin in observing their rites, and not to prevent a sin, when one can, seems to imply consent therein, as a gloss observes¹ on Rom. 1. 32: Not only they that do them, but they also that consent to them that do them. Therefore it is a sin to tolerate their rites.

Obj. 2. Further, The rites of the Jews are compared to idolatry, because a gloss on Gal. 5. 1, Be not held again under the yoke of bondage, says: "The bondage of that law was not lighter than that of idolatry."² But it would not be allowable for anyone to observe the rites of idolatry; in fact Christian princes at first caused the temples of idols to be closed, and afterwards, to be destroyed, as Augustine relates.³ Therefore it follows that even the rites of Jews ought not to be tolerated.

Obj. 3. Further, Unbelief is the greatest of sins, as stated above (A. 3). Now other sins such as adultery, theft and the like, are not tolerated, but are punishable by law. Therefore neither ought the rites of unbelievers to be tolerated.

On the contrary, Gregory says, speaking of the Jews:¹ "They should be allowed to observe all their feasts, just as hitherto they and their fathers have for ages observed them."

I answer that, Human government is derived from the Divine government, and should imitate it. Now although God is all-powerful and supremely good, nevertheless He allows certain evils to take place in the universe, which He might prevent, lest, without them, greater goods might be forfeited, or greater evils ensue. Accordingly in human government also, those who are in authority, rightly tolerate certain evils, lest certain goods be lost, or certain greater evils be incurred; thus Augustine says (De Ordine, ii, 4):² "If you do away with harlots, the world will be convulsed with lust." Hence, though unbelievers sin in their rites, they may be tolerated, either on account of some good that ensues therefrom, or because of some evil avoided. Thus from the fact that the Jews observe their rites, which, of old, foreshadowed the truth of the faith which we hold, there follows this good—that our very enemies bear witness to our faith, and that our faith is represented in a figure, so to speak. For this reason they are tolerated in the observance of their rites. On the other hand, the rites of other unbelievers, which are neither truthful nor profitable are by no means to be tolerated, except perhaps in order to avoid an evil, for instance the scandal or disturbance that might ensue, or some hindrance to the salvation of those who if they were unmolested might gradually be converted to the faith. For this reason the Church, at times, has tolerated the rites even of heretics and pagans, when unbelievers were very numerous.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

ARTICLE 12. Whether the Children of Jews and of Other Unbelievers Ought To Be Baptized Against Their Parents' Will?

We proceed thus to the Twelfth Article: It seems that the children of Jews and of other unbelievers ought to be baptized against their parents' will.

Objection 1. For the bond of marriage is stronger than the right of parental authority over children, since the right of parental authority can be made to cease when a son is set at liberty, while the marriage bond cannot be severed by man, according to Matt. 19. 6: What . . . God hath joined together let no man put asunder. And yet the marriage bond is broken on account of unbelief, for the Apostle says (I Cor. 7. 15): If the unbeliever depart, let him depart. For a brother or sister is not under servitude in such cases: and a canon says³ that if the unbelieving partner is unwilling to abide with the other without insult to their Creator, then the other partner is not bound to cohabitation. Much more, therefore, does unbelief abrogate the right of unbelieving parents' authority over their children, and consequently their children may be baptized against their parents' will.

Obj. 2. Further, One is more bound to succour a man who is in danger of everlasting death, than one who is in danger of temporal death. Now it would be a sin if one saw a man in danger of temporal death and failed to go to his aid. Since, then, the children of Jews and other unbelievers are in danger of everlasting death should they be left to their parents who would imbue them with their unbelief, it seems that they ought to be taken away from them and baptized, and instructed in the faith.

Obj. 3. Further, The children of a bondsman are themselves bondsmen, and under the power of his master. Now the Jews are bondsmen of kings and princes; therefore their children are also. Consequently kings and princes have the power to do what they will with Jewish children. Therefore no injustice is committed if they baptize them against their parents' wishes.

Obj. 4. Further, Every man belongs more to God, from Whom he has his soul, than to his carnal father, from whom he has his body. Therefore it is not unjust if Jewish children be taken away from their parents, and consecrated to God in Baptism.

Obj. 5. Further, Baptism avails for salvation more than preaching does, since Baptism removes immediately the stain of sin and the debt of punishment, and opens the gate of heaven. Now if danger ensue through not preaching, it is imputed to him who omitted to preach, according to the words of Ezech. 33. 6 about the man who sees the sword coming and sounds not the trumpet. Much more therefore, if Jewish children are lost through not being baptized are they accounted guilty of sin, who could have baptized them and did not.

On the contrary, Injustice should be done to no man. Now it would be an injustice to Jews if their children were to be baptized against their will, since they would lose the rights of parental authority over their children as soon as these were Christians. Therefore these should not be baptized against their parents' will.

I answer that, The custom of the Church has very great authority and ought to be jealously observed in all things, since the very doctrine of catholic doctors derives its authority from the Church. Hence we ought to abide by the authority of the Church rather than by that of an Augustine or a Jerome or of any doctor whatever. Now it was never the custom of the Church to baptize the children of Jews against the will of their parents, although in times past there have been many very powerful catholic princes like Constantine and Theodosius, with whom most holy bishops have been on most friendly terms, as Sylvester with Constantine, and Ambrose with Theodosius, who would certainly not have failed to obtain this favour from them if it had been at all reasonable. It seems therefore dangerous to repeat this assertion, that the children of Jews should be baptized against their parents' wishes, in contradiction to the custom of the Church observed up to this time.

There are two reasons for this custom. One is on account of the danger to faith. For children baptized before coming to the use of reason, afterwards when they come to perfect age, might easily be persuaded by their parents to renounce what they had unknowingly embraced. And this would be detrimental to the faith.

The other reason is that it is against natural justice. For a child is by nature part of its father. Thus, at first, it is not distinct from its parents as to its body, so long as it is enfolded within its mother's womb; and later on after birth, and before it has the use of its free choice, it is enfolded in the care of its parents, which is like a spiritual womb, for so long as a child does not have the use of reason, he does not differ from an irrational animal. Thus even as an ox or a horse belongs to someone who, according to the civil law, can use them when he likes, as his own instrument, so, according to the natural law, a son, before coming to the use of reason, is under his father's care. Hence it would be contrary to natural justice, if a child, before coming to the use of reason, were to be taken away from its parents' custody, or anything done to it against its parents' wish. As soon, however, as it begins to have the use of its free choice, it begins to belong to itself, and is able to look after itself, in matters concerning the Divine or the natural law; and then it should be induced, not by compulsion but by persuasion, to embrace the faith. It can then consent to the faith, and be baptized, even against its parents' wish; but not before it comes to the use of reason. Hence it is said¹ of the children of the fathers of old that they were saved in the faith of their parents; by which we are given to understand that it is the parents' duty to look after the salvation of their children, especially before they come to the use of reason.

Reply Obj. 1. In the marriage bond, both husband and wife have the use of the free choice, and each can assent to the faith without the other's consent. But this does not apply to a child before it comes to the use of reason. Yet the comparison holds good after the child has come to the use of reason, if it is willing to be converted.

Reply Obj. 2. No one should be snatched from natural death against the order of civil law; for instance, if a man were condemned by the judge to temporal death, nobody ought to rescue him by violence. Hence no one ought to break the order of the natural law, by which a child is in the custody of its father, in order to rescue it from the danger of everlasting death.

Reply Obj. 3. Jews are bondsmen of princes by civil bondage, which does not exclude the order of natural or Divine law.

Reply Obj. 4. Man is directed to God by his reason, through which he can know Him. Hence a child before coming to the use of reason, in the natural order of things, is directed to God by its parents' reason, under whose care it lies by nature. And it is for them to dispose of the child in all matters relating to God.

Reply Obj. 5. The peril that ensues from the omission of preaching threaten only those who are entrusted with the duty of preaching. Hence it had already been said (Ezech. 3. 17): I have made thee a watchman to the children (Vulg.—house) of Israel. On the other hand, to provide the sacraments of salvation for the children of unbelievers is the duty of their parents. Hence it is they whom the danger threatens, if through being deprived of the sacraments their children fail to obtain salvation.

QUESTION XI

OF HERESY

(In Four Articles)

WE must now consider heresy: under which head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether heresy is a species of unbelief? (2) Of the matter about which it is. (3) Whether heretics should be tolerated? (4) Whether those who return from heresy should be received?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Heresy Is a Species of Unbelief?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that heresy is not a species of unbelief.

Objection 1. For unbelief is in the understanding, as stated above (Q. x, A. 2). Now heresy would seem not to pertain to the understanding, but rather to the appetitive power; for Jerome says on Gal. 5, 19 and is quoted in the Decretals,¹ The works of the flesh are manifest: "Heresy is derived from a Greek word meaning choice, whereby a man makes choice of that school which he deems best." But choice is an act of the appetitive power, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XIII, A. 1). Therefore heresy is not a species of unbelief.

Obj. 2. Further, Vice takes its species chiefly from its end; hence the Philosopher says² that "he who commits adultery that he may steal, is a thief rather than an adulterer." Now the end of heresy is temporal profit, especially lordship and glory, which pertain to the vice of pride or covetousness; for Augustine says (De Util. Credendi, i)³ that "a heretic is one who either devises or follows false and new opinions, for the sake of some temporal profit, especially that he may lord and be honoured above others." Therefore heresy is a species of pride rather than of unbelief.

Obj. 3. Further, Since unbelief is in the understanding, it would seem not to pertain to the flesh. Now heresy belongs to the works of the flesh, for the Apostle says (Gal. 5, 19): The works of the flesh are manifest, which are fornication, uncleanness, and among the others, he adds, dissensions, sects, which are the same as heresies. Therefore heresy is not a species of unbelief.

On the contrary, Falsehood is contrary to truth. Now "a heretic is one who devises or follows false or new opinions." Therefore heresy is opposed to the truth, on which faith is founded; and consequently it is a species of unbelief.

I answer that, The word heresy as stated in the first objection denotes a choosing. Now choice as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XIII, A. 3) is about things directed to the end, the end being presupposed. Now, in matters of faith, the will assents to some truth, as to its proper good, as was shown above (Q. IV, A. 3). Therefore that which is the chief truth, has the character of last end, while those which are secondary truths have the character of being directed to the end.

Now, whoever believes, assents to someone's words; so that, in every form of belief, the person to whose words assent is given seems to hold the chief place and to be the end as it were; while the things comprising the assent to that person hold a secondary place. Consequently he that holds the Christian faith rightly, assents, by his will, to Christ, in those things which truly pertain to His doctrine.

Accordingly there are two ways in which a man may deviate from the rectitude of the Christian faith. First, because he is unwilling to assent to Christ Himself; and such a man has an evil will, so to say, in respect of the very end. This pertains to the species of unbelief in pagans and Jews. Secondly, because, though he intends to assent to Christ, yet he fails in his choice of those things by which he assents to Christ, because he chooses, not what Christ really taught, but the suggestions of his own mind. Therefore heresy is a species of unbelief pertaining to those who profess the Christian faith, but corrupt its dogmas.

Reply Obj. 1. Choice pertains to unbelief in the same way as the will pertains to faith, as stated above.

Reply Obj. 2. Vices take their species from their proximate end, while, from their remote end, they take their genus and cause. Thus in the case of adultery committed for the sake of theft, there is there the species of adultery taken from its proper end and object; but the ultimate end shows that the act of adultery is both the result of the theft, and is included under it, as an effect under its cause, or a species under its genus, as appears from what we have said about acts in general (Part I-II, Q. XVIII, A. 7). Therefore, as to the case in point also, the proximate end of heresy is adherence to one's own false opinion, and from this it derives its species, while its remote end reveals its cause, namely, that it arises from pride or covetousness.

Reply Obj. 3. Just as heresy is so called from its being a choosing¹ so does sect derive its name from its being a cutting off (secundo), as Isidore states (Etym. viii, 3).² And so heresy and sect are the same thing, and each pertains to the works of the flesh, not indeed by reason of the act itself of unbelief in respect of its proximate object, but by reason of its cause, which is either the desire of an undue end, in which way it arises from pride or covetousness, as stated in the second objection, or some illusion of the imagination (which is the principle of error, as the Philosopher states in the Metaphysics),³ for the imagination has a certain connection with the flesh, in so far as its act is dependent on a bodily organ.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Heresy Is Properly About Matters of Faith?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that heresy is not properly about matters of faith.

Objection 1. For just as there are heresies and sects among Christians, so were there among the Jews and Pharisees, as Isidore observes (Etym. viii, 3).⁴ Now their dissensions were not about matters of faith. Therefore heresy is not about matters of faith, as though they were its proper matter.

Obj. 2. Further, The matter of faith is the thing believed. Now heresy is not only about things, but also about words, and about interpretations of Holy Writ. For Jerome says on Gal. 5. 20⁵ that "whoever expounds the Scriptures in any sense but that of the Holy Ghost by Whom they were written, may be called a heretic, though he may not have left the Church"; and elsewhere he says⁶ that "heresies spring up from words spoken amiss." Therefore heresy is not properly about the matter of faith.

Obj. 3. Further, We find the holy doctors differing even about matters pertaining to the faith, for example Augustine⁷ and Jerome,⁸ on the question about the cessation of the legal observances. And yet this was without any heresy on their part. Therefore heresy is not properly about the matter of faith.

On the contrary, Augustine says in his book against the Manichees:⁹ "In Christ's Church, those are heretics, who hold mischievous and erroneous opinions, and when rebuked that they may think soundly and rightly, offer a stubborn resistance, and, refusing to mend their pernicious and deadly doctrines, persist in defending them." Now pernicious and deadly doctrines are none but those which are contrary to the dogmas of faith by which the just man liveth (Rom. 1. 17). Therefore heresy is about matters of faith, as about its proper matter.

I answer that, We are speaking of heresy now as denoting a corruption of the Christian faith. Now it does not imply a corruption of the Christian faith if a man has a false opinion in matters that are not of faith, for instance, in questions of geometry and so forth, which cannot belong to the faith by any means; but only when a person has a false opinion about things belonging to the faith. Now a thing may be of faith in two ways, as stated above (Part I. Q. xxxii, A. 4), in one way, directly and principally, for instance, the articles of faith; in another way, indirectly and secondarily, for example those matters, the denial of which leads to the corruption of some article of faith. And there may be heresy in either way, even as there can be faith.

Reply Obj. 1. Just as the heresies of the Jews and Pharisees were about opinions relating to Judaism or Pharisaism, so also heresies among Christians are about matters touching the Christian faith.

Reply Obj. 2. A man is said to expound Holy Writ in another sense than that required by the Holy Ghost when he so distorts the meaning of Holy Writ that it is contrary to what the Holy Ghost has revealed. Hence it is written (Ezech. 13. 6) about the false prophets: They have persisted to confirm what they have said, namely by false interpretations of Scripture. Moreover a man professes his faith by the words that he utters, since confession is an act of faith, as stated above (Q. III. A. 1). Therefore inordinate words about matters of faith may lead to corruption of the faith; and hence it is that Pope Leo says in a letter to Proterius, Bishop of Alexandria¹⁰: "The enemies of Christ's cross lie in wait for our every deed and word, so that, if we but give them the slightest pretext, they may accuse us mendaciously of agreeing with Nestorius."

Reply Obj. 3. As Augustine says (Ep. xliii),¹¹ and we find it stated in the Decretals (xxiv, qu. 3, can. Dixit Apostolus):¹ "By no means should we accuse of heresy those who, however false and perverse their opinion may be, defend it without obstinate fervour, and seek the truth with careful anxiety, ready to mend their opinion, when they have found the truth," because, namely, they do not make a choice in contradiction to the doctrine of the Church. Accordingly, certain doctors seem to have differed either in matters the holding of which in this or that way is of no consequence, so far as faith is concerned, or even in matters of faith which were not as yet defined by the Church; although if anyone were obstinately to deny them after they had been defined by the authority of the universal Church, he would be accounted a heretic. This authority resides chiefly in the Sovereign Pontiff. For we read (Decret. xxiv, qu. 1, cap. 12):² "Whenever a question of faith is in dispute, I think that all our brethren and fellow bishops ought to refer the matter to none other than Peter, as being the source of their name and honour," against whose authority neither Jerome nor Augustine nor any of the holy doctors defended their opinion. Hence Jerome (Pelagius) says to Pope Damasus:³ "This, most blessed Pope, is the faith that we have been taught in the Catholic Church. If anything therein has been incorrectly or carelessly expressed, we beg that it may be set aright by you who hold the faith and see of Peter. If however this, our profession, be approved by the judgment of your apostleship, whoever may blame me, will prove that he himself is ignorant, or malicious, or even not a catholic but a heretic."

ARTICLE 3. Whether Heretics Ought To Be Tolerated?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that heretics ought to be tolerated.

Objection 1. For the Apostle says (II Tim. 2. 24, 25): The servant of the Lord must not wrangle, . . . with modesty admonishing them that resist the truth, if peradventure God may give them repentance to know the truth, and they may recover themselves from the snares of the devil. Now if heretics are not tolerated but put to death, they lose the opportunity of repentance. Therefore it seems contrary to the Apostle's command.

Obj. 2. Further, Whatever is necessary in the Church should be tolerated. Now heresies are necessary in the Church, since the Apostle says (I Cor. 11. 19): There must be . . . heresies, that they . . . , who are reprov'd, may be manifest among you. Therefore it seems that heretics should be tolerated.

Obj. 3. Further, The Master commanded his servants (Matt. 13. 30) to suffer the cockle to grow until the harvest, that is, the end of the world, as the same text explains. Now holy men explain that the cockle denotes heretics.⁴ Therefore heretics should be tolerated.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (Tit. 3. 10, 11): A man that is a heretic, after the first and second admonition, avoid: knowing that he, that is such an one, is subverted.

I answer that, With regard to heretics two points must be observed: one, on their own side, the other, on the side of the Church. On their own side there is the sin, by which they deserve not only to be separated from the Church by excommunication, but also to be severed from the world by death. For it is a much graver matter to corrupt the faith which quickens the soul, than to forge money, which supports temporal life. Therefore if forgers of money and other evil-doers are condemned to death at once by the secular authority, much more reason is there for heretics, as soon as they are convicted of heresy, to be not only excommunicated but even put to death.

On the part of the Church, however, there is mercy which looks to the conversion of the wanderer, and therefore she condemns not at once, but after the first and second admonition, as the Apostle directs. After that, if he is yet stubborn, the Church no longer hoping for his conversion, looks to the salvation of others, by excommunicating him and separating him from the Church, and furthermore delivers him to the secular tribunal to be exterminated from the world by death. For Jerome commenting on Gal. 5. 9, A little leaven, says,⁵ and we find it in the Decretals,⁶ "Cut off the decayed flesh, expel the mangy sheep from the fold, lest the whole house, the whole paste, the whole body, the whole flock, burn, perish, rot, die. Arius was but one spark in Alexandria, but as that spark was not at once put out, the whole earth was laid waste by its flame."

Reply Obj. 1. This very modesty demands that the heretic should be admonished a first and second time; and if he be unwilling to retract he must be reckoned as already subverted, as we may gather from the words of the Apostle quoted above.

Reply Obj. 2. The profit that ensues from heresy is beside the intention of heretics, for it consists in the constancy of the faithful being put to the test as the Apostle says, and "makes us shake off our sluggishness, and search the Scriptures more carefully," as Augustine states (De Gen. cont. Manich. i.)¹ What they really intend is the corruption of the faith, which is to inflict the very greatest harm. Consequently we should consider what they directly intend, and expel them, rather than what is beside their intention, and so, tolerate them.

Reply Obj. 3. According to Decret. xxiv (qu. iii., can. Notundum),² "to be excommunicated is not to be uprooted." A man is excommunicated, as the Apostle says (1 Cor. 5. 5) that his spirit may be saved in the day of Our Lord. Yet if heretics be altogether uprooted by death, this is not contrary to Our Lord's command, which is to be understood as referring to the case when the cockle cannot be plucked up without plucking up the wheat, as we explained above (Q. X. A. 8, reply 1), when treating of unbelievers in general.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the Church Should Receive Those Who Return From Heresy?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that the Church ought in all cases to receive those who return from heresy.

Objection 1. For it is written (Jerem. 3. 1) in the person of the Lord, Thou hast prostituted thyself to many lovers; nevertheless return to Me saith the Lord. Now the sentence of the Church is God's sentence, according to Deut. 1. 17: You shall hear the little as well as the great: neither shall you respect any man's person, because it is the judgment of God. Therefore even those who are guilty of the prostitution of unbelief which is spiritual prostitution, should be received all the same.

Obj. 2. Further, Our Lord commanded Peter (Matt. 18. 22) to forgive his offending brother not only till seven times, but till seventy times seven times, which Jerome expounds as meaning that a man should be forgiven, as often as he has sinned.³ Therefore he ought to be received by the Church as often as he has sinned by falling back into heresy.

Obj. 3. Further, Heresy is a kind of unbelief. Now other unbelievers who wish to be converted are received by the Church. Therefore heretics also should be received.

On the contrary, The Decretal Ad abolendam (De Hæreticis, cap. ix)⁴ says that "those who are found to have relapsed into the error which they had already abjured, must be left to the secular tribunal." Therefore they should not be received by the Church.

I answer that, In obedience to Our Lord's institution, the Church extends her charity to all, not only to friends, but also to foes who persecute her, according to Matt. 5. 44: Love your enemies; do good to them that hate you. Now it is part of charity that we should both wish and work our neighbour's good. Again, good is twofold. One is spiritual, namely the health of the soul, which good is chiefly the object of charity, since it is this chiefly that we should wish for one another. Consequently, from this point of view, heretics who return after falling no matter how often, are admitted by the Church to Penance by which the way of salvation is opened to them.

The other good is that which charity considers secondarily, namely, temporal good, such as the life of the body, worldly possessions, good repute, ecclesiastical or secular dignity. For we are not bound by charity to wish others this good, except in relation to the eternal salvation of them and of others. Hence if the presence of one of these goods in one individual might be an obstacle to eternal salvation in many, we are not bound out of charity to wish such a good to that person, rather should we desire him to be without it, both because eternal salvation takes precedence of temporal good, and because the good of the many is to be preferred to the good of one. Now if heretics were always received on their return, in order to save their lives and other temporal goods, this might be prejudicial to the salvation of others, both because they would infect others if they relapsed again, and because, if they escaped without punishment, others would feel more assured in lapsing into heresy. For it is written (Eccles. 8. 11): For because sentence is not speedily pronounced against the evil, the children of men commit evils without any fear.

For this reason the Church not only admits to Penance those who return from heresy for the first time, but also safeguards their lives, and sometimes by dispensation, restores them to the ecclesiastical dignities which they may have had before, should their conversion appear to be sincere: we read of this as having frequently been done for the good of peace. But when they fall again, after having been received, this seems to prove them to be inconstant in faith, and therefore when they return again, they are admitted to Penance, but are not delivered from the pain of death.

Reply Obj. 1. In God's tribunal, those who return are always received, because God is a searcher of hearts, and knows those who return in sincerity. But the Church cannot imitate God in this, for she presumes that those who relapse after being once received, are not sincere in their return; hence she does not debar them from the way of salvation, but neither does she protect them from the sentence of death.

Reply Obj. 2. Our Lord was speaking to Peter of sins committed against oneself, for one should always forgive such offences and spare our brother when he repents. These words are not to be applied to sins committed against one's neighbor or against God, for "it is not left to our discretion to forgive such offences," as Jerome says on Matt. 18, 15. *If thy brother shall offend against thee.*¹ Yet even in this matter the law prescribes limits according as God's honour or our neighbour's good demands.

Reply Obj. 3. When other unbelievers who have never received the faith are converted, they do not as yet show signs of inconstancy in faith, as relapsed heretics do. Hence the comparison fails.

QUESTION XII

OF APOSTASY

(In Two Articles)

WE must now consider apostasy; about which there are two points of inquiry: (1) Whether apostasy pertains to unbelief? (2) Whether, on account of apostasy from the faith, subjects are absolved from allegiance to an apostate prince?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Apostasy Pertains to Unbelief?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that apostasy does not pertain to unbelief.

Objection 1. For that which is the origin of all sins does not seem to pertain to unbelief, since there are many sins without unbelief. Now apostasy seems to be the origin of every sin, for it is written (Ecclus. 10. 14): The beginning of the pride of man is apostasy (Douay,—to fall off) from God, and further on (verse 15):

Pride is the beginning of all sin. Therefore apostasy does not pertain to unbelief.

Obj. 2. Further, Unbelief is an act of the understanding. But apostasy seems rather to consist in some outward deed or utterance, or even in some inward act of the will, for it is written (Prov. 6. 12-14): A man that is an apostate, an unprofitable man walketh with a perverse mouth. He winketh with the eyes, presseth with the foot, speaketh with the finger. With a wicked heart he deviseth evil, and at all times he soweth discord. Moreover if anyone were to have himself circumcised, or to worship at the tomb of Mahomet, he would be deemed an apostate. Therefore apostasy does not pertain to unbelief.

Obj. 3. Further, Heresy, since it pertains to unbelief, is a determinate species of unbelief. If then, apostasy pertained to unbelief, it would follow that it is a determinate species of unbelief which does not seem to agree with what has been said (Q. x. A. 5). Therefore apostasy does not pertain to unbelief.

On the contrary, It is written (John 6. 67): Many of His disciples went back, that is, apostatized, of whom Our Lord had said previously (verse 65): There are some of you that believe not. Therefore apostasy pertains to unbelief.

I answer that, Apostasy denotes a backsliding from God. This may happen in various ways according to the different kinds of union between man and God. For, in the first place, man is united to God by faith; secondly, by having his will duly submissive in obeying His commandments; thirdly, by certain special things pertaining to supererogation such as the religious life, the clerical state, or holy Orders. Now if that which follows be removed, that which precedes, remains, but the converse does not hold. Accordingly a man may apostatize from God by withdrawing from the religious life which he had professed, or from the holy Order which he had received; and this is called apostasy from religious life or Orders. A man may also apostatize from God, by rebelling in his mind against the Divine commandments. And though man may apostatize in both the above ways, he may still remain united to God by faith. But if he give up the faith, then he seems to turn away from God altogether, and consequently, apostasy simply and absolutely is that by which a man withdraws from the faith, and is called apostasy of perfidy. In this way apostasy, absolutely so called, pertains to unbelief.

Reply Obj. 1. This objection refers to the second kind of apostasy, which denotes an act of the will in rebellion against God's commandments, an act that is to be found in every mortal sin.

Reply Obj. 2. It pertains to faith not only that the heart should believe, but also that external words and deeds should bear witness to the inward faith, for confession is an act of faith. In this way too, certain external words or deeds pertain to unbelief, in so far as they are signs of unbelief, even as a sign of health is said itself to be healthy. Now although the authority quoted may be understood as referring to every kind of apostate, yet it applies most truly to an apostate from the faith. For since faith is the first foundation of things to be hoped for, and since, without faith it is impossible to please God (Heb. 11. 6), when once faith is removed, man retains nothing that may be useful for the obtaining of eternal salvation, for which reason it is written (Prov. 6. 12): A man that is an apostate, an unprofitable man. For faith is the life of the soul, according to Rom. 1. 17: The just man liveth by faith. Therefore, just as when the life of the body is taken away, man's every member and part loses its due disposition, so, when the life of justice, which is by faith, is done away, disorder appears in all his members. First, in his mouth, through which chiefly his heart stands revealed; secondly, in his eyes; thirdly, in the instrument of movement; fourthly, in his will, which tends to evil. The result is that he sows discord, endeavouring to sever others from the faith even as he severed himself.

Reply Obj. 3. The species of a quality or form is not diversified by the fact of its being the term from which or to which of movement; on the contrary, it is the movement that takes its species from the terms. Now apostasy regards unbelief as the term to which of the movement of withdrawal from the faith. And so apostasy does not imply a special kind of unbelief, but an aggravating circumstance of unbelief, according to II Pet. 2. 21: It had been better for them not to know the truth (Vulg.,—the way of justice), than after they had known it, to turn back.

ARTICLE 2. Whether a Prince Forfeits His Dominion over His Subjects, on Account of Apostasy from the Faith, So That They No Longer Owe Him Allegiance?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that a prince does not so forfeit his dominion over his subjects, on account of apostasy from the faith, so that they no longer owe him allegiance.

Objection 1. For Ambrose says¹ that "the Emperor Julian, though an apostate, nevertheless had under him Christian soldiers, who when he said to them, 'Fall into line for the defence of the republic,' were bound to obey." Therefore subjects are not absolved from their allegiance to their prince on account of his apostasy.

Obj. 2. Further, An apostate from the faith is an unbeliever. Now we find that certain holy men served unbelieving masters; thus Joseph served Pharaoh, Daniel served Nabuchodonosor, and Mardochai served Assuerus. Therefore apostasy from the faith does not release subjects from allegiance to their sovereign.

Obj. 3. Further, Just as by apostasy from the faith, a man turns away from God, so does every sin. Consequently if, on account of apostasy from the faith, princes were to lose their right to command those of their subjects who are believers, they would equally lose it on account of other sins. But this seems to be false. Therefore we ought not to refuse allegiance to a sovereign on account of his apostatizing from the faith.

On the contrary, Gregory VII says:² "Holding to the institutions of our holy predecessors, we, by our apostolic authority, absolve from their oath those who through loyalty or through the sacred bond of an oath owe allegiance to excommunicated persons: and we absolutely forbid them to continue their allegiance to such persons, until these shall have made amends." Now apostates from the faith, like heretics, are excommunicated, according to the Decretal (Extra, De Hæreticis, cap. Ad abolendam).³ Therefore princes should not be obeyed when they have apostatized from the faith.

I answer that, As stated above (Q. X, A. 10), unbelief, in itself, is not inconsistent with dominion, since dominion is a device of the law of nations which is a human law; but the distinction between believers and unbelievers is of Divine law, which does not annul human law. Nevertheless a man who sins by unbelief may be sentenced to the loss of his right of dominion, as also, sometimes, on account of other sins.

Now it does not pertain to the Church to punish unbelief in those who have never received the faith, according to the saying of the Apostle (I Cor. 5. 12): What have I to do to judge them that are without? She can, however, pass sentence of punishment on the unbelief of those who have received the faith. And it is fitting that they should be punished by being deprived of the allegiance of their subjects, for this same allegiance might conduce to great corruption of the faith, since, as was stated above (A. 1., obj. 2), "a man that is an apostate . . . with a wicked heart deviseth evil, and . . . soweth discord," in order to sever others from the faith. Consequently, as soon as sentence of excommunication is passed on a man on account of apostasy from the faith, his subjects are ipso facto absolved from his authority and from the oath of allegiance by which they were bound to him.

Reply Obj. 1. At that time the Church was but recently instituted, and had not, as yet, the power of curbing earthly princes; and so she allowed the faithful to obey Julian the apostate in matters that were not contrary to the faith, in order to avoid incurring a yet greater danger.

Reply Obj. 2. As stated in the article, it is not a question of those unbelievers who have never received the faith.

Reply Obj. 3. Apostasy from the faith severs man from God altogether, as stated above (A. 1.), which is not the case in any other sin.

QUESTION XIII

OF THE SIN OF BLASPHEMY, IN GENERAL (In Four Articles)

WE must now consider the sin of blasphemy, which is opposed to the confession of faith; and (1) blasphemy in general, (2) that blasphemy which is called the sin against the Holy Ghost (Q. XIV).

Under the first head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether blasphemy is opposed to the confession of faith? (2) Whether blasphemy is always a mortal sin? (3) Whether blasphemy is the most grievous sin? (4) Whether blasphemy is in the damned?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Blasphemy Is Opposed to the Confession of Faith?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that blasphemy is not opposed to the confession of faith.

Objection 1. Because to blaspheme is to utter an affront or insult against the Creator. Now this pertains to ill-will against God rather than to unbelief. Therefore blasphemy is not opposed to the confession of faith.

Obj. 2. Further, On Eph. 4. 31, Let blasphemy . . . be put away from you, a gloss says,¹ that which is committed "against God or the saints." But confession of faith seems to be only about those things which pertain to God, Who is the object of faith. Therefore blasphemy is not always opposed to the confession of faith.

Obj. 3. Further. According to some,² there are three kinds of blasphemy. The first of these is when something unfitting is affirmed of God; the second is when something fitting is denied of Him; and the third, when something proper to God is ascribed to a creature, so that it seems blasphemy is not only about God, but also about His creatures. Now the object of faith is God. Therefore blasphemy is not opposed to confession of faith.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (I Tim. 1. 12, 13): I . . . before was a blasphemer and a persecutor, and afterwards, I did it ignorantly in my unbelief. Hence it seems that blasphemy pertains to unbelief.

I answer that, The word blasphemy seems to denote the disparagement of some surpassing goodness, especially that of God. Now God, as Dionysius says (Div. Nom. i),³ "is the very essence of true goodness." Hence whatever befits God, pertains to His goodness, and whatever does not befit Him, is far removed from the notion of perfect goodness which is His Essence. Consequently whoever either denies anything befitting God, or affirms anything unbefitting Him, disparages the Divine goodness. Now this may happen in two ways. In the first way it may happen merely in respect of the opinion in the intellect; in the second way this opinion is united to a certain detestation in the affections, even as, on the other hand, faith in God is perfected by love of Him. Accordingly this disparagement of the Divine goodness is either in the intellect alone, or in the affections also. If it is in thought only, it is blasphemy of the heart, while if it issues forth outwardly in speech it is blasphemy of the tongue. It is in this sense that blasphemy is opposed to confession of faith.

Reply Obj. 1. He that speaks against God, with the intention of reviling Him, disparages the Divine goodness, not only in respect of the vanity of his intellect, but also by reason of the wickedness of his will, by which he detests and strives to hinder the honour due to God, and this is perfect blasphemy.

Reply Obj. 2. Even as God is praised in His saints, in so far as praise is given to the works which God does in His saints, so does blasphemy against the saints, redound, as a consequence, against God.

Reply Obj. 3. Properly speaking, the sin of blasphemy is not in this way divided into three species, since to affirm unfitting things, or to deny fitting things of God, differ merely as affirmation and negation. For this diversity does not cause distinct species of habits, since the falsehood of affirmations and negations is made known by the same knowledge, and it is the same ignorance which errs in either way, since "negatives are proved by affirmatives," according to the Posterior Analytics.¹ Again to ascribe to creatures things that are proper to God, seems to amount to the same as affirming something unfitting of Him, since whatever is proper to God is God Himself; and to ascribe to a creature, that which is proper to God, is to assert that God is the same as a creature.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Blasphemy Is Always a Mortal Sin?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that blasphemy is not always a mortal sin.

Objection 1. Because a gloss on the words, Now lay you also all away, etc. (Coloss. 3. 8) says:² "After prohibiting greater crimes he forbids lesser sins"; and yet among the latter he includes blasphemy. Therefore blasphemy is comprised among the lesser, that is, venial, sins.

Obj. 2. Further, Every mortal sin is opposed to one of the precepts of the decalogue. But blasphemy does not seem to be contrary to any of them. Therefore blasphemy is not a mortal sin.

Obj. 3. Further, Sins committed without deliberation, are not mortal; hence first movements are not mortal sins, because they precede the deliberation of the reason, as was shown above (Part I-II, Q. LXXIV, AA. 3. 10). Now blasphemy sometimes occurs without deliberation of the reason. Therefore it is not always a mortal sin.

On the contrary, It is written (Lev. 24. 16): He that blasphemeth the name of the Lord, dying let him die. Now the punishment of death is not inflicted except for a mortal sin. Therefore blasphemy is a mortal sin.

I answer that, As stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXXII, A. 5), a mortal sin is one by which a man is severed from the first principle of spiritual life, which principle is the love of God. Therefore whatever things are contrary to charity are mortal sins in respect of their genus. Now blasphemy, as to its genus, is opposed to Divine charity, because, as stated above (A. 1), it disparages the Divine goodness, which is the object of charity. Consequently blasphemy is a mortal sin, by reason of its genus.

Reply Obj. 1. This gloss is not to be understood as meaning that all the sins which follow are mortal, but that although all those mentioned previously are more grievous sins, some of those mentioned afterwards are less grievous; and yet among the latter some more grievous sins are included.

Reply Obj. 2. Since, as stated above (A. 1), blasphemy is contrary to the confession of faith, its prohibition is reduced to the prohibition of unbelief, expressed by the words: I am the Lord thy God, etc. (Exod. 20. 1). Or else, it is forbidden by the words: Thou shalt not take the name of . . . God in vain (ibid. 7). Because he who asserts something false about God, takes His name in vain even more than he who uses the name of God in confirmation of a falsehood.

Reply Obj. 3. There are two ways in which blasphemy may occur unawares and without deliberation. In the first way, by a man failing to direct his mind to the blasphemous nature of his words, and this may happen through his being moved suddenly by passion so as to break out into words suggested by his imagination, without heeding to the meaning of those words. This is a venial sin, and is not a blasphemy properly so called. In the second way, by turning his mind to the meaning of his words, and to their blasphemous nature. In this case he is not excused from mortal sin, even as neither is he who, in a sudden movement of anger, kills one who is sitting beside him.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the Sin of Blasphemy Is the Greatest Sin?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that the sin of blasphemy is not the greatest sin.

Objection 1. For, according to Augustine (Enchirid. xii),³ "a thing is said to be evil because it does harm." Now the sin of murder, since it destroys a man's life, does more harm than the sin of blasphemy, which can do no harm to God. Therefore the sin of murder is more grievous than that of blasphemy.

Obj. 2. Further, A perjurer calls upon God to witness to a falsehood, and thus seems to assert that God is false. But not every blasphemer goes so far as to say that God is false. Therefore perjury is a more grievous sin than blasphemy.

Obj. 3. Further, On Ps. 74. 6, Lift not up your horn on high, a gloss says: "To excuse oneself for sin is the greatest sin of all."¹ Therefore blasphemy is not the greatest sin.

On the contrary, On Isa. 18. 2, To a terrible people, etc. a gloss says: "In comparison with blasphemy, every sin is slight."²

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1), blasphemy is opposed to the confession of faith, so that it contains the gravity of unbelief. And the sin is aggravated if the will's detestation is added to it, and yet more, if it breaks out into words, even as love and confession add to the praise of faith. Therefore, since, as stated above (Q. X, A. 3), unbelief is the greatest of sins in respect of its genus, it follows that blasphemy also, is a very great sin, through belonging to the same genus as unbelief and being an aggravated form of that sin.

Reply Obj. 1. If we compare murder and blasphemy as regards the objects of those sins, it is clear that blasphemy, which is a sin committed directly against God, is more grave than murder, which is a sin against one's neighbour. On the other hand, if we compare them in respect of the harm wrought by them, murder is the graver sin, for murder does more harm to ones neighbour than blasphemy does to God. Since, however, the gravity of a sin depends on the intention of the perverse will, rather than on the effect of the deed, as was shown above (Part I-II, Q. LXXIII, A. 8), it follows that, as the blasphemer intends to do harm to God's honour, absolutely speaking he sins more grievously than the murderer. Nevertheless murder takes precedence, as to punishment, among sins committed against our neighbour.

Reply Obj. 2. A gloss on the words, Let . . . blasphemy be put away from you (Eph. 4. 31) says: "Blasphemy is worse than perjury."³ The reason is that the perjurer does not say or think something false about God, as the blasphemer does, but he calls God to witness to a falsehood, not that he thinks God to be a false witness, but in the hope, as it were, that God will not testify to the matter by some evident sign.

Reply Obj. 3. To excuse oneself for sin is a circumstance that aggravates every sin, even blasphemy itself. And it is called the most grievous sin, because it makes every sin more grievous.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the Damned Blaspheme?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that the damned do not blaspheme.

Objection 1. Because some wicked men are deterred from blaspheming now, on account of the fear of future punishment. But the damned are undergoing these punishments, so that they abhor them yet more. Therefore, much more are they restrained from blaspheming.

Obj. 2. Further, Since blasphemy is a most grievous sin, it is most demeritorious. Now in the life to come there is no state of meriting or demeriting. Therefore there will be no place for blasphemy.

Obj. 3. Further, It is written (Eccles. 11. 3) that the tree, . . . in what place soever it shall fall, there shall it be: from which it is clear that, after this life, man acquires neither merit nor sin which he did not already possess in this life. Now many will be damned who were not blasphemous in this life. Neither, therefore, will they blaspheme in the life to come.

On the contrary, It is written (Apoc. 16. 9): The men were scorched with great heat, and they blasphemed the name of God. Who hath power over these plagues, and a gloss on these words says⁴ that "those who are in hell, though aware that they are deservedly punished, will nevertheless complain that God is so powerful as to torture them thus." Now this would be blasphemy in their present state, and consequently it will also be in their future state.

I answer that, As stated above (AA. 1, 3), detestation of the Divine goodness is necessary to the notion of blasphemy. Now those who are in hell retain their perverse will which is turned away from God's justice, since they love the things for which they are punished, would wish to use them if they could, and hate the punishments inflicted on them for those same sins. They regret indeed the sins which they have committed, not because they hate them, but because they are punished for them. Accordingly this detestation of the Divine justice is, in them, the interior blasphemy of the heart. And it is credible that after the resurrection they will blaspheme God with the tongue, even as the saints will praise Him with their voices.

Reply Obj. 1. In the present life men are deterred from blasphemy through fear of punishment which they think they can escape. But in hell the damned have no hope of escape, so that, in despair, they are borne towards whatever their perverse will suggests to them.

Reply Obj. 2. Merit and demerit pertain to the state of a wayfarer, and so good is meritorious in them, while evil is demeritorious. In the blessed, on the other hand, good is not meritorious but is part of their reward of Happiness. And, in like manner, in the damned, evil is not demeritorious, but is part of the punishment of damnation.

Reply Obj. 3. Whoever dies in mortal sin bears with him a will that detests the Divine justice with regard to a certain thing, and in this respect there can be blasphemy in him.

QUESTION XIV

OF BLASPHEMY AGAINST THE HOLY GHOST

(In Four Articles)

WE must now consider in particular blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, under which head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether blasphemy or the sin against the Holy Ghost is the same as the sin committed through certain malice? (2) Of the species of this sin. (3) Whether it cannot be forgiven? (4) Whether it is possible to begin by sinning against the Holy Ghost before committing other sins?

ARTICLE 1. Whether the Sin Against the Holy Ghost Is the Same as the Sin Committed Through Certain Malice?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that the sin against the Holy Ghost is not the same as the sin committed through certain malice.

Objection 1. Because the sin against the Holy Ghost is the sin of blasphemy, according to Matt. 12. 32. But not every sin committed through certain malice is a sin of blasphemy, since many other kinds of sin may be committed through certain malice. Therefore the sin against the Holy Ghost is not the same as the sin committed through certain malice.

Obj. 2. Further, The sin committed through certain malice is divided against sin committed through ignorance, and sin committed through weakness; but the sin against the Holy Ghost is divided against the sin against the Son of Man (Matt. 12. 32). Therefore the sin against the Holy Ghost is not the same as the sin committed through certain malice, since things whose opposites differ, are themselves different.

Obj. 3. Further, The sin against the Holy Ghost is itself a generic sin, having its own determinate species. But sin committed through certain malice is not a special kind of sin, but a condition or general circumstance of sin, which can affect any kind of sin at all. Therefore the sin against the Holy Ghost is not the same as the sin committed through certain malice.

On the contrary, The Master says (2 Sent., d. 43)¹ that to sin against the Holy Ghost is "to take pleasure in the malice of sin for its own sake." Now this is to sin through certain malice. Therefore it seems that the sin committed through certain malice is the same as the sin against the Holy Ghost.

I answer that, Three meanings have been given to the sin or blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. For the earlier doctors, namely Athanasius (Super Matt. 12. 32),² Hilary (Can. xii in Matt.),³ Ambrose (Super Luc. 12. 10. Whosoever speaketh a word, etc.),⁴ Jerome (Super Matt. 12),⁵ and Chrysostom (Hom. xli in Matt.),⁶ say that the sin against the Holy Ghost is literally to utter a blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, whether by Holy Spirit we understand the essential name applicable to the whole Trinity, each Person of which is a Spirit and is holy, or the personal name of one of the Persons of the Trinity. In the latter sense blasphemy against the Holy Ghost is distinct from blasphemy against the Son of Man (Matt. 12. 32), for Christ did certain things in respect of His human nature, by eating, drinking, and the like actions, while He did others in respect of His Godhead, by casting out devils, raising the dead, and the like, which things He did both by the power of His own Godhead and by the operation of the Holy Ghost of Whom He was full, according to His human nature. Now the Jews began by speaking blasphemy against the Son of Man, when they said (Matt. 11. 19) that He was a glutton, . . . a wine drinker, and a friend of publicans; but afterwards they blasphemed against the Holy Ghost, when they ascribed to the prince of devils those works which Christ did by the power of His own Divine Nature and by the operation of the Holy Ghost.

Augustine, however (De Verb. Dom., Serm. lxxi),¹ says that blasphemy or the sin against the Holy Ghost, is final impenitence, when, namely, a man perseveres in mortal sin until death, and that it is not confined to utterance by word of mouth, but extends to words in thought and deed, not to one word only, but to many. Now this word, in this sense, is said to be uttered against the Holy Ghost, because it is contrary to the remission of sins, which is the work of the Holy Ghost, Who is the love both of the Father and of the Son. Nor did Our Lord say this to the Jews, as though they had sinned against the Holy Ghost, since they were not yet guilty of final impenitence, but He warned them, lest by similar utterances they should come to sin against the Holy Ghost; and it is in this sense that we are to understand Mark 3. 29, 30, where after Our Lord had said: But he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost, etc. the Evangelist adds, because they said: He hath an unclean spirit.

But others understand it differently,² and say that the sin or blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, is a sin committed against that good which is appropriated to the Holy Ghost, because goodness is appropriated to the Holy Ghost, just as power is appropriated to the Father, and wisdom to the Son. Hence they say that when a man sins through weakness, it is a sin against the Father; that when he sins through ignorance, it is a sin against the Son; and that when he sins through certain malice, that is, through the very choosing of evil, as explained above (Part. I-II. q. lxxviii, aa. 1, 3), it is a sin against the Holy Ghost.

Now this may happen in two ways. First by reason of the very inclination of a vicious habit which we call malice, and in this way to sin through malice is not the same as to sin against the Holy Ghost. In another way it happens that, by reason of contempt, that which might have prevented the choosing of evil is rejected or removed; thus hope is removed by despair, and fear by presumption, and so on, as we shall explain further on (A. 2). Now all these things which prevent the choosing of sin are effects of the Holy Ghost in us, so that, in this sense, to sin through malice is to sin against the Holy Ghost.

Reply Obj. 1. Just as the confession of faith consists in a protestation not only of words but also of deeds, so blasphemy against the Holy Ghost can be uttered in word, thought and deed.

Reply Obj. 2. According to the third interpretation, blasphemy against the Holy Ghost is distinguished against blasphemy against the Son of Man, according as He is also the Son of God, that is, the power of God and the wisdom of God (I Cor. 1. 24). Therefore, in this sense, the sin against the Son of Man will be that which is committed through ignorance, or through weakness.

Reply Obj. 3. Sin committed through certain malice, in so far as it results from the inclination of a habit, is not a special sin, but a general condition of sin. But in so far as it results from a special contempt of an effect of the Holy Ghost in us, it has the character of a special sin. According to this interpretation the sin against the Holy Ghost is a special kind of sin, as also according to the first interpretation. But according to the second, it is not a species of sin, because final impenitence may be a circumstance of any kind of sin.

ARTICLE 2. Whether It Is Fitting To Distinguish Six Kinds of Sin against the Holy Ghost?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems unfitting to distinguish six kinds of sin against the Holy Ghost, namely, despair, presumption, impenitence, obstinacy, resisting the known truth, envy of our brother's spiritual good, which are assigned by the Master (2 Sent., d. 43).³

Objection 1. For to deny God's justice or mercy pertains to unbelief. Now, by despair, a man rejects God's mercy, and by presumption, His justice. Therefore each of these is a kind of unbelief rather than of the sin against the Holy Ghost.

Obj. 2 Further, Impenitence, it seems, looks to past sins, while obstinacy looks to future sins. Now past and future time do not diversify the species of virtues or vices, since the faith by which we believe that Christ was born, is the same as that by which those of old believed that He would be born. Therefore obstinacy and impenitence should not be reckoned as two species of the sin against the Holy Ghost.

Obj. 3. Further, Grace and truth came by Jesus Christ (John 1. 17). Therefore it seems that resistance of the known truth, and envy of a brother's spiritual good, pertain to blasphemy against the Son rather than against the Holy Ghost.

² Richard of St. Victor, De Spir. Blasphemiae (PL 196, 1187).

Obj. 4. Further, Bernard says (De Dispens. et Præcept. xi)¹ that "to refuse to obey is to resist the Holy Ghost." Moreover a gloss on Lev. 10. 16, says that a feigned repentance is a blasphemy against the Holy Ghost.² Again, schism also seems to be directly opposed to the Holy Ghost by Whom the Church is united together. Therefore it seems that the species of sins against the Holy Ghost are insufficiently enumerated.

On the contrary, Augustine (De Fide ad Petrum iii)³ says that those who despair of pardon for their sins, or who without merits presume on God's mercy, sin against the Holy Ghost, and (Enchirid. lxxxiii)⁴ that "he who dies in a state of obstinacy is guilty of the sin against the Holy Ghost," and (De Verb. Dom., Sermon. lxxi)⁵ that "impenitence is a sin against the Holy Ghost," and (De Sermon. Dom. in Monte xxii)⁶ that "to resist fraternal goodness with the brands of envy is to sin against the Holy Ghost," and in his book De unico Baptismo (De Bap. contra Donat. vi. 35)⁷ he says that "a man who spurns the truth, is either envious of his brethren to whom the truth is revealed, or ungrateful to God by Whose inspiration the Church is taught," and therefore, seemingly, sins against the Holy Ghost.

I answer that, The above species are fittingly assigned to the sin against the Holy Ghost taken in the third sense, because they are distinguished in respect of the removal or contempt of those things by which a man can be prevented from sinning through choice. These things are either on the part of God's judgment, or on the part of His gifts, or on the part of sin. For, by the consideration of the Divine judgment, where justice is accompanied with mercy, man is hindered from sinning through choice, both by hope, arising from the consideration of the mercy that pardons sins and rewards good deeds, which hope is removed by despair; and by fear, arising from the consideration of the Divine justice that punishes sins, which fear is removed by presumption, when, namely, a man presumes that he can obtain glory without merits or pardon without repentance.

God's gifts by which we are withdrawn from sin, are two: one is the acknowledgment of the truth, against which there is the resistance of the known truth, when, namely, a man resists the truth which he has acknowledged, in order to sin more freely; while the other is the assistance of inward grace, against which there is envy of a brother's spiritual good, when, namely, a man is envious not only of his brother's person, but also of the increase of Divine grace in the world.

On the part of sin, there are two things which may withdraw man from sin: one is the disorder and shamefulness of the act, the consideration of which usually arouses man to repentance for the sin he has committed; and against this there is impenitence, not as denoting permanence in sin until death, in which sense it was taken above (A. 1) (for thus it would not be a special sin, but a circumstance of sin), but as denoting the purpose of not repenting. The other thing is the smallness and brevity of the good which is sought in sin, according to Rom. 6. 21: What fruit had you therefore then in those things, of which you are now ashamed? The consideration of this usually prevents man's will from being hardened in sin; and this is removed by obstinacy, by which man hardens his purpose by clinging to sin. Of these two it is written (Jerem. 8. 6): There is none that doth penance for his sin, saying: What have I done? as regards the first; and, They are all turned to their own course, as a horse rushing to the battle, as regards the second.

Reply Obj. 1. The sins of despair and presumption consist, not in disbelieving in God's justice and mercy, but in despising them.

Reply Obj. 2. Obst. nacy and impenitence differ not only in respect of past and future time, but also in respect of certain formal aspects by reason of the diverse consideration of those things which may be considered in sin, as explained above.

Reply Obj. 3. Grace and truth were the work of Christ through the gifts of the Holy Ghost which He gave to men.

Reply Obj. 4. To refuse to obey belongs to obstinacy, while a feigned repentance belongs to impenitence, and schism to the envy of a brother's spiritual good, by which the members of the Church are united together.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the Sin against the Holy Ghost Can Be Forgiven?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that the sin against the Holy Ghost can be forgiven.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (De Verb.

⁵ Chap. 12, 13, 21 (PL 38, 455, 457, 464).

Dom. Serm. lxxi):¹ "We should despair of no man, so long as Our Lord's patience brings him back to repentance." But if any sin cannot be forgiven, it would be possible to despair of some sinners. Therefore the sin against the Holy Ghost can be forgiven.

Obj. 2. Further, No sin is forgiven except through the soul being healed by God. But "no disease is incurable to an all-powerful physician," as a gloss says² on Ps. 102. 3, Who healeth all thy diseases. Therefore the sin against the Holy Ghost can be forgiven.

Obj. 3. Further, Free choice is related to both good or evil. Now, so long as man is a wayfarer, he can fall away from any virtue, since even an angel fell from heaven, so that it is written (Job. 4. 18, 19): In His angels He found wickedness: how much more shall they that dwell in houses of clay? Therefore, in like manner, a man can return from any sin to the state of justice. Therefore the sin against the Holy Ghost can be forgiven.

On the contrary, It is written (Matt. 12. 31): He that shall speak against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, nor in the world to come; and Augustine says (De verb. Dom. i)³ that "so great is the downfall of this sin that it cannot submit to the humiliation of asking for pardon."

I answer that, According to the various interpretations of the sin against the Holy Ghost, there are various ways in which it may be said that it cannot be forgiven. For if by the sin against the Holy Ghost we understand final impenitence, it is said to be unpardonable, since it is in no way pardoned, because the mortal sin in which a man perseveres until death will not be forgiven in the life to come, since it was not remitted by repentance in this life.

According to the other two interpretations, it is said to be unpardonable, not as though it is no way forgiven, but because, considered in itself, it deserves not to be pardoned, and this in two ways. First, as regards the punishment, since he that sins through ignorance or weakness, deserves less punishment, while he that sins through certain malice, can offer no excuse in alleviation of his punishment. Likewise those who blasphemed against the Son of Man before His Godhead was revealed, could have some excuse, on account of the weakness of the flesh which they perceived in Him, and hence, they deserved less punishment; but those who blasphemed against His very Godhead, by ascribing to the devil the works of the Holy Ghost, had no excuse in diminution of their punishment. Therefore, according to Chrysostom's commentary (Hom. xlii in Matt.),⁴ the Jews are said not to be forgiven this sin, neither in this world nor in the world to come, because they were punished for it, both in the present life, through the Romans, and in the life to come, in the pains of hell. Thus also Athanasius⁵ adduces the example of their forefathers who, first of all, wrangled with Moses on account of the shortage of water and bread; and this the Lord bore with patience, because they were to be excused on account of the weakness of the flesh. But afterwards they sinned more grievously, when, by ascribing to an idol the favours bestowed by God Who had brought them out of Egypt, they blasphemed, so to speak, against the Holy Ghost, saying (Exod. 32. 4): These are thy gods, O Israel, that have brought thee out of the land of Egypt. Therefore the Lord both inflicted temporal punishment on them, since there were slain on that day about three and twenty thousand men (ibid. 28), and threatened them with punishment in the life to come, saying, (ibid. 34): I, in the day of revenge, will visit this sin . . . of theirs.

Secondly, this may be understood to refer to the guilt. Thus a disease is said to be incurable in respect of the nature of the disease, which removes whatever might be a means of cure, as when it takes away the power of nature, or causes loathing for food and medicine, although God is able to cure such a disease. So too, the sin against the Holy Ghost is said to be unpardonable, by reason of its nature, in so far as it removes those things which are a means towards the pardon of sins. This does not, however, close the way of forgiveness and healing to an all-powerful and merciful God, Who, sometimes, by a miracle, so to speak, restores spiritual health to such men.

Reply Obj. 1. We should despair of no man in this life, considering God's omnipotence and mercy. But if we consider the circumstances of sin, some are called (Eph. 2. 2) children of despair.⁶

Reply Obj. 2. This argument considers the question on the part of God's omnipotence, not on that of the circumstances of sin.

³ Chap. 22 (PL 34, 1266).

⁵ Epist., IV, Ad Serapionem (PG 26, 662).

⁶ filios diffidentiae, which the Douay version renders children of unbelief.

Reply Obj. 3. In this life free choice does indeed ever remain subject to change. Yet sometimes it rejects that by which, so far as it is concerned, it can be turned to good. Hence considered in itself this sin is unpardonable, although God can pardon it.

ARTICLE 4. Whether a Man Can Sin First of All against the Holy Ghost?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that a man cannot sin first of all against the Holy Ghost, without having previously committed other sins.

Objection 1. For the natural order requires that one should be moved to perfection from imperfection. This is evident as regards good things, according to Prov. 4. 18: The path of the just, as a shining light, goeth forwards and increases even to perfect day. Now, in evil things, the perfect is the greatest evil, as the Philosopher states.¹ Since then the sin against the Holy Ghost is the most grievous sin, it seems that man comes to commit this sin through committing lesser sins.

Obj. 2. Further, To sin against the Holy Ghost is to sin through certain malice, or through choice. Now man cannot do this until he has sinned many times; for the Philosopher says² that although a man is able to do unjust deeds, yet he cannot all at once do them as an unjust man does, that is, from choice. Therefore it seems that the sin against the Holy Ghost cannot be committed except after other sins.

Obj. 3. Further, Repentance and impenitence are about the same object. But there is no repentance, except about past sins. Therefore the same applies to impenitence which is a species of the sin against the Holy Ghost. Therefore the sin against the Holy Ghost presupposes other sins.

On the contrary, It is easy in the eyes of God on a sudden to make a poor man rich (Ecclus. 11. 23). Therefore, conversely, it is possible for a man, according to the malice of the devil who tempts him, to be led to commit the most grievous of sins which is that against the Holy Ghost.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1), in one way, to sin against the Holy Ghost is to sin through certain malice. Now one may sin through certain malice in two ways, as stated in the same place: first, through the inclination of a habit; but this is not, properly speaking, to sin against the Holy Ghost, nor does a man come to commit this sin all at once, in as much as sinful acts must precede so as to cause the habit that induces to sin. Secondly, one may sin through certain malice, by contemptuously rejecting the things by which a man is withdrawn from sin. This is, properly speaking, to sin against the Holy Ghost, as stated above (A. 1); and this also, for the most part, presupposes other sins, for it is written (Prov. 18. 3) that the wicked man, when he is come into the depth of sins, contemneth.

Nevertheless it is possible for a man, in his first sinful act, to sin against the Holy Ghost by contempt, both on account of his free choice, and on account of the many previous dispositions, or again, through being vehemently moved to evil, while but feebly attached to good. Hence never or scarcely ever does it happen that the perfect sin all at once against the Holy Ghost. Hence Origen says (Peri Archon, i, 3):³ "I do not think that anyone who stands on the highest step of perfection, can fail or fall suddenly; this can only happen by degrees and bit by bit."

The same applies, if the sin against the Holy Ghost be taken literally for blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. For such blasphemy as Our Lord speaks of always proceeds from contemptuous malice.

If, however, with Augustine we understand the sin against the Holy Ghost to denote final impenitence, it does not regard the question in point, because this sin against the Holy Ghost requires persistence in sin until the end of life.

Reply Obj. 1. Movement both in good and in evil is made, for the most part, from imperfect to perfect, according as man progresses in good or evil. And yet in both cases, one man can begin from a greater (good or evil) than another man does. Consequently, that from which a man begins can be perfect in good or evil according to its genus, although it may be imperfect as regards the series of good or evil actions by which a man progresses in good or evil.

Reply Obj. 2. This argument considers the sin which is committed through certain malice, when it proceeds from the inclination of a habit.

Reply Obj. 3. If by impenitence we understand with Augustine persistence in sin until the end, it is clear that it presupposes sin, just as repentance does. If, however, we take it for habitual impenitence, in which sense it is a sin against the Holy Ghost, it is evident that it can precede sin, for it is possible for a man who has never sinned to have the purpose either of re-pening or of not repenting, if he should happen to sin.

QUESTION XV

OF THE VICIES OPPOSED TO KNOWLEDGE AND UNDERSTANDING (In Three Articles)

WE must now consider the vices opposed to knowledge and understanding. Since, however, we have treated of ignorance which is opposed to knowledge, when we were discussing the causes of sins (Part I-II, Q. LXXVI), we must now inquire about blindness of mind and dulness of sense, which are opposed to the gift of understanding; and under this head there are three points of inquiry: (1) Whether blindness of mind is a sin? (2) Whether dulness of sense is a sin distinct from blindness of mind? (3) Whether these vices arise from sins of the flesh?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Blindness of Mind Is a Sin?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that blindness of mind is not a sin.

Objection 1. Because, it seems that that which excuses from sin is not itself a sin. Now blindness of mind excuses from sin; for it is written (John 9. 41): If you were blind, you should not have sin. Therefore blindness of mind is not a sin.

Obj. 2. Further, Punishment differs from guilt. But blindness of mind is a punishment, as appears from Isa. 6. 10, Blind the heart of this people, for, since it is an evil, it could not be from God, were it not a punishment. Therefore blindness of mind is not a sin.

Obj. 3. Further, Every sin is voluntary, according to Augustine (De Vera Relig. xiv).¹ Now blindness of mind is not voluntary, since, as Augustine says,² "all love to know the resplendent truth," and as we read in Eccles. 11. 7, the light is sweet and it is delightful for the eyes to see the sun. Therefore blindness of mind is not a sin.

On the contrary, Gregory (Moral. xxxi, 45)³ puts blindness of mind among the vices arising from lust.

I answer that, Just as bodily blindness is the privation of the principle of bodily sight, so blindness of mind is the privation of the principle of mental or intellectual sight. Now this has a threefold principle. One is the light of natural reason, which light, since it pertains to the species of the rational soul, is never forfeit from the soul, and yet, at times, it is prevented from exercising its proper act, through being hindered by the lower powers, which the human intellect needs in order to understand; for instance in the case of imbeciles and madmen, as stated in the First Part (Q. LXXXIV, AA. 7, 8).

Another principle of intellectual sight is a certain habitual light superadded to the natural light of reason, which light is sometimes forfeit from the soul. This privation is blindness, and is a punishment, in so far as the privation of the light of grace is a punishment. Hence it is written concerning some (Wisdom 2. 21): Their own malice blinded them.

A third principle of intellectual sight is an intelligible principle, through which a man understands other things, to which principle a man may attend or not attend. That he does not attend to it happens in two ways. Sometimes it is due to the fact that a man's will is deliberately turned away from the consideration of that principle, according to Ps. 35. 5, He would not understand, that he might do well. Sometimes it is due to the mind being more busy about things which it loves more, so as to be hindered thus from considering this principle, according to Ps. 57. 9, Fire, that is of concupiscence, hath fallen on them and they shall not see the sun. In either of these ways blindness of mind is a sin.

Reply Obj. 1. The blindness that excuses from sin is that which arises from the natural defect of one who cannot see.

Reply Obj. 2. This argument considers the second kind of blindness which is a punishment.

Reply Obj. 3. To understand the truth is, in itself, something loved by all; and yet, accidentally it may be hateful to someone, in so far as a man is hindered thereby from having what he loves yet more.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Dulness of Sense Is a Sin Distinct from Blindness of Mind?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that dulness of sense is not a distinct sin from blindness of the mind.

Objection 1. Because one thing has one contrary. Now dulness is opposed to the gift of understanding, according to Gregory (Moral. ii, 49);⁴ and so is blindness of mind, since understanding denotes a principle of sight. Therefore dulness of sense is the same as blindness of mind.

Obj. 2. Further, Gregory (Moral. xxxi, 45)¹ in speaking of dulness describes it as "dulness of sense in respect of understanding." Now dulness of sense in respect of understanding seems to be the same as a defect in understanding, which pertains to blindness of mind. Therefore dulness of sense is the same as blindness of mind.

Obj. 3. Further, If they differ at all, it seems to be chiefly in the fact that blindness of mind is voluntary, as stated above (A. 1), while dulness of sense is a natural defect. But a natural defect is not a sin, so that, accordingly, dulness of sense would not be a sin, which is contrary to what Gregory says (loc. cit.), where he reckons it among the sins arising from gluttony.

On the contrary, Different causes produce different effects. Now Gregory says (Moral. xxxi, ibid) that "dulness of sense arises from gluttony, and that blindness of mind arises from lust." Now these others are different vices. Therefore those are different vices also.

I answer that, Dull. is opposed to sharp: and a thing is said to be sharp because it can pierce, so that a thing is called dull through being obtuse and unable to pierce. Now a bodily sense, by a kind of likeness, is said to pierce the medium, in so far as it perceives its object from a distance, or is able by penetration as it were to perceive the smallest details or the inmost parts of a thing. Hence in corporeal things the senses are said to be acute when they can perceive a sensible object from afar, by sight, hearing, or scent, while on the other hand they are said to be dull, through being unable to perceive, except sensible objects that are near at hand, or of great power.

Now, by way of likeness to bodily sense, we speak of sense in connection with the intellect; and this latter sense is in respect of certain primals and extremes, as stated in the Ethics,² even as the senses are cognizant of sensible objects as of certain principles of knowledge. Now this sense which is connected with understanding, does not perceive its object through a medium of corporeal distance, but through certain other media, as, for instance, when it perceives a thing's essence through a property and a cause through its effect. Consequently a man is said to have an acute sense in connection with his understanding, if, as soon as he apprehends a property or effect of a thing, he understands the nature of the thing itself, and if he attains to the consideration of its slightest details. But a man is said to have a dull sense in connection with his understanding, if he cannot arrive at knowing the truth about a thing, without many explanations; in which case, moreover, he is unable to reach to a perfect consideration of everything pertaining to the nature of that thing.

Accordingly dulness of sense in connection with understanding denotes a certain weakness of the mind as to the consideration of spiritual goods, while blindness of mind implies the complete privation of the knowledge of such things. Both are opposed to the gift of understanding, by which a man knows spiritual goods by apprehending them, and has a subtle penetration of their inmost nature. This dulness has the character of sin, just as blindness of mind has, that is, in so far as it is voluntary, as evidenced in one who, owing to his affection for carnal things, dislikes or neglects the careful consideration of spiritual things.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Blindness of Mind and Dulness of Sense Arise From Sins of the Flesh?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that blindness of mind and dulness of sense do not arise from sins of the flesh.

Objection 1. For Augustine (Retract. i, 4)³ retracts what he had said in his Soliloquies (i, 1),⁴ "God Who didst wish none but the clean to know the truth," and says that one might reply that "many, even those who are unclean, know many truths." Now men become unclean chiefly by sins of the flesh. Therefore blindness of mind and dulness of sense are not caused by sins of the flesh.

Obj. 2. Further, Blindness of mind and dulness of sense are defects in connection with the intellective part of the soul, but carnal sins pertain to the corruption of the flesh. But the flesh does not act on the soul, but rather the reverse. Therefore the sins of the flesh do not cause blindness of mind and dulness of sense.

Obj. 3. Further, All things are more acted upon by what is near them than to what is remote. Now spiritual vices are nearer the mind than carnal vices are. Therefore blindness of mind and dulness of sense are caused by spiritual rather than by carnal vices.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Moral. xxxi, 45)⁵ that "dulness of sense arises from gluttony, and blindness of mind from lust."

I answer that, The perfect intellectual operation in man consists in an abstraction from sensible phantasms, and therefore the more a man's intellect is freed from those phantasms, the more thoroughly will it be able to consider things intelligible, and to set in order all things sensible. Thus Anaxagoras stated that the intellect requires to be detached in order to command, and that the agent must have power over matter, in order to be able to move it as the Philosopher relates.¹ Now it is evident that pleasure fixes a man's attention on that which he takes pleasure in; and so the Philosopher says² that we all do best that which we take pleasure in doing, while as to other things, we do them either not at all, or in a faint-hearted fashion.

Now carnal vices, namely gluttony and lust, are concerned with pleasures of touch in matters of food and sex; and these are the most impetuous of all pleasures of the body. For this reason these vices cause man's attention to be very firmly fixed on corporeal things, so that in consequence man's operation in regard to intelligible things is weakened, more, however, by lust than by gluttony, in so far as sexual pleasures are more vehement than those of the table. Therefore lust gives rise to blindness of mind, which excludes almost entirely the knowledge of spiritual things, while dulness of sense arises from gluttony, which makes a man weak in regard to the same intelligible things. On the other hand, the contrary virtues, namely abstinence and chastity, dispose man very much to the perfection of intellectual operation. Hence it is written (Dan. 1. 17) that to these children on account of their abstinence and continency, God gave knowledge and understanding in every book, and wisdom.

Reply Obj. 1. Although some who are the slaves of carnal vices are at times capable of subtle considerations about intelligible things, on account of the perfection of their natural genius, or of some superadded habit, nevertheless, on account of the pleasures of the body, it must happen that their attention is frequently withdrawn from this subtle contemplation. Therefore the unclean can know some truths, but their uncleanness is a clog on their knowledge.

Reply Obj. 2. The flesh acts on the intellectual part not by altering it, but by impeding its operation in the above mentioned manner.

Reply Obj. 3. It is owing to the fact that the carnal vices are further removed from the mind, that they distract the mind's attention to more remote things, so that they hinder the mind's contemplation all the more.

QUESTION XVI

OF THE PRECEPTS OF FAITH, KNOWLEDGE, AND UNDERSTANDING (In Two Articles)

We must now consider the precepts pertaining to the above, and under this head there are two points of inquiry: (1) The precepts concerning faith: (2) The precepts concerning the gifts of knowledge and understanding.

ARTICLE 1. Whether in the Old Law There Should Have Been Given Precepts of Faith?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that, in the Old Law there should have been given precepts of faith.

Objection 1. Because a precept is about something due and necessary. Now it is most necessary for man that he should believe, according to Heb. 11. 6, Without faith it is impossible to please God. Therefore there was very great need for precepts of faith to be given.

Obj. 2. Further, The New Testament is contained in the Old, as the reality in the figure, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. CVII, A. 3). Now the New Testament contains explicit precepts of faith, for instance John 14. 1: You believe in God; believe also in Me. Therefore it seems that some precepts of faith ought to have been given in the Old Law also.

Obj. 3. Further, To prescribe the act of a virtue comes to the same as to forbid the opposite vices. Now the Old Law contained many precepts forbidding unbelief: thus (Exod. 20. 3): Thou shalt not have strange gods before Me, and (Deut. 13. 1-3) they were forbidden to hear the words of the prophet or dreamer who might wish to turn them away from their faith in God. Therefore precepts of faith should have been given in the Old Law also.

Obj. 4. Further, Confession is an act of faith, as stated above (Q. III, A. 1). Now the Old Law contained precepts about the confession and the promulgation of faith: for they were commanded (Exod. 12. 27) that, when their children should ask them, they should tell them the meaning of the paschal observance, and (Deut. 13. 9) they were commanded to slay anyone who disseminated doctrine contrary to faith. Therefore the Old Law should have contained precepts of faith.

Obj. 5. Further, All the books of the Old Testament are contained in the Old Law; therefore

Our Lord said (John 15. 25) that it was written in the Law: They have hated Me without cause, although this is found written in Ps. 34. and 68. Now it is written (Ecclus. 2. 8): Ye that fear the Lord, believe Him. Therefore the Old Law should have contained precepts of faith.

On the contrary, The Apostle (Rom. 3. 27) calls the Old Law the law of works which he contrasts with the law of faith. Therefore the Old Law ought not have contained precepts of faith.

I answer that, A master does not impose laws on others than his subjects, and therefore the precepts of a law presuppose that everyone who receives the law is subject to the giver of the law. Now the primary subjection of man to God is by faith, according to Heb. 11. 6: He that cometh to God, must believe that He is. Hence faith is presupposed to the precepts of the Law. For this reason (Exod. 20. 2) that which is of faith is set down before the legal precepts, in the words I am the Lord thy God, Who brought thee out of the land of Egypt, and, likewise (Deut. 6. 4), the words, Hear, O Israel, the Lord thy (Vulg.,—our) God is one, precede the recording of the precepts.

Since, however, faith contains many things subordinate to the faith by which we believe that God is, which is the first and chief of all articles of faith, as stated above (Q. 1. A. 7), it follows that, if we presuppose faith in God, by which man's mind is subjected to Him, it is possible for precepts to be given about other articles of faith. Thus Augustine expounding the words: This is My commandment (John 15. 12) says (Tract. lxxxiii in Joann.)¹ that "we have received many precepts of faith." In the Old Law, however, the secret things of faith were not to be set before the people, and thus, presupposing their faith in one God, no other precepts of faith were given in the Old Law.

Reply Obj. 1. Faith is necessary as being the principle of spiritual life, and therefore it is presupposed before the receiving of the Law.

Reply Obj. 2. Even then Our Lord both presupposed something of faith, namely belief in one God, when He said: You believe in God, and commanded something, namely, belief in the Incarnation, by which one Person is God and man. This explanation of faith pertains to the faith of the New Testament. And therefore He added: Believe also in Me.

Reply Obj. 3. The prohibitive precepts concern sins, which corrupt virtue. Now virtue is corrupted by any particular defect, as stated above (Q. x. A. 5). Therefore faith in one God being presupposed, prohibitive precepts had to be given in the Old Law, so that men might be warned of those particular defects by which their faith might be corrupted.

Reply Obj. 4. Confession of faith and its teaching also presuppose man's submission to God by faith, so that the Old Law could contain precepts relating to the confession and teaching of faith, rather than to faith itself.

Reply Obj. 5. In this passage, again, that faith is presupposed by which we believe that God is; hence it begins, Ye that fear the Lord, which is not possible without faith. The words which follow,—believe Him, must be referred to certain special articles of faith, chiefly to those things which God promises to them that obey Him, and so the passage concludes,—and your reward shall not be made void.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the Precepts Referring to Knowledge and Understanding Were Fittingly Set Down in the Old Law?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that the precepts referring to knowledge and understanding were unfittingly set down in the Old Law.

Objection 1. For knowledge and understanding pertain to cognition. Now cognition precedes and directs action. Therefore the precepts referring to knowledge and understanding should precede the precepts of the Law referring to action. Since, then, the first precepts of the Law are those of the decalogue, it seems that precepts of knowledge and understanding should have been given a place among the precepts of the decalogue.

Obj. 2. Further, Learning precedes teaching. for a man must learn from another before he teaches another. Now the Old Law contains precepts about teaching,—both affirmative precepts, as, for example (Deut. 4. 9), Thou shalt teach them to thy sons, and to thy grandsons,—and prohibitive precepts, as, for instance (Deut. 4. 2), You shall not add to the word that I speak to you, neither shall you take away from it. Therefore it seems that man ought to have been given also some precepts directing him to learn.

Obj. 3. Further, Knowledge and understanding seem more necessary to a priest than to a king, and so it is written (Malach. 2. 7): The lips of the priest shall keep knowledge, and they shall seek the law at his mouth, and (Osee 4. 6): Because thou hast rejected knowledge, I will reject thee, that thou shalt not do the office of priesthood to Me. Now the king is commanded to learn knowledge of the Law (Deut. 17. 18, 19). Much more, therefore, should the Law have commanded the priests to learn the Law.

Obj. 4 Further, It is not possible while asleep to meditate on things pertaining to knowledge and understanding; and also it is hindered by extraneous occupations. Therefore it is unfittingly commanded (Deut. 6. 7): Thou shalt meditate upon them sitting in thy house, and walking on thy journey, sleeping and rising. Therefore the precepts relating to knowledge and understanding are unfittingly set down in the Law.

On the contrary. It is written (Deut. 4. 6): That, hearing all these precepts, they may say, Behold a wise and understanding people.

I answer that, Three things may be considered in relation to knowledge and understanding: first, their reception; secondly, their use; and thirdly, their preservation. Now the reception of knowledge or understanding is by means of teaching and learning, and both are prescribed in the Law. For it is written (Deut. 6. 6). These words which I command thee . . . , shall be in thy heart. This pertains to learning, since it is the duty of a disciple to apply his mind to what is said, while the words that follow,—and thou shalt tell them to thy children, refer to teaching.

The use of knowledge and understanding is the meditation on those things which one knows or understands. In reference to this, the text goes on,—thou shalt meditate upon them sitting in thy house, etc.

Their preservation is effected by the memory, and, as regards this, the text continues,—and thou shalt bind them as a sign on thy hand, and they shall be and shall move between thy eyes. And thou shalt write them in the entry, and on the doors of thy house. Thus the continual remembrance of God's commandments is signified, since it is impossible for us to forget those things which are continually attracting the notice of our senses, whether by touch, as those things we hold in our hands, or by sight, as those things which are ever before our eyes, or to which we are continually returning, for instance, to the house door. Moreover it is clearly stated (Deut. 4. 9): Forget not the words that thy eyes have seen and let them not go out of thy heart all the days of thy life. We read of these things also being commanded more notably in the New Testament, both in the teaching of the Gospel and in that of the apostles.

Reply Obj. 1. According to Deut. 4. 6, this is your wisdom and understanding in the sight of the nations. By this we are given to understand that the wisdom and understanding of those who believe in God consist in the precepts of the Law. Therefore the precepts of the Law had to be given first, and afterwards men had to be led to know and understand them, and so it was not fitting that the precepts referred to above should be placed among the precepts of the decalogue which take the first place.

Reply Obj. 2. There are also in the Law precepts relating to learning, as stated above. Nevertheless teaching was commanded more expressly than learning, because it concerned the learned, who were not under any other authority, but were immediately under the law, and to them the precepts of the Law were given. On the other hand learning concerned the people of lower degree, and these the precepts of the Law have to reach through the learned.

Reply Obj. 3. Knowledge of the Law is so closely bound up with the priestly office that being charged with the office implies being charged to know the Law. Hence there was no need for special precepts to be given about the training of the priests. On the other hand, the doctrine of God's law is not so bound up with the kingly office, because a king is placed over his people in temporal matters. Hence it is especially commanded that the king should be instructed by the priests about things pertaining to the law of God.

Reply Obj. 4. That precept of the Law does not mean that man should meditate on God's law by sleeping, but during sleep, that is, that he should meditate on the law of God when he is preparing to sleep, because this leads to his having better phantasms while asleep, in so far as our movements pass from the state of vigil to the state of sleep, as the Philosopher explains.¹ In like manner we are commanded to meditate on the Law in every action of ours, not that we are bound to be always actually thinking about the Law, but that we should regulate all our actions according to it.

QUESTION XVII

OF HOPE

(In Eight Articles)

AFTER treating of faith, we must consider hope, and (1) hope itself; (2) the gift of fear (Q.

xix); (3) the contrary vices (Q. xx); (4) the corresponding precepts (Q. xxii). The first of these points gives rise to a twofold consideration (1) Hope, considered in itself: (2) Its subject (Q. xviii).

Under the first head there are eight points of inquiry: (1) Whether hope is a virtue? (2) Whether its object is eternal happiness? (3) Whether, by virtue of hope, one man may hope for another's happiness? (4) Whether a man may lawfully hope in man? (5) Whether hope is a theological virtue? (6) Of its distinction from the other theological virtues: (7) Of its relation to faith: (8) Of its relation to charity.

ARTICLE 1. Whether Hope Is a Virtue?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that hope is not a virtue.

Objection 1. For "no man makes ill use of a virtue," as Augustine states (De Lib. Arb. ii).¹ But one may make ill use of hope, since the passion of hope, like the other passions, is subject to a mean and extremes. Therefore hope is not a virtue.

Obj. 2. Further, No virtue results from merits, since "God works virtue in us without us," as Augustine states (De Grat. et Lib. Arb. xvii).² But hope is caused by grace and merits, according to the Master (3 Sent., d. 26).³ Therefore hope is not a virtue.

Obj. 3. Further, "Virtue is the disposition of a perfect thing."⁴ But hope is the disposition of an imperfect thing, of one, namely, that lacks what it hopes to have. Therefore hope is not a virtue.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Moral. i, 27)⁵ that the three daughters of Job signify these three virtues, faith, hope and charity. Therefore hope is a virtue.

I answer that, According to the Philosopher,⁶ "virtue in each thing is that which makes its subject good, and its work good likewise." Consequently wherever we find a good human act, it must correspond to some human virtue. Now in all things measured and ruled, the good is that which attains its proper rule; thus we say that a coat is good if it neither exceeds nor falls short of its proper measurement. But, as we stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXXI, A. 6), human acts have a twofold measure; one is proximate and homogeneous, namely, the reason, while the other is supreme and excelling, namely, God. Therefore every human act is good which attains reason or God Himself. Now the act of hope, of which we speak now, attains God. For, as we have already stated (Part I-II, Q. XL, A. 1), when we were treating of the passion of hope, the object of hope is a future good, difficult but possible to obtain. Now a thing is possible to us in two ways: first, by ourselves, secondly, by means of others, as stated in the Ethics.⁷ Therefore, in so far as we hope for anything as being possible to us by means of the Divine assistance, our hope attains God Himself, on Whose help it leans. It is therefore evident that hope is a virtue, since it causes a human act to be good and to attain its due rule.

Reply Obj. 1. In the passions, the mean of virtue depends on right reason being attained, and in this also consists the notion of virtue. Therefore in hope too, the good of virtue depends on a man's attaining, by hoping, the due rule, namely, God. Consequently man cannot make ill use of hope which attains God, as neither can he make ill use of moral virtue which attains the reason, because to attain thus is to make good use of virtue. Nevertheless, the hope of which we speak now, is not a passion but a habit of the mind, as we shall show further on (Q. XVIII, A. 1).

Reply Obj. 2. Hope is said to arise from merits, as regards the thing hoped for, in so far as we hope to obtain happiness by means of grace and merits; or as regards the act of formed hope. The habit itself of hope, by which we hope to obtain Happiness, does not flow from our merits, but from grace alone.

Reply Obj. 3. He who hopes is indeed imperfect in relation to that which he hopes to obtain, but has not as yet; yet he is perfect in so far as he already attains his proper rule, namely God, on Whose help he leans.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Eternal Happiness Is the Proper Object of Hope?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that eternal happiness is not the proper object of hope.

Objection 1. For a man does not hope for that which surpasses every movement of his soul, since hope itself is a movement of the soul. Now eternal happiness surpasses every movement of the human soul, for the Apostle says (I Cor. 2. 9) that it hath not entered into the heart of man. Therefore happiness is not the proper object of hope.

³ Chap. 1 (QR 1, 670).

⁵ PL 75, 544. ⁶ Ethics, II, 6 (1106^a 15).

Obj. 2. Further, Prayer is an expression of hope, for it is written (Ps. 36. 5): Commit thy way to the Lord, and trust in Him, and He will do it. Now it is lawful for man to pray God not only for eternal happiness, but also for the goods, both temporal and spiritual, of the present life, and, as evidenced by the Lord's prayer, to be delivered from evils which will no longer be in eternal happiness. Therefore eternal happiness is not the proper object of hope.

Obj. 3. Further, The object of hope is something difficult. Now many things besides eternal happiness are difficult to man. Therefore eternal happiness is not the proper object of hope.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (Heb. 6. 19) that we have hope which entereth in, that is, maketh us to enter, . . . within the veil, that is, into the happiness of heaven, according to the interpretation of a gloss on these words.¹ Therefore the object of hope is eternal happiness.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1), the hope of which we speak now, attains God by leaning on His help in order to obtain the hoped for good. Now an effect must be proportionate to its cause. Therefore the good which we ought to hope for from God properly and chiefly, is the infinite good, which is proportionate to the power of our divine helper, since it is proper to an infinite power to lead anyone to an infinite good. Such a good is eternal life, which consists in the enjoyment of God Himself. For we should hope from Him for nothing less than Himself, since His goodness, by which he imparts good things to His creature, is no less than His Essence. Therefore the proper and principal object of hope is eternal happiness.

Reply Obj. 1. Eternal happiness does not enter into the heart of man perfectly, that is so that it be possible for a wayfarer to know its nature and quality; yet, under the common notion, that of the perfect good, it is possible for it to be apprehended by a man, and it is in this way that the movement of hope towards it arises. Hence the Apostle says pointedly (Heb. 6. 19) that hope enters in, even within the veil, because that which we hope for is as yet veiled so to speak.

Reply Obj. 2. We ought not to pray God for any other goods except in reference to eternal happiness. Hence hope looks to eternal happiness chiefly, and other things, for which we pray God, it looks to secondarily and as referred to eternal happiness: just as faith looks to God principally, and, secondarily, those things which are referred to God, as stated above (Q. 1, A. 1).

Reply Obj. 3. To him that longs for something great, all lesser things seem small; therefore to him that hopes for eternal happiness, nothing else appears arduous, as compared with that hope; although, as compared with the capability of the man who hopes, other things besides may be arduous to him, so that he may have hope for such things in reference to its principal object.

ARTICLE 3. Whether One Man May Hope for Another's Eternal Happiness?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that one may hope for another's eternal happiness.

Objection 1. For the Apostle says (Philip. 1. 6): Being confident of this very thing, that He Who hath begun a good work in you, will perfect it unto the day of Jesus Christ. Now the perfection of that day will be eternal happiness. Therefore one man may hope for another's eternal happiness.

Obj. 2. Further, Whatever we ask of God, we hope to obtain from Him. But we ask God to bring others to eternal happiness, according to James 5. 16: Pray for one another that you may be saved. Therefore we can hope for another's eternal happiness.

Obj. 3. Further, Hope and despair are about the same object. Now it is possible to despair of another's eternal happiness, since otherwise Augustine would have no reason for saying that "we should not despair of anyone so long as he lives" (Serm. LXXI. 13).² Therefore one can also hope for another's eternal salvation.

On the contrary, Augustine says (Enchirid. viii)³ that "hope is only of such things as belong to him who is supposed to hope for them."

I answer that, We can hope for something in two ways: first, absolutely, and thus the object of hope is always something arduous and pertaining to the person who hopes. Secondly, we can hope for something through something else being presupposed, and in this way its object can be something pertaining to someone else. In order to explain this we must observe that love and hope differ in this, that love denotes union between lover and beloved, while hope denotes a movement or a stretching forth of the appetite towards an arduous good. Now union is of things that are distinct, and therefore love can directly regard the other, whom a man unites to himself by love, looking upon him as his other self. But movement is always towards its own term which is proportionate to the subject moved. Therefore hope regards directly one's own good, and not that which pertains to another. Yet if we presuppose the union of love with another, a man can hope for and desire something for another man, as for himself; and, accordingly, he can hope for another's eternal life, in so far as is united to him by love, and just as it is the same virtue of charity by which a man loves God, himself, and his neighbour, so too it is the same virtue of hope by which a man hopes for himself and for another.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

ARTICLE 4. Whether a Man Can Lawfully Hope in Man?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that one may lawfully hope in man.

Objection 1. For the object of hope is eternal happiness. Now we are helped to obtain eternal happiness by the patronage of the saints, for Gregory says (Dialog. i, 8)¹ that "predestination is furthered by the saints' prayers." Therefore one may hope in man.

Obj. 2. Further, If a man may not hope in another man, it ought not to be reckoned a sin in a man, that one should not be able to hope in him. Yet this is reckoned a vice in some, as appears from Jer. 9. 4: Let every man take heed of his neighbour, and let him not trust in any brother of his. Therefore it is lawful to trust in a man.

Obj. 3. Further, Prayer is the expression of hope, as stated above (A. 2. obj. 2). But it is lawful to pray to a man for something. Therefore it is lawful to hope in him.

On the contrary, It is written (Jer. 17. 5): Cursed be the man that trusteth in man.

I answer that, Hope, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XL, A. 7; Q. XLII, A. 1), regards two things, namely, the good which it intends to obtain, and the help by which that good is obtained. Now the good which a man hopes to obtain, has the aspect of a final cause, while the help by which one hopes to obtain that good, has the character of an efficient cause. Now in each of these kinds of cause we find a principal and a secondary cause. For the principal end is the last end, while the secondary end is that which is referred to an end. In like manner the principal agent cause is the first agent, while the secondary efficient cause is the secondary and instrumental agent. Now hope regards eternal happiness as its last end, and the Divine assistance as the first cause leading to happiness.

Accordingly, just as it is not lawful to hope for any good save happiness, as one's last end, but only as something referred to final happiness, so too, it is unlawful to hope in any man, or any creature, as though it were the first cause of movement towards happiness. It is, however, lawful to hope in a man or a creature as being the secondary and instrumental agent, through whom one is helped to obtain any goods that are ordered to happiness. It is in this way that we turn to the saints, and that we ask men also for certain things, and for this reason some are blamed in that they cannot be trusted to give help.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

ARTICLE 5. Whether Hope Is a Theological Virtue?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It seems that hope is not a theological virtue.

Objection 1. For a theological virtue is one that has God for its object. Now hope has for its object not only God but also other goods which we hope to obtain from God. Therefore hope is not a theological virtue.

Obj. 2. Further, A theological virtue is not a mean between two vices, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXIV, A. 4). But hope is a mean between presumption and despair. Therefore hope is not a theological virtue.

Obj. 3. Further, Expectation pertains to longanimity which is a species of fortitude. Since, then, hope is a kind of expectation, it seems that hope is not a theological but a moral virtue.

Obj. 4. Further, The object of hope is something arduous. But it pertains to magnanimity, which is a moral virtue, to tend to the arduous. Therefore hope is a moral, and not a theological, virtue.

On the contrary, Hope is enumerated (I Cor. 13.) together with faith and charity, which are theological virtues.

I answer that, Since specific differences, by their very nature, divide a genus, in order to decide under what division we must place hope, we must observe whence it derives its character of virtue. Now it has been stated above (A. 1) that hope has the character of virtue from the fact that it attains the supreme rule of human actions: and this it attains both as its first efficient cause, in so far as it leans on its assistance, and as its final cause, in so far as it expects happiness from its enjoyment. Hence it is evident that God is the principal object of hope, considered as a virtue. Since, then, the very notion of a theological virtue is one that has God for its object, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXII, A. 1), it is evident that hope is a theological virtue.

Reply Obj. 1. Whatever else hope expects to obtain, it hopes for it in reference to God as the last end, or as the first efficient cause, as stated above (A. 4).

Reply Obj. 2. In things measured and ruled the mean consists in the measure or rule being attained; if we go beyond the rule, there is excess, if we fall short of the rule, there is deficiency. But in the rule or measure itself there is no such thing as a mean or extremes. Now a moral virtue is concerned with things ruled by reason, and these things are its proper object; and hence it is proper to it to follow the mean as regards its proper object. On the other hand, a theological virtue is concerned with the First Rule not ruled by another rule, and that Rule is its proper object. Therefore it is not proper for a theological virtue, with regard to its proper object, to follow the mean, although this may happen to it accidentally with regard to something that is referred to its principal object. Thus faith can have no mean or extremes in the point of trusting to the First Truth, in which it is impossible to trust too much; but on the part of the things believed, it may have a mean and extremes, just as one truth is a mean between two falsehoods. So too, hope has no mean or extremes, as regards its principal object, since it is impossible to trust too much in the Divine assistance; yet it may have a mean and extremes as regards those things a man trusts to obtain, in so far as he either presumes above his capability, or despairs of things of which he is capable.

Reply Obj. 3. The expectation which is mentioned in the definition of hope does not imply delay, as does the expectation which pertains to longanimity. It implies a reference to the Divine assistance, whether that which we hope for be delayed or not.

Reply Obj. 4. Magnanimity tends to something arduous in the hope of obtaining something that is within one's power, and so its proper object is the doing of great things. On the other hand hope, as a theological virtue, looks to something arduous, to be obtained by another's help, as stated above (A. 1).

ARTICLE 6. Whether Hope Is Distinct from the Other Theological Virtues?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It seems that hope is not distinct from the other theological virtues.

Objection 1. For habits are distinguished by their objects, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LIV, A. 2). Now the object of hope is the same as of the other theological virtues. Therefore hope is not distinct from the other theological virtues.

Obj. 2. Further, In the Creed of faith, in which we make profession of faith, we say: "I expect the resurrection of the dead and the life of the world to come."¹ Now expectation of future happiness pertains to hope, as stated above (A. 5). Therefore hope is not distinct from faith.

Obj. 3. Further, By hope man tends to God. But this pertains properly to charity. Therefore hope is not distinct from charity.

On the contrary, There cannot be number without distinction. Now hope is numbered with the other theological virtues, for Gregory says (Moral. i, 27)² that the three virtues are faith, hope, and charity. Therefore hope is distinct from the theological virtues.

I answer that, A virtue is said to be theological from having God for the object to which it adheres. Now one may adhere to a thing in two ways: first, for its own sake, secondly, because something else is attained through it. Accordingly charity makes us adhere to God for His own sake, uniting our minds to God by the emotion of love. On the other hand, hope and faith make man adhere to God as to a principle from which certain things accrue to us. Now we derive from God both knowledge of truth and the attainment of perfect goodness. Accordingly faith makes us adhere to God, as the source from which we derive the knowledge of truth, since we believe that what God tells us is true. But hope makes us adhere to God, as the source from which we derive perfect goodness, that is, in so far as, by hope, we trust to the Divine assistance for obtaining Happiness.

Reply Obj. 1. God is the object of these virtues under different aspects as stated above; and a different aspect of the object suffices for the distinction of habits, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LIV, A. 2).

Reply Obj. 2. Expectation is mentioned in the creed of faith, not as though it were the proper act of faith, but because the act of hope presupposes the act of faith, as we shall state further on (A. 7). Hence an act of faith is expressed in the act of hope.

Reply Obj. 3. Hope makes us tend to God, as to a good to be obtained finally, and as to a helper strong to assist. But charity, properly speaking, makes us tend to God by uniting our affections to Him, so that we live, not for ourselves, but for God.

ARTICLE 7. Whether Hope Precedes Faith?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It seems that hope precedes faith.

Objection 1. Because a gloss on Ps. 36. 3, Trust in the Lord, and do good, says: "Hope is the entrance to faith and the beginning of salvation."¹ But salvation is by faith whereby we are justified. Therefore hope precedes faith.

Obj. 2. Further, That which is included in a definition should precede the thing defined and be more known. But hope is included in the definition of faith (Heb. 11. 1): Faith is the substance of things to be hoped for. Therefore hope precedes faith.

Obj. 3. Further, Hope precedes a meritorious act, for the Apostle says (I Cor. 9. 10): He that plougheth should plough in hope . . . to receive fruit. But the act of faith is meritorious. Therefore hope precedes faith.

On the contrary, It is written (Matt. 1. 2): Abraham begot Isaac, that is, Faith begot hope, according to a gloss.²

I answer that, Absolutely speaking, faith precedes hope. For the object of hope is a future good, arduous but possible to obtain. In order, therefore, that we may hope, it is necessary for the object of hope to be proposed to us as possible. Now the object of hope is, in one way, eternal happiness, and, in another way, the Divine assistance, as explained above (A. 2; A. 6, reply 3), and both of these are proposed to us by faith, by which we come to know that we are able to obtain eternal life, and that for this purpose the Divine assistance is ready for us, according to Heb. 11. 6: He that cometh to God, must believe that He is, and is a rewarder to them that seek Him. Therefore it is evident that faith precedes hope.

Reply Obj. 1. As the same gloss observes further on, hope is called the entrance to faith, that is, of the thing believed, "because by hope we enter in to see what we believe."—Or we may reply that it is called the entrance to faith, because by hope man begins to be established and perfected in faith.

Reply Obj. 2. The thing to be hoped for is included in the definition of faith because the proper object of faith is something not apparent in itself. Hence it was necessary to express it in a circumlocution by something resulting from faith.

Reply Obj. 3. Hope does not precede every meritorious act; but it suffices for it to accompany or follow it.

ARTICLE 8. Whether Charity Precedes Hope.

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It would seem that charity precedes hope.

Objection 1. For Ambrose says on Luke 17. 6, If you had faith like to a grain of mustard-seed, etc.: "Charity flows from faith, and hope from charity."³ But faith precedes charity. Therefore charity precedes hope.

Obj. 2. Further, Augustine says⁴ that "good emotions and affections proceed from love and holy charity." Now to hope, considered as an act of hope, is a good movement of the soul. Therefore it flows from charity.

Obj. 3. Further, The Master says (Sent. iii, d. 26)⁵ that "hope proceeds from merits, which precede not only the thing hoped for, but also hope itself, which, in the order of nature, is preceded by charity." Therefore charity precedes hope.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (I Tim. 1. 5): The end of the commandment is charity from a pure heart, and a good conscience, that is, from hope, according to a gloss.⁶ Therefore hope precedes charity.

I answer that, Order is twofold. One is the order of generation and of matter, in respect of which the imperfect precedes the perfect: the other is the order of perfection and form, in respect of which the perfect naturally precedes the imperfect. In respect of the first order hope precedes charity, and this is clear from the fact that hope and all movements of the appetite flow from love, as stated above (Part I-II, q. xxvii, A. 4; q. xxviii, A. 6, reply 2; q. xl, A. 7) in the treatise on the passions.

Now there is a perfect, and an imperfect love. Perfect love is that by which a man is loved in himself, as when someone wishes a person some good for his own sake; thus a man loves his friend. Imperfect love is that by which a man loves something, not for its own sake, but that he may obtain that good for himself; thus a man loves what he desires. The first love pertains to charity, which adheres to God for His own sake; while hope pertains to the second love, since he that hopes, intends to obtain possession of something for himself.

⁶ Glossa interl. (VI, 116v), Glossa Lombardi (PL 192, 329).

Hence in the order of generation, hope precedes charity. For just as a man is led to love God through fear of being punished by Him for his sins, as Augustine states in his commentary on the First canonical epistle of John (Tract. ix),¹ so too, hope leads to charity, in so far as a man through hoping to be rewarded by God, is encouraged to love God and obey His commandments. On the other hand, in the order of perfection charity naturally precedes hope. And therefore, with the advent of charity, hope is made more perfect, because we hope chiefly in our friends. It is in this sense that Ambrose states (obj. 1) that charity flows from hope.

From this appears the Reply to the First Objection.

Reply Obj. 2. Hope and every movement of the appetite proceed from some kind of love, by which the expected good is loved. But not every kind of hope proceeds from charity, but only the movement of formed hope, namely, that by which man hopes to obtain good from God, as from a friend.

Obj. 3. The Master is speaking of formed hope, which is naturally preceded by charity and the merits caused by charity.

QUESTION XVIII OF THE SUBJECT OF HOPE (In Four Articles)

WE must now consider the subject of hope, under which head there are four points of inquiry:

(1) Whether the virtue of hope is in the will as its subject? (2) Whether it is in the blessed? (3) Whether it is in the damned? (4) Whether there is certainty in the hope of a wayfarer?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Hope Is in the Will as Its Subject?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that hope is not in the will as its subject.

Objection 1. For the object of hope is an arduous good, as stated above (q. xvii, a. 1; Part I-II, q. xl, a. 1). Now the arduous is the object, not of the will, but of the irascible part. Therefore hope is not in the will but in the irascible part.

Obj. 2. Further, Where one suffices it is superfluous to add another. Now charity, which is the most perfect of the virtues, suffices for the perfecting of the will. Therefore hope is not in the will.

Obj. 3. Further, The one same power cannot exercise two acts at the same time; thus the intellect cannot understand many things simultaneously. Now the act of hope can be at the same time as an act of charity. Since, then, the act of charity evidently pertains to the will, it follows that the act of hope does not pertain to that power. Thus, therefore, hope is not in the will.

On the contrary, The soul is not capable of God except as regards the mind in which is memory, intellect and will, as Augustine declares (De Trin. xiv).² Now hope is a theological virtue having God for its object. Since therefore it is neither in the memory, nor in the intellect, which belong to the cognitive power, it follows that it is in the will as its subject.

I answer that, As shown above (Part I, q. lxxxvii, a. 2), habits are known by their acts. Now the act of hope is a movement of the appetitive part, since its object is a good. And, since there is a twofold appetite in man, namely, the sensitive which is divided into irascible and concupiscible, and the intellectual appetite, called the will, as stated in the First Part (q. lxxxii, a. 5), those movements which occur in the lower appetite are accompanied by passion, while those in the higher appetite are without passion, as shown above (ibid., reply 1; Part I-II, q. xxii, a. 3, reply 3). Now the act of the virtue of hope cannot belong to the sensitive appetite, since the good which is the principal object of this virtue is not a sensible good but a Divine good. Therefore hope resides in the higher appetite, called the will, and not in the lower appetite, of which the irascible is a part.

Reply Obj. 1. The object of the irascible is an arduous sensible, but the object of the virtue of hope is an arduous intelligible, or rather supra-intelligible.

Reply Obj. 2. Charity perfects the will sufficiently with regard to one act, which is the act of loving; but another virtue is required in order to perfect it with regard to its other act, which is that of hoping.

Reply Obj. 3. The movement of hope and the movement of charity are mutually related, as was shown above (q. xvii, a. 8). Hence there is no reason why both movements should not belong at the same time to the same power, even as the intellect can understand many things at the same time if they are related to one another, as stated in the First Part (q. lxxxv, a. 4).

ARTICLE 2. Whether in the Blessed There Is Hope?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that in the blessed there is hope.

² Chap. 8 (PL 42, 1044); Chap. 12 (PL 42, 1048).

Objection 1. For Christ was a perfect comprehensor from the first moment of his conception. Now He had hope, since, according to a gloss, the words of Ps. 30. 2, In Thee, O Lord, have I hoped are said in His person.¹ Therefore in the blessed there can be hope.

Obj. 2. Further, Even as the obtaining of happiness is an arduous good, so is its continuation. Now, before they obtain happiness, men hope to obtain it. Therefore, after they have obtained it, they can hope to continue in its possession.

Obj. 3. Further, By the virtue of hope, a man can hope for happiness, not only for himself, but also for others, as stated above (Q. XVII, A. 3). But the blessed who are in heaven hope for the happiness of others, or they would not pray for them. Therefore there can be hope in them.

Obj. 4. Further, The happiness of the saints implies not only glory of the soul but also glory of the body. Now the souls of the saints in heaven, look yet for the glory of their bodies (Apoc. 6. 10; Augustine,—Gen. ad. lit. xii, 35).² Therefore in the blessed there can be hope.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (Rom. 8. 24): What a man seeth, why doth he hope for? Now the blessed enjoy the sight of God. Therefore hope has no place in them.

I answer that, If what gives a thing its species be removed, the species is destroyed, and that thing cannot remain the same; just as when a natural body loses its form it does not remain the same specifically. Now hope takes its species from its principal object, even as the other virtues do, as was shown above (Q. XVII, AA. 5, 6), and its principal object is eternal happiness according as it is possible of attainment by the assistance of God, as stated above (Q. XVII, A. 2). Since then the arduous possible good cannot be an object of hope except in so far as it is something future, it follows that when happiness is no longer future, but present, it is incompatible with the virtue of hope. Consequently hope, like faith, is voided in heaven, and neither of them can be in the blessed.

Reply Obj. 1. Although Christ was a comprehensor and therefore blessed as to the enjoyment of God, nevertheless He was, at the same time, a wayfarer, as regards the passibility of nature, to which He was still subject. Hence it was possible for Him to hope for the glory of impassibility and immortality, yet not so as to have the virtue of hope, the principal object of which is not the glory of the body but the enjoyment of God.

Reply Obj. 2. The Happiness of the saints is called eternal life, because through enjoying God they become partakers, as it were, of God's eternity which surpasses all time, so that the continuation of Happiness does not differ in respect of present, past and future. Hence the blessed do not hope for the continuation of their Happiness (for as regards this there is no future), but are in actual possession of it.

Reply Obj. 3. So long as the virtue of hope lasts, one hopes for one's own happiness, and for that of others by the same hope. But when hope in the blessed, by which they hoped for their own Happiness, is voided, they hope for the Happiness of others indeed, yet not by the virtue of hope, but rather by the love of charity. Even so, he that has Divine charity, by that same charity loves his neighbour, and yet a man may love his neighbour, without having the virtue of charity, but by some other love.

Reply Obj. 4. Since hope is a theological virtue having God for its object, its principal object is the glory of the soul, which consists in the enjoyment of God, and not the glory of the body. Moreover, although the glory of the body is something arduous in comparison with human nature, yet it is not so for one who has the glory of the soul, both because the glory of the body is a very small thing as compared with the glory of the soul, and because one who has the glory of the soul has already the sufficient cause of the glory of the body.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Hope Is in the Damned?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that there is hope in the damned.

Objection 1. For the devil is damned and prince of the damned, according to Matt. 25. 41: Depart . . . you cursed, into everlasting fire, which was prepared for the devil and his angels. But the devil has hope, according to Job 40. 28, Behold his hope shall fail him. Therefore it seems that the damned have hope.

Obj. 2. Further, Just as faith is either formed or unformed, so is hope. But unformed faith can be in the devils and the damned, according to James 2. 19: The devils . . . believe and tremble. Therefore it seems that unformed hope also can be in the damned.

Obj. 3. Further, After death there accrues to man no merit or demerit that he had not before, according to Eccl. 11. 3, If the tree fall to the south, or to the north, in what place soever it shall fall, there shall it be. Now many who are damned, in this life hoped and never despaired. Therefore they will hope in the future life also.

On the contrary, Hope causes joy, according to Rom. 12. 12, Rejoicing in hope. Now the damned have no joy, but sorrow and grief, according to Isa. 65. 14, My servants shall praise for joyfulness of heart, and you shall cry for sorrow of heart, and shall howl for grief of spirit. Therefore no hope is in the damned.

I answer that, Just as it is of the very notion of happiness that the will should find rest therein, so is it of the very notion of punishment that what is inflicted in punishment should go against the will. Now that which is not known can neither be restful nor contrary to the will. Therefore Augustine says (Gen. ad lit. xi, 17)¹ that the angels could not be perfectly happy in their first state before their confirmation, or unhappy before their fall, since they had no foreknowledge of what would happen to them. For perfect and true happiness requires that one should be certain of being happy for ever; otherwise the will would not rest.

In like manner, since the everlastingness of damnation pertains to the punishment of the damned, it would not be truly penal unless it went against the will; and this would be impossible if they were ignorant of the everlastingness of their damnation. Hence it pertains to the unhappy condition of the damned, that they should know that they cannot by any means escape from damnation and obtain happiness. Therefore it is written (Job. 15. 22): He believeth not that he may return from darkness to light. It is, therefore, evident that they cannot apprehend happiness as a possible good, as neither can the blessed apprehend it as a future good. Consequently there is no hope either in the blessed or in the damned. On the other hand, hope can be in wayfarers, whether of this life or in purgatory, because in either case they apprehend happiness as a future possible thing.

Reply Obj. 1. As Gregory says (Moral. xxxiii, 20)² this is said of the devil as regards his members, whose hope will fail utterly. Or, if it be understood of the devil himself, it may refer to the hope by which he expects to vanquish the saints, in which sense we read just before (verse 18): He trusteth that the Jordan may run into his mouth. This is not, however, the hope of which we are speaking.

Reply Obj. 2. As Augustine says (Enchirid. viii),³ "faith is about things, bad or good, past, present or future, one's own or another's; but hope is only about good things, future and concerning oneself." Hence it is possible for unformed faith to be in the damned, but not hope, since the Divine goods are not for them future possible things, but far removed from them.

Reply Obj. 3. Lack of hope in the damned does not change their demerit, as neither does the voiding of hope in the blessed increase their merit; but both these things are due to the change in their respective states.

ARTICLE 4 Whether There Is Certainty in the Hope of a Wayfarer?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that there is no certainty in the hope of a wayfarer.

Objection 1. For hope resides in the will. But certainty pertains not to the will but to the intellect. Therefore there is no certainty in hope.

Obj. 2. Further, Hope is based on grace and merits, as stated above (Q. XVII, A. 1). Now it is impossible in this life to know for certain that we are in a state of grace, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. CXII, A. 5). Therefore there is no certainty in the hope of a wayfarer.

Obj. 3. Further, There can be no certainty about that which may fail. Now many a hopeful wayfarer fails to obtain Happiness. Therefore the wayfarer's hope has no certainty.

On the contrary, "Hope is the certain expectation of future happiness," as the Master states (Sent. iii, d. 26);⁴ and this may be gathered from II Tim. 1. 12, I know Whom I have believed, and I am certain that He is able to keep that which I have committed to Him.

I answer that, Certainty is found in a thing in two ways, essentially and by participation. It is found essentially in the cognitive power; by participation, in whatever is moved infallibly to its end by the cognitive power. In this way we say that nature works with certainty, since it is moved by the Divine intellect which moves everything with certainty to its end. In this way too, the moral virtues are said to work with greater certainty than art, since, like a second nature, they are moved to their acts by the reason.⁵ And thus too, hope tends to its end with certainty, as though sharing in the certainty of faith which is in the cognitive power.

This suffices for the Reply to the First Objection.

Reply Obj. 2. Hope is not founded chiefly in grace already received, but on God's omnipotence and mercy, by which even he that does not have grace can obtain it, so as to come to eternal life. Now whoever has faith is certain of God's omnipotence and mercy.

³ PL 40, 234.

Reply Obj. 3. That some who have hope fail to obtain Happiness is due to a fault of free choice in placing the obstacle of sin, but not to any deficiency in God's power or mercy, on which hope is based. Hence this does not prejudice the certainty of hope.

QUESTION XIX OF THE GIFT OF FEAR (In Twelve Articles)

WE must now consider the gift of fear, about which there are twelve points of inquiry: (1) Whether God is to be feared? (2) Of the division of fear into filial, initial, servile and worldly. (3) Whether worldly fear is always evil? (4) Whether servile fear is good? (5) Whether it is substantially the same as filial fear? (6) Whether servile fear departs when charity comes? (7) Whether fear is the beginning of wisdom? (8) Whether initial fear is substantially the same as filial fear? (9) Whether fear is a gift of the Holy Ghost? (10) Whether it grows when charity grows? (11) Whether it remains in heaven? (12) Which of the beatitudes and fruits correspond to it?

ARTICLE 1. Whether God Can Be Feared?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that God cannot be feared.

Objection 1. For the object of fear is a future evil, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XLI, A. 2). But God is free of all evil, since He is goodness itself. Therefore God cannot be feared.

Obj. 2. Further, Fear is opposed to hope. Now we hope in God. Therefore we cannot fear Him at the same time.

Obj. 3. Further, As the Philosopher states,¹ "we fear those things whence evil comes to us." But evil comes to us, not from God, but from ourselves, according to Osee 13. 9: Destruction is thy own, O Israel: thy help is . . . in Me. Therefore God is not to be feared.

On the contrary, It is written (Jer. 10. 7): Who shall not fear Thee, O King of nations? and (Malach. 1. 6): If I be a master, where is My fear?

I answer that, Just as hope has two objects, one of which is the future good itself that one expects to obtain, while the other is someone's help, through whom one expects to obtain what one hopes for, so, too, fear may have two objects, one of which is the very evil which a man shrinks from, while the other is that from which the evil may come. Accordingly in the first way

God, Who is goodness itself, cannot be an object of fear; but He can be an object of fear in the second way, in so far as there may come to us some evil either from Him or in relation to Him.

From Him there comes the evil of punishment, but this is evil not absolutely but relatively, and, absolutely speaking, is a good. Because, since a thing is said to be good through being ordered to an end, while evil implies lack of this order, that which excludes the order to the last end is altogether evil, and such is the evil of fault. On the other hand the evil of punishment is indeed an evil, in so far as it is the privation of some particular good, yet absolutely speaking it is a good, in so far as it is ordered to the last end.

In relation to God the evil of fault can come to us if we be separated from Him; and in this way God can and ought to be feared.

Reply Obj. 1. This objection considers the object of fear as being the evil which a man shuns.

Reply Obj. 2. In God, we may consider both His justice, in respect of which He punishes those who sin, and His mercy, in respect of which He sets us free. The consideration of His justice gives rise to fear in us, but the consideration of His mercy gives rise to hope, so that, accordingly, God is the object of both hope and fear, but under different aspects.

Reply Obj. 3. The evil of fault is not from God as its author, but from us, in so far as we forsake God. But the evil of punishment is from God as its author, in so far as it has the character of a good, since it is something just, through being inflicted on us justly, although originally this is due to the demerit of sin. Thus it is written (Wisd. 1. 13, 16): God made not death . . . but the wicked with works and words have called it to them.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Fear Is Fittingly Divided into Filial, Initial, Servile and Worldly Fear?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that fear is unfittingly divided into filial, initial, servile and worldly fear.

Objection 1. For Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. ii, 15)² that there are six kinds of fear, namely, laziness, shamefacedness, etc., of which we have treated above (Part I-II, Q. XLI, A. 4), and which are not mentioned in the division in question. Therefore this division of fears seems unfitting.

Obj. 2. Further, Each of these fears is either good or evil. But there is a fear, namely, natural fear, which is neither morally good, since it is in the demons. according to James 2. 19, The devils . . . believe and tremble, nor evil. since it is in Christ, according to Mark 14. 33, Jesus began to fear and be heavy. Therefore the above division of fear is insufficient.

Obj. 3. Further, The relation of son to father differs from that of wife to husband, and this again from that of servant to master. Now filial fear, which is that of the son in comparison with his father, is distinct from servile fear, which is that of the servant in comparison with his master. Therefore chaste fear, which seems to be that of the wife in relation to her husband, ought to be distinguished from all these other fears.

Obj. 4. Further, Even as servile fear fears punishment, so do initial and worldly fear. Therefore no distinction should be made between them.

Obj. 5. Further, Even as concupiscence is about some good, so is fear about some evil. Now concupiscence of the eyes, which is the desire for things of this world, is distinct from concupiscence of the flesh, which is the desire for one's own pleasure. Therefore worldly fear, by which one fears to lose external goods, is distinct from human fear, by which one fears harm to one's own person.

On the contrary stands the authority of the Master (3 Sent., d. 34).¹

I answer that, We are speaking of fear now, in so far as it makes us in some way turn to God or away from Him. For, since the object of fear is an evil, sometimes, on account of the evils he fears, man withdraws from God, and this is called human or worldly fear; while sometimes, on account of the evils he fears, he turns to God and adheres to Him. This latter evil is twofold, namely evil of punishment, and evil of fault.

Accordingly if a man turn to God and adhere to Him, through fear of punishment, it will be servile fear; but if it be on account of fear of committing a fault, it will be filial fear, for it becomes a child to fear offending its father. If, however, it be on account of both, it will be initial fear, which is between both these fears. As to whether it is possible to fear the evil of fault the question has been treated above (Part I-II, q. XLII, a. 3) when we were considering the passion of fear.

Reply Obj. 1. Damascene divides fear as a passion of the soul; but this division of fear is taken from its relation to God, as explained above.

Reply Obj. 2. Moral good consists chiefly in turning to God, while moral evil consists chiefly in turning away from Him; and therefore all the moral fears mentioned above imply either moral evil or moral good. Now natural fear is presupposed to moral good and evil, and so it is not numbered among these kinds of fear.

Reply Obj. 3. The relation of servant to master is based on the power which the master exercises over the servant, while, on the contrary, the relation of a son to his father or of a wife to her husband is based on the son's affection towards his father to whom he submits himself, or on the wife's affection towards her husband to whom she binds herself in the union of love. Hence filial and chaste fear amount to the same, because by the love of charity God becomes our Father, according to Rom 8. 15, You have received the spirit of adoption of sons, whereby we cry: Abba Father; and by this same charity He is called our spouse, according to II Cor 11. 2, I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ. But servile fear does not pertain to these, since it does not include charity in its definition.

Reply Obj. 4. These three fears regard punishment but in different ways. For worldly or human fear regards a punishment which turns man away from God, and which God's enemies sometimes inflict or threaten; but servile and initial fear regard a punishment by which men are drawn to God, and which is inflicted or threatened by God. Servile fear regards this punishment chiefly, while initial fear regards it secondarily.

Reply Obj. 5. It amounts to the same whether man turns away from God through fear of losing his worldly goods, or through fear of forfeiting the well-being of his body, since external goods pertain to the body. Hence both these fears are reckoned as one here, although they fear different evils, even as they correspond to the desire of different goods. This diversity causes a specific diversity of sins, all of which alike however lead man away from God.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Worldly Fear Is Always Evil?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that worldly fear is not always evil.

Objection 1. Because regard for men seems to be a kind of human fear. Now some are blamed for having no regard for man, for instance, the unjust judge of whom we read (Luke 18. 2) that he feared not God, nor regarded man. Therefore it seems that worldly fear is not always evil.

Obj. 2. Further, Worldly fear seems to have reference to the punishments inflicted by the secular power. Now punishments of this kind incite us to good actions, according to Rom. 13. 3, Wilt thou not be afraid of the power? Do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise from the same. Therefore worldly fear is not always evil.

Obj. 3. Further, It seems that what is in us naturally, is not evil, since our natural gifts are from God. Now it is natural to man to fear detriment to his body, and loss of his worldly goods, by which the present life is supported. Therefore it seems that worldly fear is not always evil.

On the contrary, Our Lord said (Matt. 10. 28): Fear ye not them that kill the body, thus forbidding worldly fear. Now nothing but what is evil is forbidden by God. Therefore worldly fear is evil.

I answer that As shown above (Part I-II, Q. XVIII, A. 2; Q. LIV, A. 2) moral acts and habits take their name and species from their objects. Now the proper object of the appetite's movement is the final good, so that, in consequence, every appetitive movement is both specified and named from its proper end. For if anyone were to describe covetousness as love of work because men work on account of covetousness, this description would be incorrect, since the covetous man seeks work not as end but as a means. The end that he seeks is wealth, and so covetousness is rightly described as the desire or the love of wealth, and this is evil. Accordingly worldly love is, properly speaking, the love by which a man trusts in the world as his end, so that worldly love is always evil. Now fear is born of love, "since man fears the loss of what he loves," as Augustine states.¹ Hence worldly fear is that which arises from worldly love as from an evil root, for which reason worldly fear is always evil.

Reply Obj. 1. One may have regard for men in two ways. First, in so far as there is in them something divine, for instance the good of grace or of virtue, or at least of the natural image of God; and in this way those are blamed who have no regard for man. Secondly, one may have regard for men as being in opposition to God, and thus it is praiseworthy to have no regard for men, according as we read of Elias or Eliseus (Ecclus. 48. 13): In his days he feared not the prince.

Reply Obj. 2. When the secular power inflicts punishment in order to withdraw men from sin, it is acting as God's minister, according to Rom. 13. 4, For he is God's minister, an avenger to execute wrath upon him that doth evil. To fear the secular power in this way is part, not of worldly fear, but of servile or initial fear.

Reply Obj. 3. It is natural for man to shrink from detriment to his own body and loss of worldly goods, but to forsake justice on that account is contrary to natural reason. Hence the Philosopher says² that there are certain things, namely sinful deeds, which no fear should drive us to do, since to do such things is worse than to suffer any punishment whatever.

ARTICLE 4. Whether Servile Fear Is Good?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that servile fear is not good.

Objection 1. For if the use of a thing is evil, the thing itself is evil. Now the use of servile fear is evil, for according to a gloss on Rom. 8. 15, *if a man do anything through fear, although the deed be good, it is not well done.*³ Therefore servile fear is not good.

Obj. 2. Further, No good grows from a sinful root. Now servile fear grows from a sinful root, because when commenting on Job 3. 11, Why did I not die in the womb? Gregory says (Moral. iv, 27);⁴ "When a man dreads the punishment which confronts him for his sin and no longer loves the friendship of God which he has lost, his fear is born of fear, not of humility." Therefore servile fear is evil.

Obj. 3. Further, Just as mercenary love is opposed to the love of charity, so is servile fear, apparently, opposed to chaste fear. But mercenary love is always evil. Therefore servile fear is also.

On the contrary, Nothing evil is from the Holy Ghost. But servile fear is from the Holy Ghost, since a gloss on Rom. 8. 15, You have not received the spirit of bondage, etc., says: "It is the one same spirit that bestows two fears,"⁵ namely, servile and chaste fear. Therefore servile fear is not evil.

I answer that, It is owing to its servility that servile fear may be evil. For servitude is opposed to freedom. Since, then, "what is free is cause of itself,"¹ a slave is one who does not act as cause of his own action, but as though moved from without. Now whoever does a thing through love, does it of himself so to speak, because it is by his own inclination that he is moved to act, so that it is contrary to the very notion of servility that one should act from love. Consequently servile fear as such is contrary to charity. If therefore servility were essential to fear, servile fear would be evil absolutely, even as adultery is evil absolutely, because that which makes it contrary to charity belongs to its very species.

This servility, however, does not belong to the species of servile fear, even as neither does formlessness to the species of unformed faith. For the species of a moral habit or act is taken from the object. Now the object of servile fear is punishment, and it is by accident that, either the good to which the punishment is contrary is loved as the last end, and that consequently the punishment is feared as the greatest evil, which is the case with one who does not have charity, or that the punishment is directed to God as its end, and that, consequently, it is not feared as the greatest evil, which is the case with one who has charity. For the species of a habit is not destroyed through its object or end being ordered to a further end. Consequently servile fear is substantially good, but its servility is evil.

Reply Obj. 1. This saying of Augustine is to be applied to a man who does something through servile fear as such, so that he loves not justice, and fears nothing but the punishment.

Reply Obj. 2. Servile fear as to its substance is not born of fear, but its servility is, in so far, that is, as man is unwilling, by love to subject his affections to the yoke of justice.

Reply Obj. 3. Mercenary love is that by which God is loved for the sake of worldly goods and this is, of itself, contrary to charity, so that mercenary love is always evil. But servile fear, as to its substance, implies merely fear of punishment, whether or not this be feared as the principal evil.

ARTICLE 5. Whether Servile Fear Is Substantially the Same as Filial Fear?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that servile fear is substantially the same as filial fear.

Objection 1. For filial fear is to servile fear the same apparently as formed faith is to unformed faith, since the one is accompanied by mortal sin and the other not. Now formed faith and unformed faith are substantially the same. Therefore servile and filial fear are substantially the same.

Obj. 2. Further, Habits are diversified by their objects. Now the same thing is the object of servile and of filial fear, since they both fear God. Therefore servile and filial fear are substantially the same.

Obj. 3. Further, Just as man hopes to enjoy God and to obtain favours from Him, so does he fear to be separated from God and to be punished by Him. Now the hope by which we hope to enjoy God, and to receive other favours from Him is the same, as stated above (q. xvii, A. 2, reply 2). Therefore filial fear, by which we fear separation from God, is the same as servile fear by which we fear His punishments.

On the contrary, Augustine (In prim. canon. Joan., Tract., ix)² says that there are two fears, one servile, another filial or chaste fear.

I answer that, The proper object of fear is evil. And since acts and habits are diversified by their objects, as shown above (Part I-II, q. liv, A. 2), it follows of necessity that different kinds of fear correspond to different kinds of evil. Now the evil of punishment, from which servile fear shrinks, differs specifically from evil of fault, which filial fear shuns, as shown above (Part I, q. xlviii, A. 5). Hence it is evident that servile and filial fear are not the same substantially but differ specifically.

Reply Obj. 1. Formed and unformed faith differ, not as regards the object, since each of them believes God and believes in a God, but in respect of something extrinsic, namely the presence or absence of charity, and so they do not differ substantially. On the other hand, servile and filial fear differ as to their objects, and hence the comparison fails.

Reply Obj. 2. Servile fear and filial fear do not have the same relationship to God. For servile fear looks upon God as the cause of the infliction of punishment, while filial fear looks upon Him, not as the active cause of guilt, but rather as the term from which it shrinks to be separated by guilt. Consequently the identity of object, namely God, does not prove a specific identity of fear, since also natural movements differ specifically according to their different relationships to some one term, for movement from whiteness is not specifically the same as movement towards whiteness.

Reply Obj. 3. Hope looks upon God as the principle not only of the enjoyment of God, but also of any other favour whatever. This cannot be said of fear, and so there is no comparison.

ARTICLE 6. Whether Servile Fear Remains with Charity?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It seems that servile fear does not remain with charity.

Objection 1. For Augustine says in his commentary on the First Canonical epistle of John (Tract. ix)¹ that "when charity takes up its abode, it drives away fear which had prepared a place for it."

Obj. 2. Further, The charity of God is poured forth in our hearts, by the Holy Ghost, Who is given to us (Rom. 5. 5). Now where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty (II Cor. 3. 17). Since then freedom excludes servitude, it seems that servile fear is driven away when charity comes.

Obj. 3. Further, Servile fear is caused by self-love, in so far as punishment diminishes one's own good. Now love of God drives away self-love, for it makes us despise our-elves; thus Augustine testifies² that "the love of God unto the contempt of self builds up the city of God." Therefore it seems that servile fear is driven out when charity comes.

On the contrary, Servile fear is a gift of the Holy Ghost, as stated above (A. 4). Now the gifts of the Holy Ghost are not forfeited through the advent of charity, by which the Holy Ghost dwells in us. Therefore servile fear is not driven out when charity comes.

I answer that, Servile fear proceeds from self-love, because it is fear of punishment which is detrimental to one's own good. Hence the fear of punishment is consistent with charity, in the same way as self-love is, because it comes to the same that a man love his own good and that he fear to be deprived of it.

Now self-love may stand in a threefold relationship to charity. In one way it is contrary to charity, when a man places his end in the love of his own good. In another way it is included in charity, when a man loves himself for the sake of God and in God. In a third way, it is indeed distinct from charity, but is not contrary to it, as when a man loves himself from the point of view of his own good, yet not so as to place his end in this his own good, just as one may have another special love for one's neighbour, besides the love of charity which is founded on God, when we love him by reason of usefulness, consanguinity, or some other human consideration, which, however, is referable to charity.

Accordingly fear of punishment is, in one way, included in charity, because separation from God is a punishment, which charity shuns exceedingly. Hence this belongs to chaste fear. In another way it is contrary to charity, when a man shrinks from the punishment that is opposed to his natural good, as being the chief evil in opposition to the good which he loves as an end; and in this way fear of punishment is not consistent with charity. In another way fear of punishment is indeed substantially distinct from chaste fear, when, that is, a man fears a penal evil, not because it separates him from God, but because it is hurtful to his own good; and yet he does not place his end in this good, so that neither does he dread this evil as being the principal evil. Such fear of punishment is consistent with charity; but it is not called servile, except when punishment is dreaded as a principal evil, as explained above (AA. 2, 4). Hence fear considered as servile, does not remain with charity, but the substance of servile fear can remain with charity, even as self-love can remain with charity.

Reply Obj. 1. Augustine is speaking of fear, considered as servile. And such is the sense of the two other objections.

ARTICLE 7. Whether Fear is the Beginning of Wisdom?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It seems that fear is not the beginning of wisdom.

Objection 1. For the beginning of a thing is a part of it. But fear is not a part of wisdom, since fear is seated in the appetitive power, while wisdom is in the intellect. Therefore it seems that fear is not the beginning of wisdom.

Obj. 2. Further Nothing is the beginning of itself. Now fear of the Lord, that is wisdom, according to Job. 28. 28. Therefore it seems that fear of God is not the beginning of wisdom.

Obj. 3. Further, Nothing is prior to the beginning. But something is prior to fear, since faith precedes fear. Therefore it seems that fear is not the beginning of wisdom.

On the contrary, It is written in the Psalm (110. 10): The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.

I answer that, A thing may be called the beginning of wisdom in two ways: in one way, because it is the beginning of wisdom itself as to its essence; in another way, as to its effect. Thus the beginning of an art as to its essence consists in the principles from which that art proceeds, while the beginning of an art as to its effect is that from which it begins to operate: for instance we might say that the beginning of the art of building is the foundation, because that is where the builder begins his work.

Now, since wisdom is the knowledge of Divine things, as we shall state further on (Q. XLV, A. 1), it is considered by us in one way, and in another way by philosophers. For, seeing that our life is ordered to the enjoyment of God, and is directed to this according to a participation of the Divine Nature, conferred on us through grace, wisdom, as we look at it, is considered not only as making us know God, as it is with the philosophers, but also as directing human conduct; since this is directed not only by the human law, but also by the Divine law, as Augustine shows (De Trin. xii, 13).¹

Accordingly the beginning of wisdom as to its essence consists in the first principles of wisdom, which are the articles of faith, and in this sense faith is said to be the beginning of wisdom. But as regards the effect, the beginning of wisdom is the point where wisdom begins to work, and in this way fear is the beginning of wisdom, yet servile fear in one way, and filial fear, in another. For servile fear is like a principle disposing a man to wisdom from without, in so far as he refrains from sin through fear of punishment, and is thus fashioned for the effect of wisdom, according to Ecclus. 1. 27, The fear of the Lord driveth out sin. On the other hand, chaste or filial fear is the beginning of wisdom, as being the first effect of wisdom. For since the regulation of human conduct by the Divine law belongs to wisdom, in order to make a beginning, man must first of all fear God and submit himself to Him; thus the result will be that in all things he will be ruled by God.

Reply Obj. 1. This argument proves that fear is not the beginning of wisdom as to the essence of wisdom.

Reply Obj. 2. The fear of God is compared to a man's whole life that is ruled by God's wisdom, as the root to the tree; hence it is written (Ecclus. 1. 25): The root of wisdom is to fear the Lord, for (Vulg.,—and) the branches thereof are longlived. Consequently, as the root is said to be virtually the tree, so the fear of God is said to be wisdom.

Reply Obj. 3. As stated above, faith is the beginning of wisdom in one way, and fear, in another. Hence it is written (Ecclus. 25. 16): The fear of God is the beginning of love: and the beginning of faith is to be fast joined to it.

ARTICLE 8. Whether Initial Fear Differs Substantially From Filial Fear?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It seems that initial fear differs substantially from filial fear.

Objection 1. For filial fear is caused by love. Now initial fear is the beginning of love, according to Ecclus. 25. 16, The fear of God is the beginning of love. Therefore initial fear is distinct from filial fear.

Obj. 2. Further, Initial fear dreads punishment, which is the object of servile fear, so that initial and servile fear would seem to be the same. But servile fear is distinct from filial fear. Therefore initial fear also is substantially distinct from filial fear.

Obj. 3. Further, A mean differs in the same ratio from both the extremes. Now initial fear is the mean between servile and filial fear. Therefore it differs from both filial and servile fear.

On the contrary, Perfect and imperfect do not diversify the substance of a thing. Now initial and filial fear differ in respect of perfection and imperfection of charity, as Augustine states in his commentary on the First Canonical Epistle of John (Tract. ix).² Therefore initial fear does not differ substantially from filial fear.

I answer that, Initial fear is so called because it is a beginning (initium). Since, however, both servile and filial fear are, in some way, the beginning of wisdom, each may be called in some way, initial. It is not in this sense, however, that we are to understand initial fear in so far as it is distinct from servile and filial fear, but in the sense according to which it belongs to the state of beginners, in whom there is a beginning of filial fear resulting from a beginning of charity, although they do not possess the perfection of filial fear, because they have not yet attained to the perfection of charity. Consequently initial fear stands in the same relation to filial fear as imperfect to perfect charity. Now perfect and imperfect charity differ, not as to essence but as to state. Therefore we must conclude that initial fear, as we understand it here, does not differ essentially from filial fear.

Reply Obj. 1. The fear which is a beginning of love is servile fear, which "introduces charity, just as the bristle introduces the thread," as Augustine states (Tract. ix in Ep. 1. Joann.).¹ Or else, if it be referred to initial fear, this is said to be the beginning of love, not absolutely, but relatively to the state of perfect charity.

Reply Obj. 2. Initial fear does not dread punishment as its proper object, but as having something of servile fear connected with it. For this servile fear, as to its substance, remains indeed, with charity, its servility being cast aside; but its act remains with imperfect charity in the man who is moved to perform good actions not only through love of justice, but also through fear of punishment, though this same act ceases in the man who has perfect charity, which casteth out fear, according to I John 4. 18.

Reply Obj. 3. Initial fear is a mean between servile and filial fear, not as between two things of the same genus, but as the imperfect is a mean between a perfect being and a non-being, as stated in the Metaphysics,² for it is the same substantially as the perfect being, while it differs altogether from non-being.

ARTICLE 9. Whether Fear Is a Gift of the Holy Ghost?

We proceed thus to the Ninth Article: It seems that fear is not a gift of the Holy Ghost.

Objection 1. For no gift of the Holy Ghost is opposed to a virtue, which is also from the Holy Ghost; otherwise the Holy Ghost would be in opposition to Himself. Now fear is opposed to hope, which is a virtue. Therefore fear is not a gift of the Holy Ghost.

Obj. 2. Further, It is proper to a theological virtue to have God for its object. But fear has God for its object, in so far as God is feared. Therefore fear is not a gift, but a theological virtue.

Obj. 3. Further, Fear arises from love. But love is counted as a theological virtue. Therefore fear also is a theological virtue, being connected with the same matter, as it were.

Obj. 4. Further, Gregory says (Moral. ii, 49)³ that fear is bestowed as a remedy against pride. But the virtue of humility is opposed to pride. Therefore again, fear is a kind of virtue.

Obj. 5. Further, The gifts are more perfect than the virtues, since they are bestowed in support of the virtues as Gregory says (Moral. ii, 49).⁴ Now hope is more perfect than fear, since hope regards good, while fear regards evil. Since, then, hope is a virtue, it should not be said that fear is a gift.

On the contrary, The fear of the Lord is numbered among the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost (Isa. 11. 3).

I answer that, Fear is of several kinds, as stated above (A. 2). Now it is not human fear, according to Augustine (De Gratia et Lib. Arb. xviii),⁵ that is a gift of God,—for it was by this fear that Peter denied Christ,—but that fear of which it was said (Matt. 10. 28): Fear Him that can destroy both soul and body into hell.

Again servile fear is not to be reckoned among the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost, though it is from Him, because, according to Augustine (De Nat. et Grat. lvii)⁶ it is compatible with the will to sin; but the gifts of the Holy Ghost are incompatible with the will to sin, as they are inseparable from charity, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXVIII, A. 5).

It follows, therefore, that the fear of God, which is numbered among the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost, is filial or chaste fear. For it was stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXVIII, AA. 1. 3) that the gifts of the Holy Ghost are certain habitual perfections of the soul's powers, by which these are rendered amenable to the motion of the Holy Ghost, just as, by the moral virtues, the appetitive powers are rendered amenable to the motion of reason. Now for a thing to be amenable to the motion of a certain mover, the first condition required is that it be a non-resistant subject of that mover, because resistance of the movable subject to the mover hinders the movement. This is what filial or chaste fear does, since thus we revere God and avoid separating ourselves from Him. Hence, according to Augustine (De Serm. Dom. in Monte, i, 4)⁷ filial fear holds the first place, as it were, among the gifts of the Holy Ghost, in the ascending order, and the last place, in the descending order.

Reply Obj. 1. Filial fear is not opposed to the virtue of hope, since thus we fear, not that we may fail of what we hope to obtain by God's help, but lest we withdraw ourselves from this help. Therefore filial fear and hope cling together, and perfect one another.

Reply Obj. 2. The proper and principal object of fear is the evil shunned, and in this way, as stated above (A. 1), God cannot be an object of fear. Yet He is, in this way, the object of hope and the other theological virtues,

⁵ PL 44, 904.

⁷ PL 34, 1234.

since, by the virtue of hope, we trust in God's help, not only to obtain any other goods, but, chiefly, to obtain God Himself, as the principal good. The same evidently applies to the other theological virtues.

Reply Obj. 3. From the fact that love is the principle of fear, it does not follow that the fear of God is of a distinct habit from charity, which is the love of God, since love is the principle of all the emotions, and yet we are perfected by different habits in respect of different emotions. Therefore love has more of the character of a virtue than fear has because love regards good, to which virtue is principally directed according to its very notion, as was shown above (Part I-II, Q. LV, AA. 3, 4); for this reason hope also is counted as a virtue; but fear principally regards evil, the avoidance of which it denotes, and so it is something less than a theological virtue.

Reply Obj. 4. According to Eccus. 10. 14, the beginning of the pride of man is to fall off from God, that is, to refuse submission to God, and this is opposed to filial fear, which reveres God. Thus fear cuts off the source of pride, for which reason it is bestowed as a remedy against pride. Yet it does not follow that it is the same as the virtue of humility, but that it is its principle. For the gifts of the Holy Ghost are the principles of the intellectual and moral virtues, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXXIII, A. 4), while the theological virtues are the principles of the gifts, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXXIX, A. 4, reply 3).

This suffices for the Reply to the Fifth Objection.

ARTICLE 10. Whether Fear Decreases When Charity Increases?

We proceed thus to the Tenth Article: It seems that fear decreases when charity increases.

Objection 1. For Augustine says in his commentary on the First Canonical Epistle of John (Tract. ix):¹ "The more charity increases, the more fear decreases."

Obj. 2. Further, Fear decreases when hope increases. But charity increases when hope increases, as stated above (Q. XVII, A. 8). Therefore fear decreases when charity increases.

Obj. 3. Further, Love implies union, but fear implies separation. Now separation decreases when union increases. Therefore fear decreases when the love of charity increases.

On the contrary, Augustine says (QQ. LXXXIII, qu. 36)² that "the fear of God not only begins but also perfects wisdom, whereby we love God above all things, and our neighbour as ourselves."

I answer that, Fear is twofold, as stated above (A. 2): one is filial fear, by which a son fears to offend his father or to be separated from him; the other is servile fear, by which one fears punishment. Now filial fear must increase when charity increases, even as an effect increases with the increase of its cause. For the more one loves a man, the more one fears to offend him and to be separated from him. On the other hand servile fear, as regards its servility, is entirely cast out when charity comes, although the fear of punishment remains as to its substance, as stated above (A. 6). This fear decreases as charity increases, chiefly as regards its act, since the more a man loves God, the less he fears punishment; first, because he thinks less of his own good, to which punishment is opposed; secondly, because, the faster he clings, the more confident he is of the reward, and, consequently, the less fearful of punishment.

Reply Obj. 1. Augustine speaks there of the fear of punishment.

Reply Obj. 2. It is fear of punishment that decreases when hope increases; but with the increase of the latter filial fear increases, because the more certainly a man expects to obtain a good by another's help, the more he fears to offend him or to be separated from him.

Reply Obj. 3. Filial fear does not imply separation from God, but submission to Him, and shuns separation from that submission. Yet, in a way, it implies separation, in the point of not presuming to equal oneself to Him, and of submitting to Him, which separation is to be found even in charity, in so far as a man loves God more than himself and more than anything else. Hence the increase of the love of charity implies not a decrease but an increase in the reverence of fear.

ARTICLE 11. Whether Fear Remains in Heaven?

We proceed thus to the Eleventh Article: It seems that fear does not remain in heaven.

Objection 1. For it is written (Prov. 1. 33): He . . . shall enjoy abundance, without fear of evils, which is to be understood as referring to those who already enjoy wisdom in everlasting happiness. Now every fear is about some evil, since evil is the object of fear, as stated above

(AA. 2, 5; Part I-II, Q. XLII, A. 1). Therefore there will be no fear in heaven.

Obj. 2. Further, In heaven men will be conformed with God, according to I John 3. 2, When He shall appear, we shall be like to Him. But God fears nothing. Therefore, in heaven, men will have no fear.

Obj. 3. Further, Hope is more perfect than fear, since hope concerns good, and fear, evil. Now hope will not be in heaven. Therefore neither will there be fear in heaven.

On the contrary, It is written (Ps. 18. 10): The fear of the Lord is holy, enduring for ever and ever.

I answer that, Servile fear, or fear of punishment, will by no means be in heaven, since such a fear is excluded by the security which is essential to everlasting happiness, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. v, A. 4). But with regard to filial fear, as it increases with the increase of charity, so is it perfected when charity is made perfect; hence, in heaven, it will not have quite the same act as it has now.

In order to make this clear, we must observe that the proper object of fear is a possible evil, just as the proper object of hope is a possible good. And since the movement of fear is like one of avoidance, fear implies avoidance of a possible arduous evil, for little evils inspire no fear. Now as a thing's good consists in its staying in its own order, so a thing's evil consists in its forsaking its order. Again, the order of a rational creature is that it should be under God and above other creatures. Hence, just as it is an evil for a rational creature to submit, by love, to a lower creature, so too is it an evil for it if it does not submit to God, but presumptuously revolts against Him or contemns Him. Now this evil is possible to a rational creature considered as to its nature, on account of the natural flexibility of the free choice; but in the blessed, it becomes impossible, by reason of the perfection of glory. Therefore the avoidance of this evil that consists in non-subjection to God, and is possible to nature, but impossible in the state of bliss, will be in heaven; while in this life there is avoidance of this evil as of something altogether possible.

Hence Gregory, expounding the words of Job (26. 11), The pillars of heaven tremble, and dread at His beck, says (Moral. xvii, 29):¹ "The heavenly powers that gaze on Him without ceasing, tremble while contemplating: but their awe, lest it should be of a penal nature, is one not of fear but of wonder," because, that is, they wonder at God's supereminence and incomprehensibility. Augustine also² in this sense, admits fear in heaven, although he leaves the question doubtful. "If," he says, "this chaste fear that endureth for ever and ever is to be in the future life, it will not be a fear that is afraid of an evil which might possibly occur, but a fear that holds fast to a good which we cannot lose. For when we love the good which we have acquired, with an unchangeable love, without doubt, if it is allowable to say so, our fear is sure of avoiding evil. Because chaste fear denotes a will that cannot consent to sin, and whereby we avoid sin without trembling lest, in our weakness, we fall, and possess ourselves in the tranquillity born of charity. But, if no kind of fear is possible there, perhaps fear is said to endure for ever and ever, because that which fear will lead us to, will be everlasting."

Reply Obj. 1. The passage quoted excludes from the blessed the fear that denotes solicitude, and anxiety about evil, but not the fear which is accompanied by security.

Reply Obj. 2. As Dionysius says (Div. Nom. ix),³ "the same things are both like and unlike God. They are like by reason of a variable imitation of the Inimitable."—that is because, so far as they can, they imitate God, Who cannot be imitated perfectly,—"they are unlike because they are the effects of a Cause of Whom they fall short infinitely and immeasurably." Hence, if there be no fear in God (since there is none above Him to whom He may be subject) it does not follow that there is none in the blessed, whose happiness consists in perfect subjection to God.

Reply Obj. 3. Hope implies a certain defect, namely the futurity of happiness, which ceases when happiness is present. But fear implies a natural defect in a creature, in so far as it is infinitely distant from God, and this defect will remain even in heaven. Hence fear will not be cast out altogether.

ARTICLE 12. Whether Poverty of Spirit Is the Attitude Corresponding to the Gift of Fear?

We proceed thus to the Twelfth Article: It seems that poverty of spirit is not the beatitude corresponding to the gift of fear.

Objection 1. For fear is the beginning of the spiritual life, as explained above (A. 7); but poverty pertains to the perfection of the spiritual life, according to Matt. (19. 21), If thou wilt be perfect, go sell what thou hast, and give to the poor. Therefore poverty of spirit does not correspond to the gift of fear.

Obj. 2. Further, It is written (Ps. 118. 120): Pierce Thou my flesh with Thy fear, from which it seems to follow that it pertains to fear to restrain the flesh. But the curbing of the flesh seems to pertain rather to the beatitude of mourning. Therefore the beatitude of mourning corresponds to the gift of fear, rather than the beatitude of poverty.

Obj. 3. Further, The gift of fear corresponds to the virtue of hope, as stated above (A. 9, reply 1). Now the last beatitude which is, Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God, seems above all to correspond to hope, because according to Rom. 5. 2, we . . . glory in the hope of the glory of the sons of God. Therefore that beatitude corresponds to the gift of fear, rather than poverty of spirit.

Obj. 4. Further, It was stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXX, A. 2) that the fruits correspond to the beatitudes. Now none of the fruits correspond to the gift of fear. Neither, therefore, does any of the beatitudes.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Serm. Dom. in Monte, i. 4):¹ "The fear of the Lord is befitting the humble of whom it is said: Blessed are the poor in spirit."

I answer that, Poverty of spirit properly corresponds to fear. Because, since it pertains to filial fear to show reverence and submission to God, whatever results from this submission pertains to the gift of fear. Now from the very fact that a man submits to God, it follows that he ceases to seek greatness either in himself or in another but seeks it only in God. For that would be inconsistent with perfect subjection to God; hence it is written (Ps. 19. 8): Some trust in chariots and some in horses; but we will call upon the name of . . . our God. It follows that if a man fear God perfectly, he does not, by pride, seek greatness either in himself or in external goods, namely honours and riches. In either case this pertains to poverty of spirit, in so far as the latter denotes either the voiding of a puffed up and proud spirit, according to Augustine's interpretation (loc. cit.),² or the renunciation of worldly goods which is done in spirit, that is, by one's own will, through the instigation of the Holy Spirit, according to the expounding of Ambrose on Luke 6. 20³ and Jerome on Matt. 5. 3.⁴

Reply Obj. 1. Since a beatitude is an act of perfect virtue, all the beatitudes pertain to the perfection of spiritual life. And this perfection seems to require that whoever would strive to obtain a perfect share of spiritual goods, needs to begin by despising earthly goods, so that fear holds the first place among the gifts. Perfection, however, does not consist in the renunciation itself of temporal goods, but rather this is the way to perfection. Filial fear, however, to which the beatitude of poverty corresponds, is consistent with the perfection of wisdom, as stated above (A. 7).

Reply Obj. 2. The undue exaltation of man either in himself or in other things is more directly opposed to that submission to God which is the result of filial fear, than is external pleasure. Yet this is, in consequence, opposed to fear, since whoever fears God and is subject to Him, takes no delight in things other than God. Nevertheless, pleasure is not concerned, as exaltation is, with the arduous character of a thing which fear regards; and so the beatitude of poverty corresponds to fear directly, and the beatitude of mourning, consequently.

Reply Obj. 3. Hope denotes a movement and a relationship of tendency to a term, while fear implies movement by way of a relation of withdrawal from a term. Therefore the last beatitude which is the term of spiritual perfection, fittingly corresponds to hope, by way of ultimate object; but the first beatitude, which implies withdrawal from external things which hinder submission to God, fittingly corresponds to fear.

Reply Obj. 4. As regards the fruits, it seems that those things correspond to the gift of fear, which pertain to the moderate use of temporal things or to abstinence from them; such are modesty, continency and chastity.

QUESTION XX

OF DESPAIR

(In Four Articles)

WE must now consider the contrary vices; (1) Despair; (2) Presumption (Q. XXI). Under the first head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether despair is a sin? (2) Whether it can be without unbelief? (3) Whether it is the greatest of sins? (4) Whether it arises from sloth?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Despair Is a Sin?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that despair is not a sin.

⁴ PL 26, 34.

Objection 1. For every sin includes a turning to a changeable good, together with a turning away from the immutable good, as Augustine states (De Lib. Arb. ii, 19).¹ But despair includes no turning to a changeable good. Therefore it is not a sin.

Obj. 2. Further, That which grows from a good root seems to be no sin, because a good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit (Matt. 7. 18). Now despair seems to grow from a good root, namely, fear of God, or from horror at the greatness of one's own sins. Therefore despair is not a sin.

Obj. 3. Further, If despair were a sin, it would be a sin also for the damned to despair. But this is not imputed to them as their fault but as part of their damnation. Therefore neither is it imputed to wayfarers as their fault, so that it is not a sin.

On the contrary, That which leads men to sin, seems not only to be a sin itself, but a principle of sins. Now such is despair, for the Apostle says of certain men. (Eph. 4, 19): Who, despairing, have given themselves up to lasciviousness, unto the working of all uncleanness and (Vulg.,—unto) covetousness. Therefore despair is not only a sin but also the principle of other sins.

I answer that, According to the Philosopher,² "affirmation and negation in the intellect correspond to search and avoidance in the appetite," while truth and falsehood in the intellect correspond to good and evil in the appetite. Consequently every appetitive movement which is conformed to a true intellect, is good in itself, while every appetitive movement which is conformed to a false intellect is evil in itself and sinful. Now the true opinion of the intellect about God is that from Him comes salvation to mankind, and pardon to sinners, according to Ezech. 18. 23, I desire not the death of the sinner, but that he should be converted, and live. (Vulg.,—Is it My will that a sinner should die . . . and not that he should be converted and live?) But it is a false opinion that He refuses pardon to the repentant sinner, or that He does not turn sinners to Himself by sanctifying grace. Therefore, just as the movement of hope, which is in conformity with the true opinion, is praiseworthy and virtuous, so the contrary movement of despair, which is in conformity with the false opinion about God, is vicious and sinful.

Reply Obj. 1. In every mortal sin there is, in some way, turning away from the immutable good, and turning to a changeable good, but not always in the same way. Because, since the theological virtues have God for their object, the sins which are contrary to them, such as hatred of God, despair and unbelief, consist principally in turning away from the immutable good; but, consequently, they imply turning to a changeable good, in so far as the soul that is a deserter from God, must necessarily turn to other things. Other sins, however, consist principally in turning to a changeable good, and, consequently, in turning away from the immutable good; for the fornicator intends, not to depart from God, but to enjoy carnal pleasure, the result of which is that he departs from God.

Reply Obj. 2. A thing may grow from a virtuous root in two ways. First, directly and on the part of the virtue itself, just as an act proceeds from a habit; and in this way no sin can grow from a virtuous root, for in this sense Augustine declared (De Lib. Arb. ii, 18, 19)³ that "no man makes evil use of virtue." Secondly, a thing proceeds from a virtue indirectly, or is occasioned by a virtue, and in this way nothing hinders a sin proceeding from a virtue; thus sometimes men pride themselves of their virtues, according to Augustine (Ep. cxxi):⁴ "Pride lies in wait for good works that they may die." In this way fear of God or horror of one's own sins may lead to despair, in so far as man makes evil use of those good things, by allowing them to be an occasion of despair.

Reply Obj. 3. The damned are outside the pale of hope on account of the impossibility of returning to happiness; hence it is not imputed to them that they hope not, but it is a part of their damnation. Just as also, it would be no sin for a wayfarer to despair of obtaining that which he had no natural capacity for obtaining, or which was not due to be obtained by him; for instance, if a physician were to despair of healing some sick man, or if anyone were to despair of ever becoming rich.

ARTICLE 2. Whether There Can Be Despair Without Unbelief?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that there can be no despair without unbelief.

Objection 1. For the certainty of hope is derived from faith, and so long as the cause remains the effect is not done away. Therefore

a man cannot lose the certainty of hope, by despairing, unless his faith be removed.

Obj. 2. Further, To prefer one's own guilt to God's mercy and goodness is to deny the infinity of God's goodness and mercy, and so, pertains to unbelief. But whoever despairs, prefers his own guilt to the Divine mercy and goodness, according to Gen. 4. 13: My iniquity is greater than that I may deserve pardon. Therefore whoever despairs, is an unbeliever.

Obj. 3. Further, Whoever falls into a condemned heresy, is an unbeliever. But he that despairs seems to fall into a condemned heresy, namely, that of the Novatians, who say that there is no pardon for sins after Baptism. Therefore it seems that whoever despairs is an unbeliever.

On the contrary, To remove that which follows is not to remove that which precedes. But hope follows faith, as stated above (Q. XVII, A. 7). Therefore when hope is removed, faith can remain. Therefore not everyone who despairs, is an unbeliever.

I answer that, Unbelief pertains to the intellect, but despair, to the appetite. And the intellect is about universals, while the appetite is moved in connection with particulars, since the appetitive movement is from the soul towards things, which, in themselves, are particular. Now it may happen that a man, while having a right opinion in the universal, is not rightly disposed as to his appetitive movement, his estimation being corrupted in a particular matter, because, in order to pass from the universal estimation to the appetite for a particular thing, it is necessary to have a particular estimate,¹ just as it is impossible to infer a particular conclusion from an universal proposition, except through the holding of a particular proposition. Hence it is that a man, while having right faith, in the universal, fails in an appetitive movement, in regard to some particular, his particular estimation being corrupted by a habit or a passion, just as the fornicator, by choosing fornication as a good for himself at this particular moment, has a corrupt estimation in a particular matter, although he retains the true universal estimation according to faith, namely that fornication is a mortal sin. In the same way, a man, while retaining in the universal the true estimation of faith, that is, that there is in the Church the power of forgiving sins, may suffer a movement of despair, namely, that for him, being in such a state, there is no hope of pardon, his estimation being corrupted in a particular matter. In this way there can be despair, just as there can be other mortal sins, without unbelief.

Reply Obj. 1. The effect is done away not only when the first cause is removed, but also when the secondary cause is removed. Hence the movement of hope can be done away not only by the removal of the universal estimation of faith, which is, so to say, the first cause of the certainty of hope, but also by the removal of the particular estimation, which is the secondary cause, as it were.

Reply Obj. 2. If anyone were to judge, in universal, that God's mercy is not infinite, he would be an unbeliever. But he who despairs does not judge thus, but that, for him in that state, on account of some particular disposition, there is no hope of the Divine mercy.

The same answer applies to the Third Objection, since the Novatians denied, in universal, that there is remission of sins in the Church.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Despair Is the Greatest of Sins?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that despair is not the greatest of sins.

Objection 1. For there can be despair without unbelief, as stated above (A. 2). But unbelief is the greatest of sins, because it overthrows the foundation of the spiritual edifice. Therefore despair is not the greatest of sins.

Obj. 2. Further, A greater evil is opposed to a greater good, as the Philosopher states.² But charity is greater than hope, according to I Cor. 13. 13. Therefore hatred is a greater sin than despair.

Obj. 3. Further, In the sin of despair there is nothing but inordinate turning away from God; but in other sins there is not only inordinate turning away from God, but also an inordinate turning (to creatures). Therefore the sin of despair is not more but less grave than other sins.

On the contrary, An incurable sin seems to be most grievous, according to Jerem. 30. 12: Thy bruise is incurable, thy wound is very grievous. Now the sin of despair is incurable, according to Jerem. 15. 18: My wound is desperate so as to refuse to be healed (Vulg.,—Why is my wound, etc.). Therefore despair is a most grievous sin.

I answer that, Those sins which are contrary to the theological virtues are generically more grievous than others because, since the theological virtues have God for their object, the sins which are opposed to them imply turning away from God directly and principally. Now every mortal sin takes its principal malice and gravity from the fact of its turning away from God, for if it were possible to turn to a changeable good, even inordinately, without turning away from God, it would not be a mortal sin. Consequently a sin which, first and of its very nature, includes turning away from God, is most grievous among mortal sins.

Now unbelief, despair and hatred of God are opposed to the theological virtues; and among them, if we compare hatred of God and unbelief to despair, we shall find that, in themselves, that is, in respect of their proper species, they are more grievous. For unbelief is due to a man not believing God's own truth, while the hatred of God arises from man's will being opposed to God's goodness itself; but despair consists in a man ceasing to hope for a share of God's goodness. Hence it is clear that unbelief and hatred of God are against God as He is in Himself, while despair is against Him according as His good is shared in by us. Therefore strictly speaking it is a more grievous sin to disbelieve God's truth or to hate God than not to hope to receive glory from Him.

If, however, despair be compared to the other two sins from man's point of view, then despair is more dangerous, since hope withdraws us from evils and induces us to seek for good things, so that when hope is given up, men rush headlong into sin, and are drawn away from good works. And so a gloss on Prov. 24. 10, If thou lose hope being weary in the day of distress, thy strength shall be diminished, says:¹ "Nothing is more hateful than despair, for the man that has it loses his constancy both in the every day toils of this life, and, what is worse, in the battle of faith." And Isidore says (De Sum. Bono, ii, 14):² "To commit a crime is to kill the soul, but to despair is to fall into hell."

ARTICLE 4. Whether Despair Arises From Sloth?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that despair does not arise from sloth.

Objection 1. Because different causes do not give rise to one same effect. "Now despair of the future life arises from lust," according to Gregory (Moral. xxxi, 45),³ Therefore it does not arise from sloth.

Obj. 2. Further, Just as despair is contrary to hope, so is sloth contrary to spiritual joy. But spiritual joy arises from hope, according to Rom. 12. 12, rejoicing in hope. Therefore sloth arises from despair, and not vice versa.

Obj. 3. Further, Contrary effects have contrary causes. Now hope, the contrary of which is despair, seems to proceed from the consideration of Divine favours, especially the Incarnation, for Augustine says (De Trin. xiii, 10):⁴ "Nothing was so necessary to raise our hope, than that we should be shown how much God loves us. Now what greater proof could we have of this than that God's Son should deign to unite Himself to our nature?" Therefore despair arises rather from the neglect of the above consideration than from sloth.

On the contrary, Gregory (Moral. xxxi, loc. cit.) reckons despair among the effects of sloth.

I answer that, As stated above (Q. XVII, A. 1; Part I-II, Q. XL, A. 1), the object of hope is a good, difficult but possible to obtain by oneself or by another. Consequently the hope of obtaining happiness may be lacking in a person in two ways: first, through his not considering it an arduous good, secondly, through his considering it impossible to obtain either by himself, or by another. Now, the fact that spiritual goods taste good to us no more, or seem to be goods of no great account, is chiefly due to our affections being infected with the love of bodily pleasures, among which sexual pleasures hold the first place; for the love of those pleasures leads man to have a distaste for spiritual things, and not to hope for them as arduous goods. In this way despair is caused by lust.

On the other hand, the fact that a man considers an arduous good impossible to obtain, either by himself or by another, is due to his being over downcast, because when this state of mind dominates his affections, it seems to him that he will never be able to rise to any good. And since sloth is a sadness that casts down the spirit, in this way despair is born of sloth.

Now this is the proper object of hope.—that the thing is possible, because the good and the arduous pertain to other passions also. Hence despair is born of sloth in a more special way, though it may arise from lust, for the reason given above.

This suffices for the Reply to the First Objection.

Reply Obj. 2. According to the Philosopher,⁵ just as hope gives rise to joy, so, when a man

⁵ Rhetoric, I, 11 (1370^a30); cf. II, 2, 12 (1378^b2; 1389^a19).

is joyful he has greater hope; and, accordingly, those who are sorrowful fall the more easily into despair, according to II Cor. 2. 7: Lest . . . such an one be swallowed up by overmuch sorrow. Yet, since the object of hope is good, to which the appetite tends naturally, and which it shuns not naturally but only on account of some supervening obstacle, it follows that, more directly, hope gives birth to joy, while on the contrary despair is born of sorrow.

Reply Obj. 3. This very neglect to consider the Divine favours arises from sloth. For when a man is influenced by a certain passion he considers chiefly the things which pertain to that passion, so that a man who is full of sorrow does not easily think of great and joyful things, but only of sad things, unless by a great effort he turn his thoughts away from sadness.

QUESTION XXI

OF PRESUMPTION

(In Four Articles)

WE must now consider presumption, under which head there are four points of inquiry: (1) What is the object on which presumption is based? (2) Whether presumption is a sin? (3) To what is it opposed? (4) From what vice does it arise?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Presumption Is Based on God, or in Our Own Power?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that presumption, which is a sin against the Holy Ghost, is based, not in God, but on our own power.

Objection 1. For the lesser the power, the more grievously does he sin who leans too much on it. But man's power is less than God's. Therefore it is a more grievous sin to presume on human power than to presume on the power of God. Now the sin against the Holy Ghost is most grievous. Therefore presumption, which is counted as a species of sin Against the Holy Ghost, clings to human rather than to Divine power.

Obj. 2. Further, Other sins arise from the sin against the Holy Ghost, for this sin is called malice which is a source from which sins arise. Now other sins seem to arise from the presumption by which man presumes on himself, rather than from the presumption by which he presumes on God, since self-love is the origin of sin, according to Augustine.¹ Therefore it seems that presumption which is a sin against the Holy Ghost, relies chiefly on human power.

Obj. 3. Further, Sin arises from the inordinate turning to a changeable good. Now presumption is a sin. Therefore it arises from turning to human power, which is a changeable good, rather than from turning to the power of God, which is an immutable good.

On the contrary, Just as, through despair, a man despises the Divine mercy, on which hope relies, so, through presumption, he despises the Divine justice, which punishes the sinner. Now justice is in God even as mercy is. Therefore, just as despair consists in turning from God, so presumption consists in an inordinate turning to Him.

I answer that, Presumption seems to imply immoderate hope. Now the object of hope is an arduous possible good, and a thing is possible to a man in two ways, first by his own power, secondly by the power of God alone. With regard to either hope there may be presumption owing to lack of moderation. As to the hope with which a man relies on his own power, there is presumption if he tends to a good which surpasses his powers as though it were possible to him, according to Judith 6. 15: Thou humblest them that presume of themselves. This presumption is contrary to the virtue of magnanimity which holds to the mean in this kind of hope.

But as to the hope with which a man relies on the power of God, there may be presumption through immoderation, in the fact that a man tends to some good which is not possible as though it were possible by the power and mercy of God, for instance, if a man hope to obtain pardon without repenting, or glory without merits. This presumption is, properly, a species of sin against the Holy Ghost, because, namely, by presuming thus a man removes or despises the assistance of the Holy Spirit, by which he is withdrawn from sin.

Reply Obj. 1. As stated above (Q. xx, A. 3; Part I-II, Q. lxxiii, A. 3) a sin which is against God is, in its genus, graver than other sins. Hence presumption by which a man relies on God inordinately is a more grievous sin than the presumption of leaning on one's own power, since to rely on the Divine power for obtaining what is unbecoming to God, is to depreciate the Divine power, and it is evident that it is a graver sin to detract from the Divine power than to exaggerate one's own.

Reply Obj. 2. The presumption by which a man presumes inordinately on God includes self-love, by which he loves his own good inordinately. For when we desire a thing very much, we think we can easily procure it through others, even though we cannot.

Reply Obj. 3. Presumption on God's mercy implies both turning to a changeable good, in so far as it arises from an inordinate desire of one's own good, and turning away from the immutable good, in as much as it ascribes to the Divine power that which is unbecoming to it, for thus man turns away from God's power.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Presumption Is a Sin?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that presumption is not a sin.

Objection 1. For no sin is a reason why man should be heard by God. Yet, through presumption some are heard by God, for it is written (Judith 9. 17): Hear me a poor wretch making supplication to Thee, and presuming of Thy mercy. Therefore presumption on God's mercy is not a sin.

Obj. 2. Further, Presumption denotes excessive hope. But there cannot be excess of that hope which is in God, since His power and mercy are infinite. Therefore it seems that presumption is not a sin.

Obj. 3. Further, That which is a sin does not excuse from sin. But presumption excuses from sin; for the Master says (Sent. ii. d. 22)¹ that Adam sinned less, because he sinned in the hope of pardon, which seems to indicate presumption. Therefore presumption is not a sin.

On the contrary, It is counted as a species of sin against the Holy Ghost.

I answer that, As stated above (Q. xx. A. 1) with regard to despair, every appetitive movement that is conformed to a false intellect, is evil in itself and sinful. Now presumption is an appetitive movement, since it denotes an inordinate hope. Moreover it is conformed to a false intellect, just as despair is; for just as it is false that God does not pardon the repentant, or that He does not turn sinners to repentance, so is it false that He grants forgiveness to those who persevere in their sins, and that He gives glory to those who cease from good works. And it is to this opinion that the movement of presumption is conformed. Consequently presumption is a sin, but less grave than despair, since, on account of His infinite goodness, it is more proper to God to have mercy and to spare, than to punish; for the former becomes God in Himself, the latter becomes Him by reason of our sins.

Reply Obj. 1. Presumption sometimes stands for hope, because even the right hope which we have in God seems to be presumption, if it be measured according to man's estate. Yet it is not presumption if we look at the immensity of the goodness of God.

Reply Obj. 2. Presumption does not denote excessive hope, as though man hoped too much in God, but through man hoping to obtain from God something unbecoming to Him, which is the same as to hope too little in Him, since it implies a depreciation of His power, as stated above (A. 1, reply 1).

Reply Obj. 3. To sin with the intention of persevering in sin and through the hope of being pardoned, is presumptuous, and this does not diminish, but increases sin. To sin, however, with the hope of obtaining pardon some time, and with the intention of refraining from sin and of repenting of it, is not presumptuous, but diminishes sin, because this seems to indicate a will less hardened in sin.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Presumption Is More Opposed to Fear Than to Hope?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that presumption is more opposed to fear than to hope.

Objection 1. Because inordinate fear is opposed to right fear. Now presumption seems to pertain to inordinate fear, for it is written (Wisd. 17. 10): A troubled conscience always presumes (Douay,—forecasteth) grievous things, and (ibid. 11) that fear is a help to presumption. (Vulg.—Fear is nothing else but a yielding up of the succours from thought.) Therefore presumption is opposed to fear rather than to hope.

Obj. 2. Further, Contraries are most distant from one another. Now presumption is more distant from fear than from hope, because presumption implies movement to something, just as hope does, while fear denotes movement from a thing. Therefore presumption is more contrary to fear than to hope.

Obj. 3. Further, Presumption excludes fear altogether, while it does not exclude hope altogether, but only the rectitude of hope. Since therefore opposites destroy one another, it seems that presumption is opposed to fear rather than to hope.

On the contrary, When two vices are opposed to one another they are contrary to the same virtue, as timidity and audacity are opposed to fortitude. Now the sin of presumption is contrary to the sin of despair, which is directly opposed to hope. Therefore it seems that presumption also is more directly opposed to hope.

I answer that, As Augustine states (Contra Julian. iv, 3),¹ "every virtue not only has a contrary vice manifestly distinct from it, as temerity is opposed to prudence, but also a sort of kindred vice, alike, not in truth but only in its deceitful appearance, as cunning is opposed to prudence." This agrees with the Philosopher who says² that a virtue seems to have more in common with one of the opposite vices than with the other, as temperance with insensibility, and fortitude with audacity. Accordingly presumption appears to be manifestly opposed to fear, especially servile fear, which looks to the punishment arising from God's justice, the remission of which presumption hopes for; yet by a kind of false likeness it is more opposed to hope, since it denotes an inordinate hope in God. And since things are more directly opposed when they belong to the same genus than when they belong to different genera, it follows that presumption is more directly opposed to hope than to fear. For they both look to and rely on the same object, hope in an orderly way, presumption inordinately.

Reply Obj. 1. Just as hope is misused in speaking of evils, and properly applied in speaking of good, so is presumption; it is in this way that inordinate fear is called presumption.

Reply Obj. 2. Contraries are things that are most distant from one another within the same genus. Now presumption and hope denote a movement of the same genus, which can be either ordered or inordinate. Hence presumption is more directly contrasted to hope than to fear, since it is contrasted to hope by reason of a proper difference, as an inordinate thing to an ordinate one, while it is contrasted to fear in respect of its generic difference, which is the movement of hope.

Reply Obj. 3. Presumption is contrasted to fear by a generic contrariety, and to the virtue of hope by a contrariety of difference. Hence presumption excludes fear altogether even generically; but it does not exclude hope except by reason of its difference, by excluding its ordinateness.

ARTICLE 4. Whether Presumption Arises From Vainglory?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that presumption does not arise from vainglory.

Objection 1. For presumption seems to rely most of all on the Divine mercy. Now mercy (misericordia) regards unhappiness (miseria) which is contrary to glory. Therefore presumption does not arise from vainglory.

Obj. 2. Further, Presumption is opposed to despair. Now despair arises from sorrow, as stated above (q. xx, a. 4, reply 2). Since therefore opposites have opposite causes, presumption would seem to arise from pleasure, and consequently from sins of the flesh, which give the most absorbing pleasure.

Obj. 3. Further, The vice of presumption consists in tending to some impossible good as though it were possible. Now it is owing to ignorance that one thinks an impossible thing to be possible. Therefore presumption arises from ignorance rather than from vainglory.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Moral. xxxi, 45)³ that "presumption of novelties is a daughter of vainglory."

I answer that, As stated above (a. 1), presumption is twofold. One by which a man leans on his own power, when he attempts something beyond his power, as though it were possible to him. And presumption of this kind clearly arises from vainglory, for it is owing to a great desire for glory that a man attempts things beyond his power, and especially novelties which call for greater admiration. Hence Gregory states explicitly that presumption of novelties is a daughter of vainglory. The other presumption is an inordinate trust in the Divine mercy or power, consisting in the hope of obtaining glory without merits, or pardon without repentance. Such-like presumption seems to arise directly from pride, as though man thought so much of himself as to think that God would not punish him or exclude him from glory, however much he might be a sinner.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

QUESTION XXII

OF THE PRECEPTS RELATING TO HOPE

AND FEAR

(In Two Articles)

WE must now consider the precepts relating to hope and fear, under which head there are two points of inquiry: (1) The precepts relating to hope; (2) The precepts relating to fear.

ARTICLE 1. Whether There Should Be a Precept of Hope?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that no precept should be given relating to the virtue of hope.

Objection 1. For when an effect is sufficiently procured by one cause, there is no need to induce it by another. Now man is sufficiently induced by his natural inclination to hope for good. Therefore there is no need of a precept of the Law to induce him to do this.

Obj. 2. Further, Since precepts are given about acts of virtue, the chief precepts are about the acts of the chief virtues. Now the chief of all the virtues are the three theological virtues, namely, hope, faith and charity. Consequently, as the chief precepts of the Law are those of the decalogue, to which all others may be reduced, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. c, A. 3), it seems that if any precept of hope were given, it should be found among the precepts of the decalogue. But it is not to be found there. Therefore it seems that the Law should contain no precept of hope.

Obj. 3. Further, To prescribe an act of virtue is equivalent to a prohibition of the act of the opposite vice. Now no precept is to be found forbidding despair which is contrary to hope. Therefore it seems unfitting for a precept of hope to be given.

On the contrary, Augustine says on John 15. 12, This is My commandment, that you love one another (Tract. lxxxiii in Joann.):¹ "How many things are commanded us about faith! How many relating to hope!" Therefore it is fitting that some precepts should be given about hope.

I answer that, Among the precepts contained in Holy Writ, some belong to the substance of the Law, others are preambles to the Law. The preambles to the Law are those without which no law is possible; such are the precepts relating to the act of faith and the act of hope, because the act of faith inclines man's mind so that he recognizes the Author of the Law to be One to Whom he owes submission, while, by the hope of a reward, he is induced to observe the precepts. The precepts that belong to the substance of the Law are those which relate to right conduct and are imposed on man already subject and ready to obey. And therefore when the Law was given these precepts were set forth from the very outset under the form of a command.

Yet the precepts of hope and faith were not to be given under the form of a command, since, unless man already believed and hoped, it would be useless to give him the Law. But, just as the precept of faith had to be given under the form of an announcement or reminder, as stated above (Q. XVI, A. 1), so too, the precept of hope, in the first promulgation of the Law, had to be given under the form of a promise. For he who promises rewards to them that obey him, by that very fact, urges them to hope. Hence all the promises contained in the Law are incitements to hope.

Since, however, when once the Law has been given, it is for a wise man to induce men not only to observe the precepts, but also, and much more, to safeguard the foundation of the Law, therefore, after the first promulgation of the Law, Holy Writ holds out to man many inducements to hope, even by way of warning or command, and not merely by way of promise, as in the Law; for instance in the Psalm (61. 9): Hope (Douay,—Trust) in Him all ye congregation of the people, and in many other passages of the Scriptures.

Reply Obj. 1. Nature inclines us to hope for the good which is proportionate to human nature; but for man to hope for a supernatural good he had to be induced by the authority of the Divine law, partly by promises, partly by admonitions and commands. Nevertheless there was need for precepts of the Divine law to be given even for those things to which natural reason inclines us, such as the acts of the moral virtues, for the sake of insuring a greater stability, especially since the natural reason of man was clouded by the lusts of sin.

Reply Obj. 2. The precepts of the law of the decalogue belong to the first promulgation of the Law. Hence there was no need for giving a precept of hope among the precepts of the decalogue, and it was enough to induce men to hope by the inclusion of certain promises, as in the case of the first and fourth commandments.

Reply Obj. 3. In those observances to which man is bound as under a duty, it is enough that he receive an affirmative precept as to what he has to do, in which is implied the prohibition of what he must avoid doing. Thus he is given a precept concerning the honour due to parents, but not a prohibition against dishonouring them, except by the law inflicting punishment on those who dishonour their parents. And since in order to be saved it is man's duty to hope in God, he had to be induced to do so by one of the above ways, affirmatively, so to speak, and in which is implied the prohibition of the opposite.

ARTICLE 2. Whether There Should Have Been Given a Precept of Fear?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that, in the Law, there should not have been given a precept of fear.

Objection 1. For the fear of God is about things which are a preamble to the Law, since it is the beginning of wisdom (Ps. 110. 10). Now things which are a preamble to the Law do not come under a precept of the Law. Therefore no precept of fear should be given in the Law.

Obj. 2. Further, Given the cause, the effect is also given. Now love is the cause of fear, since every fear proceeds from some kind of love, as Augustine states (Qq. LXXXIII. qu. 33).¹ Therefore given the precept of love, it would have been superfluous to command fear.

Obj. 3. Further, Presumption, in a way, is opposed to fear. But the Law contains no prohibition against presumption. Therefore it seems that neither should any precept of fear have been given.

On the contrary, It is written (Deut. 10. 12): And now, Israel, what doth the Lord thy God require of thee, but that thou fear the Lord thy God? But He requires of us that which He commands us to do. Therefore it is a matter of precept that man should fear God.

I answer that, Fear is twofold, servile and filial. Now just as man is induced, by the hope of rewards, to observe precepts of law, so too is he induced thereto by the fear of punishment, which fear is servile. And just as according to what has been said (A. 1), in the promulgation of the Law there was no need for a precept of the act of hope, and men were to be induced to hope by promises, so neither was there need for a precept, under form of command, of fear which regards punishment, and men were to be induced to this fear by the threat of punishment. And this was realized both in the precepts of the decalogue, and afterwards, in due sequence, in the secondary precepts of the Law. Yet, just as the wise men and the prophets who, consequently, strove to strengthen man in the observance of the Law, delivered their teaching about hope under the form of admonition or command, so too did they in the matter of fear.

On the other hand filial fear which shows reverence to God, is a sort of genus in respect of the love of God, and a kind of principle of all observances connected with reverence for God. Hence precepts of filial fear are given in the Law, even as precepts of love, because each is a preamble to the external acts prescribed by the Law and to which the precepts of the decalogue pertain. Hence in the passage quoted in the argument On the contrary, man is required to have fear, and to walk in God's ways, by worshipping Him, and to love Him.

Reply Obj. 1. Filial fear is a preamble to the Law, not as though it were extrinsic to it, but as being a principle of the Law, just as love is. Hence precepts are given of both, since they are like general principles of the whole Law.

Reply Obj. 2. From love proceeds filial fear, as also other good works that are done from charity. Hence, just as after the precept of charity, precepts are given of the other acts of virtue, so at the same time precepts are given of fear and of the love of charity, just as, in demonstrative sciences, it is not enough to lay down the first principles, unless the conclusions also are given which follow from them proximately or remotely.

Reply Obj. 3. Inducement to fear suffices to exclude presumption, even as inducement to hope suffices to exclude despair, as stated above (A. 1, reply 3).

QUESTION XXIII

OF CHARITY, CONSIDERED IN ITSELF

(In Eight Articles)

In proper sequence, we must consider charity; and (1) charity itself; (2) the corresponding gift of wisdom (Q. XLV). The first consideration will be fivefold: (1) Charity itself; (2) The object of charity (Q. XXV); (3) Its acts (Q. XXVII); (4) The opposite vices (Q. XXXIV); (5) The precepts relating to charity (Q. XLIV);

The first of these considerations will be twofold: (1) Charity, considered in itself; (2) Charity, considered in its relation to its subject (Q. XXIV). Under the first head there are eight points of inquiry: (1) Whether charity is friendship? (2) Whether it is something created in the soul? (3) Whether it is a virtue? (4) Whether it is a special virtue? (5) Whether it is one virtue? (6) Whether it is the greatest of the virtues? (7) Whether any true virtue is possible without it? (8) Whether it is the form of the virtues?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Charity Is Friendship?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that charity is not friendship.

Objection 1. "For nothing is so proper to friendship as to dwell with one's friend," according to the Philosopher.² Now charity is of man towards God and the angels, whose dwelling (Douay.—conversation) is not with men (Dan. 2. 11). Therefore charity is not friendship.

Obj. 2. Further, There is no friendship without return of love.³ But charity extends even to one's enemies, according to Matt. 5. 44: Love your enemies. Therefore charity is not friendship.

³ Ibid., VIII, 2 (1155^b28).

Obj. 3. Further, According to the Philosopher¹ there are three kinds of friendship, directed respectively towards the delightful, the useful, or the virtuous. Now charity is not friendship for the useful or delightful; for Jerome says in his letter to Paulinus² which is to be found at the beginning of the Bible: "True friendship cemented by Christ, is where men are drawn together, not by household interests, not by mere bodily presence, not by crafty and cajoling flattery, but by the fear of God, and the study of the Divine Scriptures." No more is it friendship for the virtuous, since by charity we love even sinners, while friendship based on the virtuous is only for virtuous men.³ Therefore charity is not friendship.

On the contrary, It is written (John 15. 15): I will not now call you servants . . . but My friends. Now this was said to them by reason of nothing else than charity. Therefore charity is friendship.

I answer that, According to the Philosopher,⁴ not every love has the character of friendship, but that love which is together with benevolence, when, that is, we love someone so as to wish good to him. If, however, we do not wish good to what we love, but wish its good for ourselves. (thus we are said to love wine, or a horse, or the like) it is love not of friendship, but of a kind of concupiscence. For it would be absurd to speak of having friendship for wine or for a horse. Yet neither does well-wishing suffice for friendship, for a certain mutual love is requisite, since friendship is between friend and friend: and this mutual well-wishing is founded on some kind of communication. Accordingly, since there is a communication between man and God, in so far as He communicates His happiness to us, there must be some kind of friendship based on this same communication, of which it is written (I Cor. 1. 9): God is faithful: by Whom you are called unto the fellowship of His Son. The love which is based on this communication, is charity. And so it is evident that charity is the friendship of man for God.

Reply Obj. 1. Man's life is twofold. There is his outward life in respect of his sensitive and corporeal nature, and with regard to this life there is no communication or fellowship between us and God or the angels. The other is man's spiritual life in respect of his mind, and with regard to this life there is fellowship between us and both God and the angels, imperfectly indeed in this present state of life, and so it is written (Phil. 3. 20): Our conversation is in heaven. But this "conversation" will be perfected in heaven, when His servants shall serve Him, and they shall see His face (Apoc. 22. 3, 4). Therefore charity is imperfect here, but will be perfected in heaven.

Reply Obj. 2. Friendship extends to a person in two ways: first in respect of himself, and in this way friendship never extends but to one's friend; secondly, it extends to someone in respect of another, as, when a man has friendship for a certain person, for his sake he loves all belonging to him, be they children, servants, or connected with him in any way. Indeed, so much do we love our friends, that for their sake we love all who belong to them, even if they hurt or hate us. And in this way, the friendship of charity extends even to our enemies, whom we love out of charity in relation to God, to Whom the friendship of charity is chiefly directed.

Reply Obj. 3. The friendship that is based on the virtuous is directed to none but a virtuous man as the principal person, but for his sake we love those who belong to him, even though they be not virtuous. In this way charity, which above all is friendship based on the virtuous, extends to sinners, whom, out of charity, we love for God's sake.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Charity Is Something Created in the Soul?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that charity is not something created in the soul.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (De Trin. viii, 7):⁵ "He that loves his neighbour, consequently, loves love itself. Now God is love. Therefore it follows that he loves God principally." Again he says (De Trin. xv, 17):⁶ "It was said: God is charity, even as it was said: God is a Spirit." Therefore charity is not something created in the soul, but in God Himself.

Obj. 2. Further, God is the life of the soul spiritually, just as the soul is the life of the body, according to Deut. 30. 20: He is thy life. Now the soul by itself quickens the body. Therefore God quickens the soul by Himself. But He quickens it by charity, according to I John 3. 14: We know that we have passed from death to life, because we love the brethren. Therefore God is charity itself.

Obj. 3. Further. No created thing is of infinite power; on the contrary every creature is vanity. But charity is not vanity, but rather is opposed to vanity; and it is of infinite power, since it brings the human soul to the infinite good. Therefore charity is not something created in the soul.

On the contrary, Augustine says:¹ "By charity I mean the movement of the soul towards the enjoyment of God for His own sake." But a movement of the soul is something created in the soul. Therefore charity is something created in the soul.

I answer that, The Master looks thoroughly into this question in Q. XVII. of the First Book of the Sentences,² and concludes that charity is not something created in the soul, but is the Holy Ghost Himself dwelling in the mind. Nor does he mean to say that this movement of love by which we love God is the Holy Ghost Himself, but that this movement of love is from the Holy Ghost without any intermediary habit, while other virtuous acts are from the Holy Ghost by means of the habits of other virtues, for instance the habit of faith or hope or of some other virtue. And this he said on account of the excellence of charity.

But if we consider the matter rightly this would be, on the contrary, detrimental to charity. For when the Holy Ghost moves the human mind the movement of charity does not proceed from this motion in such a way that the human mind is merely moved, without being the principle of this movement, as when a body is moved by some extrinsic motive power. For this is contrary to the notion of a voluntary act, whose principle needs to be in itself, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. VI, A. 1), so that it would follow that to love is not a voluntary act, which involves a contradiction, since love, of its very notion, implies an act of the will.

Likewise, neither can it be said that the Holy Ghost moves the will in such a way to the act of loving, as though the will were an instrument, for an instrument, though it is a principle of action, nevertheless has not the power to act or not to act, for then again the act would cease to be voluntary and meritorious, although it has been stated above (Part I-II, Q. CXIV, A. 4) that the love of charity is the root of merit. The will must be so moved by the Holy Ghost to the act of love, that the will itself also is the efficient cause of that act.

Now no act is perfectly produced by an active power, unless it be of the very nature of that power by reason of some form which is the principle of that action. Therefore God, Who moves all things to their due ends, bestowed on each thing the form by which it is inclined to the end appointed to it by Him; and in this way He ordereth all things sweetly (Wisd. 8. 1). But it is evident that the act of charity surpasses the nature of the power of the will, so that, therefore, unless some form be superadded to the natural power, inclining it to the act of love, this same act would be less perfect than the natural acts and the acts of the other powers; nor would it be easy and pleasurable to perform. And this is evidently untrue, since no virtue has such a strong inclination to its act as charity has, nor does any virtue perform its act with so great pleasure. Therefore it is most necessary that, for us to perform the act of charity, there should be in us some habitual form superadded to the natural power, inclining that power to the act of charity, and causing it to act with ease and pleasure.

Reply Obj. 1. The Divine Essence Itself is charity, even as It is wisdom, and goodness. Therefore just as we are said to be good with the goodness which is God, and wise with the wisdom which is God (since the goodness by which we are formally good is a participation of Divine goodness, and the wisdom by which we are formally wise, is a share of Divine wisdom), so too, the charity by which formally we love our neighbour is a participation of Divine charity. For this manner of speaking is common among the Platonists, with whose doctrines Augustine was imbued; and the failure to refer to this has been to some an occasion of error.³

Reply Obj. 2. God is effectively the life both of the soul by charity, and of the body by the soul; but formally charity is the life of the soul, even as the soul is the life of the body. Consequently we may conclude from this that just as the soul is immediately united to the body, so is charity to the soul.

Reply Obj. 3. Charity works formally. Now the efficacy of a form depends on the power of the agent, who instils the form, and therefore it is evident that charity is not vanity. But because it produces an infinite effect, since, by justifying the soul, it unites it to God, this proves the infinity of the Divine power, which is the author of charity.

³ Peter Lombard, Sent., I, d. 17, chap. 1 (QR 1, 106).

ARTICLE 3. Whether Charity Is a Virtue?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that charity is not a virtue.

Objection 1. For charity is a kind of friendship. Now philosophers do not count friendship a virtue, as may be gathered from the Ethics;¹ nor is it numbered among the virtues whether moral or intellectual. Neither, therefore, is charity a virtue.

Obj. 2. Further, "Virtue is the ultimate limit of power."² But charity is not something ultimate, for it applies rather to joy and peace. Therefore it seems that charity is not a virtue, but rather is joy and peace.

Obj. 3. Further, Every virtue is an accidental habit. But charity is not an accidental habit, since it is a more excellent thing than the soul itself. But no accident is more excellent than its subject. Therefore charity is not a virtue.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Moribus Eccl. xi):³ "Charity is a virtue which, when our affections are perfectly ordered, unites us to God, for by it we love Him."

I answer that, Human acts are good according as they are regulated by their due rule and measure. Therefore human virtue which is the principle of all man's good acts consists in following the rule of human acts, which is twofold, as stated above (Q. XVII, A. 1), namely, human reason and God. Consequently just as moral virtue is defined as being in accord with right reason, as stated in the Ethics,⁴ so too the nature of virtue consists in attaining God, as also stated above with regard to faith (Q. IV, A. 3) and hope (Q. XVII, A. 1). Therefore, it follows that charity is a virtue, for, since charity attains God, it unites us to God, as evidenced by the authority of Augustine quoted above.

Reply Obj. 1. The Philosopher does not deny that friendship is a virtue, but affirms that it is "either a virtue or with a virtue."⁵ For we might say that it is a moral virtue about works done in respect of another person, but under a different aspect from justice. For justice is about works done in respect of another person under the aspect of the legal due, while friendship considers the aspect of a friendly and moral duty, or rather that of a gratuitous favour, as the Philosopher explains.⁶ Nevertheless it may be admitted that it is not a virtue distinct of itself from the other virtues. For its praiseworthiness and virtuousness are derived merely from its object, in so far, that is, as it is based on the moral goodness of the virtues. This is evident from the fact that not every friendship is praiseworthy and virtuous, as in the case of friendship based on pleasure or utility. Therefore friendship for the virtuous is something consequent to virtue rather than a virtue. Moreover there is no comparison with charity since it is not founded principally on the virtue of a man, but on the goodness of God.

Reply Obj. 2. It belongs to the same virtue to love a man and to rejoice about him, since joy results from love, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XXV, A. 2) in the treatise on the passions. And therefore love is considered a virtue, rather than joy, which is an effect of love. And when virtue is described as being something ultimate, we mean that it is last, not in the order of effect, but in the order of excess, just as one hundred pounds exceed forty.

Reply Obj. 3. Every accident is inferior to substance if we consider its being, since substance is a being in itself, while an accident has its being in another. But considered as to its species, an accident which results from the principles of its subject is inferior to its subject, even as an effect is inferior to its cause. But an accident that results from a participation of some higher nature is more excellent than its subject, in so far as it is a likeness of that higher nature, even as light is superior to the diaphanous body. In this way charity is more excellent than the soul, since it is a participation of the Holy Ghost.

ARTICLE 4 Whether Charity is a Special Virtue?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that charity is not a special virtue.

Objection 1. For Jerome says: "Let me briefly define all virtue as the charity with which we love God and our neighbour";⁷ and Augustine says (De Moribus Eccl.)⁸ that virtue is "the order of love." Now no special virtue is included in the definition of virtue in general. Therefore charity is not a special virtue.

Obj. 2. Further, That which extends to all works of virtue, cannot be a special virtue. But charity extends to all works of virtue, according to I Cor. 13. 4: Charity is patient, is kind, etc.; indeed it extends to all human works according to I Cor. 16. 14: Let all your things be done in charity. Therefore charity is not a special virtue.

Obj. 3. Further, The precepts of the Law refer to acts of virtue. Now Augustine says (De Perfect. Human. Justit. v, 5)¹ that, "Thou shalt love" is a general commandment, and 'Thou shalt not covet,' a general prohibition." Therefore charity is a general virtue.

On the contrary, Nothing general is enumerated together with what is special. But charity is enumerated together with special virtues, namely hope and faith, according to I Cor. 13. 13: And now there remains faith, hope, charity, these three. Therefore charity is a special virtue.

I answer that, Acts and habits are specified by their objects, as shown above (Part I-II, Q. XVIII, A. 2; Q. LIV, A. 2). Now the proper object of love is the good, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XXVII, A. 1), so that wherever there is a special aspect of good, there is a special kind of love. But the Divine good, in so far as it is the object of happiness, has a special aspect of good. And so the love of charity, which is the love of that good, is a special kind of love. Therefore charity is a special virtue.

Reply Obj. 1. Charity is included in the definition of every virtue, not as being essentially every virtue, but because every virtue depends on it in a way, as we shall state further on (A. 7). In this same way prudence is included in the definition of the moral virtues, as explained in the Ethics,² from the fact that they depend on prudence.

Reply Obj. 2. The virtue or art which is concerned about the last end, commands the virtues or arts which are concerned about other ends which are secondary, just as the military art commands the art of horse-riding.³ Accordingly since charity has for its object the last end of human life, namely everlasting happiness, it follows that it extends to the acts of a man's whole life, by commanding them, not by eliciting immediately all acts of virtue.

Reply Obj. 3. The precept of love is said to be a general command because all other precepts are reduced to it as to their end, according to I Tim. 1. 5: The end of the commandment is charity.

ARTICLE 5. Whether Charity Is One Virtue?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It seems that charity is not one virtue.

Objection 1. For habits are distinct according to their objects. Now there are two objects of charity,—God and our neighbour, which are infinitely distant from one another. Therefore charity is not one virtue.

Obj. 2. Further, Different aspects of the object diversify a habit, even though that object be one in reality, as shown above (Q. XVII, A. 6; Part I-II, Q. LIV, A. 2, reply 1). Now there are many aspects under which God is an object of love, because we are debtors to His love by reason of each one of His favours. Therefore charity is not one virtue.

Obj. 3. Further, Charity comprises friendship for our neighbour. But the Philosopher posits several species of friendship.⁴ Therefore charity is not one virtue, but is multiplied in different species.

On the contrary, Just as God is the object of faith, so is He the object of charity. Now faith is one virtue by reason of the unity of the Divine truth, according to Eph. 4. 5: One faith. Therefore charity also is one virtue by reason of the unity of the Divine goodness.

I answer that, Charity, as stated above (A. 1) is a kind of friendship of man for God. Now the different species of friendship are differentiated, first of all, in respect of a diversity of end, and in this way there are three species of friendship, namely friendship for the useful, for the delightful, and for the virtuous; secondly, in respect of the different kinds of communion on which friendships are based; thus there is one species of friendship between kinsmen, and another between fellow citizens or fellow travelers, the former being based on natural communion, the latter on civil communion or on the comradeship of the road, as the Philosopher explains.⁵ Now charity cannot be differentiated in either of these ways. For the end of charity is one, namely the goodness of God; and the fellowship of everlasting happiness, on which this friendship is based, is also one. Hence it follows that charity is one virtue absolutely and not divided into several species.

Reply Obj. 1. This argument would hold if God and our neighbour were equally objects of charity. But this is not true, for God is the principal object of charity, while our neighbour is loved out of charity for God's sake.

Reply Obj. 2. God is loved by charity for His own sake; hence charity regards principally but one aspect of loveliness, namely God's goodness, which is His substance, according to Ps. 105. 1: Give glory to the Lord for He is good. Other reasons that inspire us with love for Him, or which make it our duty to love Him, are secondary and result from the first.

Reply Obj. 3. Human friendship of which the Philosopher treats has various ends and various forms of fellowship. This does not apply to charity, as stated above. Therefore the comparison fails.

ARTICLE 6. Whether Charity Is the Most Excellent of the Virtues?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It seems that charity is not the most excellent of the virtues.

Objection 1. Because the higher power has the higher virtue even as it has a higher operation. Now the intellect is higher than the will, since it directs the will. Therefore faith, which is in the intellect, is more excellent than charity which is in the will.

Obj. 2. Further, The thing by which another works seems the less excellent of the two, even as a servant, by whom his master works, is beneath his master. Now faith . . . worketh by charity, according to Gal 5 6 Therefore faith is more excellent than charity.

Obj. 3. Further, That which is by way of addition to another seems to be the more perfect of the two. Now hope seems to be something additional to charity, for the object of charity is good, while the object of hope is an arduous good. Therefore hope is more excellent than charity.

On the contrary, It is written (I Cor. 13. 13): The greater of these is charity.

I answer that, Since good, in human acts, depends on their being regulated by the due rule, it is necessary that human virtue, which is a principle of good acts, consist in attaining the rule of human acts. Now the rule of human acts is twofold, as stated above (A. 3), namely, human reason and God. Yet God is the first rule, by which even human reason must be regulated. Consequently the theological virtues which consist in attaining this first rule, since their object is God, are more excellent than the moral, or the intellectual virtues, which consist in attaining human reason: and it follows that among the theological virtues themselves, the first place belongs to that which attains God most.

Now that which is of itself always ranks before that which is by another. But faith and hope attain God indeed in so far as we derive from Him the knowledge of truth or the acquisition of good; but charity attains God Himself that it may rest in Him, but not that something may accrue to us from Him. Hence charity is more excellent than faith or hope, and, consequently, than all the other virtues, just as prudence, which by itself attains reason, is more excellent than the other moral virtues, which attain reason in so far as it appoints the mean in human operations or passions.

Reply Obj. 1. The operation of the intellect is completed by the thing understood being in the understanding subject, so that the excellence of the intellectual operation is assessed according to the measure of the intellect. On the other hand, the operation of the will and of every appetitive power is completed in the tendency of the appetite towards a thing as its term, and therefore the excellence of the appetitive operation is gauged according to the thing which is the object of the operation. Now those things which are beneath the soul are more excellent in the soul than they are in themselves, because a thing is contained according to the mode of the container (De Causis, xii).¹ On the other hand, things that are above the soul, are more excellent in themselves than they are in the soul. Consequently it is better to know than to love the things that are beneath us; for which reason the Philosopher gave the preference to the intellectual virtues over the moral virtues:² but the love of the things that are above us, especially of God, ranks before the knowledge of such things. Therefore charity is more excellent than faith.

Reply Obj. 2. Faith works by love, not instrumentally, as a master by his servant, but as by its proper form; hence the argument does not prove.

Reply Obj. 3. The same good is the object of charity and of hope; but charity implies union with that good, while hope implies distance from it. Hence charity does not regard that good as being arduous, as hope does, since what is already united has not the character of arduous; and this shows that charity is more perfect than hope.

ARTICLE 7. Whether Any True Virtue Is Possible Without Charity?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It seems that there can be true virtue without charity.

Objection 1. For it is proper to virtue to produce a good act. Now those who have not charity do some good actions, as when they clothe the naked, or feed the hungry and so forth. Therefore true virtue is possible without charity.

Obj. 2. Further, Charity is not possible without faith, since it comes of an unfeigned faith, as the Apostle says (I Tim. 1. 5). Now, in unbelievers, there can be true chastity, if they curb their concupiscences, and true justice, if they judge rightly. Therefore true virtue is possible without charity.

Obj. 3. Further, Science and art are virtues, according to the Ethics.¹ But they are to be found in sinners who lack charity. Therefore true virtue can be without charity.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (I Cor. 13. 3): If I should distribute all my goods to the poor, and if I should deliver my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing. And yet true virtue is very profitable, according to Wisd. 8. 7: She teacheth temperance, and prudence, and justice, and fortitude, which are such things as men can have nothing more profitable in life. Therefore no true virtue is possible without charity.

I answer that, Virtue is ordered to the good, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LV, A. 4). Now the good is chiefly an end, for things directed to the end are not said to be good except in relation to the end. Accordingly, just as the end is twofold, the last end, and the proximate end, so also, is good twofold, one, the ultimate and universal good, the other proximate and particular. The ultimate and principal good of man is the enjoyment of God, according to Ps. 72. 28: It is good for me to adhere to God, and to this good man is ordered by charity. Man's secondary and, as it were, particular good may be twofold: one is truly good because, considered in itself, it can be directed to the principal good, which is the last end; while the other is good apparently and not truly, because it leads us away from the final good. Accordingly it is evident that absolutely true virtue is that which is directed to man's principal good; thus also the Philosopher says² that "virtue is the disposition of a perfect thing to that which is best"; and in this way no true virtue is possible without charity.

If, however, we take virtue as being ordered to some particular end, then we may speak of virtue being where there is no charity, in so far as it is directed to some particular good. But if this particular good is not a true, but an apparent good, it is not a true virtue that is ordered to such a good, but a false likeness to virtue. Even so, as Augustine says (Contra Julian. iv. 3),³ "the prudence of the miser, whereby he devises various roads to gain, is no true virtue; nor the miser's justice, whereby he scorns the property of another through fear of severe punishment; nor the miser's temperance, whereby he curbs his desire for expensive pleasures; nor the miser's fortitude, whereby as Horace says, 'he braves the sea, he crosses mountains, he goes through fire, in order to avoid poverty' (Epist. lib. i, Ep. i, 45)." If, on the other hand, this particular good be a true good, for instance the welfare of the state, or the like, it will indeed be a true virtue, imperfect, however, unless it be referred to the final and perfect good. Accordingly no strictly true virtue is possible without charity.

Reply Obj. 1. The act of one lacking charity may be of two kinds. One is in accordance with his lack of charity, as when he does something that is referred to that by which he lacks charity. Such an act is always evil; thus Augustine says (Contra Julian. iv, 3)⁴ that the actions which an unbeliever performs as an unbeliever, are always sinful, even when he clothes the naked, or does any like thing, and directs it to his unbelief as end.

There is, however, another act of one lacking charity, not in accordance with his lack of charity, but in accordance with his possession of some other gift of God, whether faith, or hope, or even his natural good, which is not completely taken away by sin, as stated above (Q. X, A. 4; Part I-II, Q. IXXXV, A. 2). In this way it is possible for an act, without charity, to be generically good, but not perfectly good, because it lacks its due order to the last end.

Reply Obj. 2. Since the end is in practical matters what the principle is in speculative matters, just as there can be no absolutely true science if a right estimation of the first indemonstrable principle be lacking, so, there can be no absolutely true justice, or chastity, without that due ordering to the end, which is effected by charity, however rightly a man may be affected about other matters.

Reply Obj. 3. Science and art of their very notion imply a relation to some particular good, and not to the ultimate good of human life, as do the moral virtues, which make man good absolutely, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LVI, A. 3). Hence the comparison fails.

ARTICLE 8. Whether Charity Is the Form of the Virtues?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It seems that charity is not the form of the virtues.

¹ Aristotle, vi, 3, 4, 5 (1139^b15; 1140^a20; 1140^b4).

Objection 1. Because the form of a thing is either exemplary or essential. Now charity is not the exemplary form of the other virtues, since it would follow that the other virtues are of the same species as charity; nor is it the essential form of the other virtues, since then it would not be distinct from them. Therefore it is in no way the form of the virtues.

Obj. 2. Further, Charity is compared to the other virtues as their root and foundation, according to Eph. 3. 17: Rooted and founded in charity. Now a root or foundation is not the form, but rather the matter of a thing, since it is the first part in the making. Therefore charity is not the form of the virtues.

Obj. 3. Further, Formal, final, and efficient causes do not coincide with one another.¹ Now charity is called the end and the mother of the virtues (I Tim. 1. 5). Therefore it should not be called their form.

On the contrary, Ambrose says that charity is the form of the virtues.²

I answer that, In morals the form of an act is taken chiefly from the end. The reason of this is that the principle of moral acts is the will, whose object and form, so to speak, are the end. Now the form of an act always follows from a form of the agent. Consequently, in morals, that which gives an act its order to the end, must give the act its form. Now it is evident, in accordance with what has been said (A. 7), that it is charity which directs the acts of all other virtues to the last end, and which, consequently, also gives the form to all other acts of virtue; and it is precisely in this sense that charity is called the form of the virtues, for these are called virtues in relation to "formed" acts.

Reply Obj. 1. Charity is called the form of the other virtues not as being their exemplary or their essential form, but rather by way of effective cause, in so far as it sets the form on all, in the aforesaid manner.

Reply Obj. 2. Charity is compared to the foundation or root in so far as all other virtues draw their sustenance and nourishment from it, and not in the sense that the foundation and root have the character of a material cause.

Reply Obj. 3. Charity is said to be the end of other virtues, because it directs all other virtues to its own end. And since a mother is one who conceives within herself and by another, charity is called the mother of the other virtues, because, by commanding them, it conceives the acts of the other virtues, by the desire of the last end.

QUESTION XXIV

OF THE SUBJECT OF CHARITY

(In Twelve Articles)

WE must now consider charity in relation to its subject, under which head there are twelve points of inquiry: (1) Whether charity is in the will as its subject? (2) Whether charity is caused in man by preceding acts or by a Divine infusion? (3) Whether it is infused according to our natural capacity? (4) Whether it increases in the person who has it? (5) Whether it increases by addition? (6) Whether it increases by every act? (7) Whether it increases without limit? (8) Whether the charity of a wayfarer can be perfect? (9) Of the various degrees of charity (10) Whether charity can diminish? (11) Whether charity can be lost after it has been possessed? (12) Whether it is lost through one mortal sin?

ARTICLE 1. Whether the Will Is the Subject of Charity?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that the will is not the subject of charity.

Objection 1. For charity is a kind of love. Now, according to the Philosopher³ "love is in the concupiscible part." Therefore charity is also in the concupiscible part and not in the will.

Obj. 2. Further, Charity is the foremost of the virtues, as stated above (Q. XXIII, A. 6). But the reason is the subject of virtue. Therefore it seems that charity is in the reason and not in the will.

Obj. 3. Further, Charity extends to all human acts, according to I Cor. 16. 14: Let all your things be done in charity. Now the principle of human acts is free choice. Therefore it seems that charity is chiefly in free choice as its subject, and not in the will.

On the contrary. The object of charity is the good, which is also the object of the will. Therefore charity is in the will as its subject.

I answer that, Since as stated in the First Part (Q. LXXX, A. 2), the appetite is twofold, namely the sensitive, and the intellectual which is called the will, the object of each is the good, but in different ways. For the object of the sensitive appetite is a good apprehended by sense, but the object of the intellectual appetite or will is good under the universal aspect of good, according as it can be apprehended by the intellect. Now the object of charity is not a sensible good, but the Divine good which is known by the intellect alone. Therefore the subject of charity is not the sensitive, but the intellectual appetite, that is, the will.

Reply Obj. 1. The concupiscible part is a part of the sensitive, not of the intellectual appetite, as proved in the First Part (Q. LXXXI, A. 2). Therefore the love which is in the concupiscible, is the love of sensible good. Nor can the concupiscible reach to the Divine good which is an intelligible good, but the will alone can. Consequently the concupiscible part cannot be the subject of charity.

Reply Obj. 2. According to the Philosopher,¹ the will also is in the reason. And therefore charity is not excluded from the reason through being in the will. Yet charity is regulated, not by the reason, as human virtues are, but by God's wisdom, and transcends the rule of human reason, according to Eph. 3. 19: The charity of Christ, which surpasseth all knowledge. Hence it is not in the reason, either as its subject, like prudence is, or as its rule, like justice and temperance are, but only by a certain kinship of the will to the reason.

Reply Obj. 3. As stated in the First Part (Q. LXXXIII, A. 4), the free choice is not a distinct power from the will. Yet charity is not in the will considered as free choice, the act of which is to choose. "For choice is of things directed to the end, whereas the will is of the end itself."² Hence charity, whose object is the last end, should be described as residing in the will rather than in free choice.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Charity Is Caused in Us by Infusion?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that charity is not caused in us by infusion.

Objection 1. For that which is common to all creatures, is in man naturally. Now, according to Dionysius (Div. Nom. iv),³ the Divine good, which is the object of charity, "is for all an object of dilection and love." Therefore charity is in us naturally, and not by infusion.

Obj. 2. Further, The more lovable a thing is, the easier it is to love it. Now God is supremely lovable, since He is supremely good. Therefore it is easier to love Him than other things. But we need no infused habit in order to love other things. Neither, therefore, do we need one in order to love God.

Obj. 3. Further, The Apostle says (I Tim. 1. 5): The end of the commandment is charity from a pure heart, and a good conscience, and an unfeigned faith. Now these three have reference to human acts. Therefore charity is caused in us from preceding acts, and not from infusion.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (Rom. 5. 5): The charity of God is poured forth in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, Who is given to us.

I answer that, As stated above (Q. XXIII, A. 1), charity is a friendship of man for God, founded upon the fellowship of everlasting happiness. Now this fellowship is in respect, not of natural, but of gratuitous gifts, for, according to Rom. 6. 23, the grace of God is life everlasting. Therefore charity itself surpasses our natural powers. Now that which surpasses the power of nature cannot be natural or acquired by the natural powers, since a natural effect does not transcend its cause. Therefore charity can be in us neither naturally, nor through acquisition by the natural powers, but by the infusion of the Holy Ghost, Who is the love of the Father and the Son, and the participation of Whom in us is caused charity, as stated above (Q. XXIII, A. 2. Reply 1).

Reply Obj. 1. Dionysius is speaking of the love of God, which is founded on the fellowship of natural goods, and is therefore in all naturally. On the other hand, charity is founded on a supernatural fellowship, so that the comparison fails.

Reply Obj. 2. Just as God is supremely knowable in Himself yet not to us, on account of a defect in our knowledge which depends on sensible things, so too, God is supremely lovable in Himself, in as much as He is the object of happiness. But He is not supremely lovable to us in this way, on account of the inclination of our affection towards visible goods. Hence it is evident that for us to love God above all things in this way, it is necessary that charity be infused into our hearts.

Reply Obj. 3. When it is said that in us charity proceeds from a pure heart, and a good conscience, and an unfeigned faith, this must be referred to the act of charity which is aroused by these things.—Or again, this is said because these acts dispose man to receive the infusion of charity. The same remark applies to the saying of Augustine (Tract. ix. in prim. canon. Joann.):⁴ "Fear leads to charity," and of a gloss on Matt. 1. 2: "Faith begets hope, and hope clarity."⁵

⁵ Clossa interi. (v, 5r).

ARTICLE 3. Whether Charity Is Infused According to Our Natural Capacity?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that charity is infused according to our natural capacity.

Objection 1. For it is written (Matt. 25. 15) that He gave to every one according to his own virtue (Douay,—proper ability). Now, in man, none but natural virtue precedes charity, since there is no virtue without charity, as stated above (Q. XXIII, A. 7). Therefore God infuses charity into man according to the measure of his natural virtue.

Obj. 2. Further, Among things ordered towards one another, the second is proportioned to the first; thus we find in natural things that the form is proportioned to the matter, and in gratuitous gifts, that glory is proportioned to grace. Now, since charity is a perfection of nature, it is compared to the capacity of nature as second to first. Therefore it seems that charity is infused according to the capacity of nature.

Obj. 3. Further, Men and angels partake of happiness according to the same measure, since happiness is alike in both, according to Matt. 22. 30 and Luke 20. 36. Now charity and other gratuitous gifts are bestowed on the angels, according to their natural capacity, as the Master teaches (Sent. ii, d. 3).¹ Therefore the same apparently applies to man.

On the contrary, It is written (John 3. 8): The Spirit breatheth where He will, and (I Cor. 12. 11): All these things one and the same Spirit worketh, dividing to every one according as He will. Therefore charity is given, not according to our natural capacity, but according as the Spirit wills to distribute His gifts.

I answer that, The quantity of a thing depends on the proper cause of that thing, since the more universal cause produces a greater effect. Now, since charity surpasses the proportion of human nature, as stated above (A. 2) it depends, not on any natural virtue, but on the sole grace of the Holy Ghost Who infuses charity. Therefore the quantity of charity depends neither on the condition of nature nor on the capacity of natural virtue, but only on the will of the Holy Ghost Who divides His gifts according as He will. Hence the Apostle says (Eph. 4. 7): To every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the giving of Christ.

Reply Obj. 1. The virtue in accordance with which God gives His gifts to each one, is a disposition or previous preparation or effort of the one who receives grace. But the Holy Ghost forestalls even this disposition or effort, by moving man's mind either more or less, according as He will. Wherefore the Apostle says (Coloss. 1. 12): Who hath made us worthy to be partakers of the lot of the saints in light.

Reply Obj. 2. The form does not surpass the proportion of the matter, but both of the same genus. In like manner grace and glory are referred to the same genus, for grace is nothing else than a beginning of glory in us. But charity and nature do not belong to the same genus, so that the comparison fails.

Reply Obj. 3. The angel's is an intellectual nature, and it is consistent with his condition that he should be borne wholly wheresoever he is borne, as stated in the First Part (Q. LXI. A. 6). Hence there was a greater effort in the higher angels, both for good in those who persevered, and for evil in those who fell, and consequently those of the higher angels who remained steadfast became better than the others, and those who fell became worse. But man's is a rational nature, to which it pertains to be sometimes in potency and sometimes in act, so that it is not necessarily borne wholly wherever it is borne, and where there are greater natural gifts there may be less effort, and vice versa. Thus the comparison fails.

ARTICLE 4 Whether Charity Can Increase?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that charity cannot increase.

Objection 1. For nothing increases save what has quantity. Now quantity is twofold, namely dimensive and virtual. The former does not befit charity which is a spiritual perfection, while virtual quantity regards the objects in respect of which charity does not increase, since the slightest charity loves all that is to be loved out of charity. Therefore charity does not increase.

Obj. 2. Further, That which is at the term receives no increase. But charity is at the term, being the greatest of the virtues, and the supreme love of the greatest good. Therefore charity cannot increase.

Obj. 3. Further, Increase is a kind of movement. Therefore wherever there is increase there is movement, and if there be increase of essence there is movement of essence. Now there is no movement of essence save either by corruption or generation. Therefore charity cannot increase essentially, unless it happen to be

On the contrary, Augustine says (Tract. lxxiv in Joann.)¹ that "charity merits increase that by increase it may merit perfection."

I answer that, The charity of a wayfarer can increase. For we are called wayfarers by reason of our being on the way to God, Who is the last end of our happiness. On this way we advance as we draw near to God, Who is approached not by steps of the body but by the affections of the mind; and this approach is the result of charity, since it unites man's mind to God. Consequently it pertains to the very notion of the charity of a wayfarer that it can increase, for if it could not, all further advance along the way would cease. Hence the Apostle calls charity the way, when he says (I Cor. 12. 31): I show unto you yet a more excellent way.

Reply Obj. 1. Charity is not subject to diminutive, but only to virtual quantity; and the latter depends not only on the number of objects, namely whether they be in greater number or of greater excellence, but also on the intensity of the act, namely whether a thing is loved more, or less. It is in this way that the virtual quantity of charity increases.

Reply Obj. 2. Charity is at a summit with regard to its object, in so far as its object is the Supreme Good, and from this it follows that charity is the most excellent of the virtues. Yet not every charity is at a summit as regards the intensity of the act.

Reply Obj. 3. Some have said that charity does not increase in its essence, but only as to its radication in its subject, or according to its fervour.² But these people did not know what they were talking about. For since charity is an accident, its being is to be in something. So that an essential increase of charity means nothing else but that it is yet more in its subject, which implies a greater radication in its subject. Furthermore charity is essentially a virtue directed to act, so that an essential increase of charity is the same as ability to produce an act of more fervent love. Hence charity increases essentially, not by beginning to be, or ceasing to be in its subject, as the objection imagines, but by beginning to be more and more in its subject.

ARTICLE 5. Whether Charity Increases by Addition?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It seems that charity increases by addition.

Objection 1. For just as increase may be in respect of bodily quantity, so may it be according to virtual quantity. Now increase in bodily quantity results from addition; for the Philosopher says³ that "increase is addition to a pre-existing magnitude." Therefore the increase of charity which is according to virtual quantity is by addition.

Obj. 2. Further, Charity is a kind of spiritual light in the soul, according to I John 2. 10: He that loveth his brother abideth in the light. Now light increases in the air by addition; thus the light in a house increases when another candle is lit. Therefore charity also increases in the soul by addition.

Obj. 3. Further, The increase of charity is God's work, even as the causing of it, according to II Cor. 9. 10: He will increase the growth of the fruits of your justice. Now when God first infuses charity, He puts something in the soul that was not there before. Therefore also, when He increases charity, He puts something there which was not there before. Therefore charity increases by addition.

On the contrary, Charity is a simple form. Now nothing greater results from the addition of one simple thing to another, as proved in the *Physics*⁴ and the Metaphysics.⁵ Therefore charity does not increase by addition.

I answer that, Every addition is of something to something else, so that in every addition we must at least presuppose that the things added together are distinct before the addition. Consequently if charity be added to charity, the added charity must be presupposed as distinct from the charity to which it is added, not necessarily by a distinction of reality, but at least by a distinction of thought. For God is able to increase a bodily quantity by adding a magnitude which did not exist before, but was created at that very moment; which magnitude, though not pre-existent in reality, is nevertheless capable of being distinguished from the quantity to which it is added. Therefore if charity be added to charity we must presuppose the distinction, at least logical, of the one charity from the other.

Now distinction among forms is twofold, specific and numeric. Specific distinction of habits follows diversity of objects, while numeric distinction follows distinction of subjects. Consequently a habit may receive increase through extending to objects to which it did not extend before; thus the science of geometry increases in one who acquires knowledge of geometrical matters which he did not know hitherto. But this cannot be said of charity, for even the slightest charity extends to all that we have to love by charity. Hence the addition which causes an increase of charity cannot be understood as though the added charity were presupposed to be distinct specifically from that to which it is added.

It follows therefore that if charity be added to charity, we must presuppose a numerical distinction between them, which follows a distinction of subjects; thus whiteness receives an increase when one white thing is added to another, although such an increase does not make a thing whiter. This, however, does not apply to the case in point, since the subject of charity is none other than the rational mind, so that an increase of charity of such a kind could only take place by one rational mind being added to another; which is impossible. Moreover, even if it were possible, the result would be a greater lover, but not a more loving one. It follows, therefore, that charity can by no means increase by the addition of charity to charity, as some have held to be the case.¹

Accordingly charity increases only by its subject partaking of charity more and more, that is, by being more reduced to its act and more subject to it. For this is the proper mode of increase in a form that is intensified, since the being of such a form consists wholly in its adhering to its subject. Consequently, since the magnitude of a thing follows on its being, to say that a form is greater is the same as to say that it is more in its subject, and not that another form is added to it; for this would be the case if the form, of itself, had any quantity, and not in comparison with its subject. Therefore charity increases by being intensified in its subject, and this is for charity to increase according to essence, and not by charity being added to charity.

Reply Obj. 1. Bodily quantity has something as quantity, and something else, in so far as it is an accidental form. As quantity, it is distinguishable in respect of position or number, and in this way we have the increase of magnitude by addition, as may be seen in animals. But in so far as it is an accidental form, it is distinguishable only in respect of its subject, and in this way it has its proper increase, like other accidental forms, by way of intensity in its subject, for instance in things subject to rarefaction, as is proved in the Physics.² In like manner science, as a habit, has its quantity from its objects, and accordingly it increases by addition, when a man knows more things; and again, as an accidental form, it has a certain quantity through being in its subject, and in this way it increases in a man who knows the same scientific truths with greater certainty now than before. In the same way charity has a twofold quantity; but with regard to that which it has from its object, it does not increase, as stated above. Hence it follows that it increases solely by being intensified.

Reply Obj. 2. The addition of light to light can be understood through the light being intensified in the air on account of there being several luminaries giving light; but this distinction does not apply to the case in point, since there is but one luminary shedding forth the light of charity.

Reply Obj. 3. The infusion of charity denotes a change to the state of having charity from the state of not having it, so that something must come which was not there before. On the other hand, the increase of charity denotes a change to "more having" from "less having," so that there is need, not for anything to be there that was not there before, but for something to be more there that previously was less there. This is what God does when He increases charity, that is He makes it to have a greater hold on the soul, and the likeness of the Holy Ghost to be more perfectly participated by the soul.

ARTICLE 6. Whether Charity Increases Through Every Act of Charity?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It seems that charity increases through every act of charity.

Objection 1. For that which can do what is more, can do what is less. But every act of charity can merit everlasting life; and this is more than a simple addition of charity, since it includes the perfection of charity. Much more, therefore, does every act of charity increase charity.

Obj. 2. Further, Just as the habits of acquired virtue are engendered by acts, so too an increase of charity is caused by an act of charity. Now each virtuous act conduces to the engendering of virtue. Therefore also each virtuous act of charity conduces to the increase of charity.

Obj. 3. Further, Gregory says³ that "to stand still in the way to God is to go back." Now no man goes back when he is moved by an act of charity. Therefore whoever is moved by an act of charity goes forward in the way to God. Therefore charity increases through every act of charity.

³ Reg. Pastor., III, 1 (PL 77, 51).

On the contrary, The effect does not surpass the power of its cause. But an act of charity is sometimes done with tepidity or slackness. Therefore it does not conduce to a more excellent charity, rather does it dispose one to a lower degree.

I answer that, The spiritual increase of charity is somewhat like the increase of a body. Now bodily increase in animals and plants is not a continuous movement, so that if a thing increase so much in so much time, it needs to increase proportionally in each part of that time, as happens in local movement; but for a certain space of time nature works by disposing for the increase, without causing any actual increase, and afterwards brings into effect that to which it had disposed, by giving the animal or plant an actual increase. In like manner charity does not actually increase through every act of charity, but each act of charity disposes to an increase of charity, in so far as one act of charity makes man more ready to act again according to charity, and this readiness increasing, man breaks out into an act of more fervent love, and strives to advance in charity, and then his charity increases actually.

Reply Obj. 1. Every act of charity merits everlasting life, which, however, is not to be bestowed then and there, but at its proper time. In like manner every act of charity merits an increase of charity; yet this increase does not take place at once, but when we strive for that increase.

Reply Obj. 2. Even when an acquired virtue is being engendered, each act does not complete the formation of the virtue, but conduces towards that effect by disposing to it, while the last act, which is the most perfect, and acts in virtue of all those that preceded it, reduces the virtue into act, just as when many drops hollow out a stone.

Reply Obj. 3. Man advances in the way to God, not merely by actual increase of charity, but also by being disposed to that increase.

ARTICLE 7. Whether Charity Increases Without Limit?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It would seem that charity does not increase without limit.

Objection 1. For every movement is towards some end and term, as stated in the Metaphysics.¹ But the increase of charity is a movement. Therefore it tends to an end and term. Therefore charity does not increase without limit.

Obj. 2. Further, No form surpasses the capacity of its subject. But the capacity of the rational creature who is the subject of charity is finite. Therefore charity cannot increase without limit.

Obj. 3. Further, Every finite thing can, by continual increase, attain to the quantity of another finite thing however much greater, unless the amount of its increase be ever less and less. Thus the Philosopher states² that if we divide a given line into an infinite number of parts, and take these parts away and add them to another line, we shall never arrive at any definite quantity resulting from those two lines, namely the one from which we subtracted and the one to which we added what was subtracted. But this does not occur in the case in point, because there is no need for the second increase of charity to be less than the first, since rather is it probable that it would be equal or greater. As, therefore, the charity of the blessed is something finite, if the charity of the wayfarer can increase without limit, it would follow that the charity of the way can equal the charity of heaven, which is unreasonable. Therefore the wayfarer's charity cannot increase without limit.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (Philip. 3. 12): Not as though I had already attained, or were already perfect; but I follow after, if I may, by any means apprehend, on which words a gloss says:³ "Even if he has made great progress, let none of the faithful say: 'Enough.' For whosoever says this, leaves the road before coming to his destination." Therefore the wayfarer's charity can ever increase more and more.

I answer that, A term to the increase of a form may be fixed in three ways. First by reason of the form itself having a fixed measure, and when this has been reached it is no longer possible to go any further in that form, but if any further advance is made, another form is attained. An example of this is paleness, the bounds of which may, by continual alteration, be passed, either so that whiteness ensues, or so that blackness results. Secondly, on the part of the agent, whose power does not extend to a further increase of the form in its subject. Thirdly, on the part of the subject, which is not capable of further perfection.

Now, in none of these ways is a limit imposed to the increase of man's charity, while he is in the state of a wayfarer. For charity itself considered as such has no limit to its increase, since it is a participation of the infinite charity which is the Holy Ghost. In like manner the cause of the increase of charity, namely God, is possessed of infinite power. Furthermore, on the part of its subject, no limit to this increase can be fixed, because whenever charity increases there is a corresponding increased ability to receive a further increase. It is therefore evident that it is not possible to fix any limits to the increase of charity in this life.

Reply Obj. 1. The increase of charity is directed to an end which is not in this but in a future life.

Reply Obj. 2. The capacity of the rational creature is increased by charity, because the heart is enlarged by it, according to II Cor. 6. 11: Our heart is enlarged. And therefore it still remains capable of receiving a further increase.

Reply Obj. 3. This argument holds good in those things which have the same kind of quantity, but not in those which have different kinds; thus however much a line may increase it does not reach the quantity of a surface. Now the quantity of a wayfarer's charity which follows the knowledge of faith, is not of the same kind as the quantity of the charity of the blessed, which follows open vision. Hence the argument does not prove.

ARTICLE 8. Whether Charity Can Be Perfect in This Life?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It seems that charity cannot be perfect in this life.

Objection 1. For this would have been the case with the apostles before all others. Yet it was not so, since the Apostle says (Philip. 3. 11): Not as though I had already attained, or were already perfect. Therefore charity cannot be perfect in this life.

Obj. 2. Further, Augustine says¹ that "whatever kindles charity quenches cupidity, but where charity is perfect, cupidity is done away altogether." But this cannot be in this world, where it is impossible to live without sin, according to 1 John 1. 8: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves. Now all sin arises from some inordinate cupidity. Therefore charity cannot be perfect in this life.

Obj. 3. Further, What is already perfect cannot be perfected any more. But in this life charity can always increase, as stated above (A. 7). Therefore charity cannot be perfect in this life.

On the contrary, Augustine says in his commentary on the First Canonical Epistle of John (Tract. v.):² "Charity is perfected by being strengthened; and when it has been brought to perfection, it exclaims: 'I desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ.' " Now this is possible in this life, as in the case of Paul. Therefore charity can be perfect in this life.

I answer that, The perfection of charity may be understood in two ways: first with regard to the object loved, secondly with regard to the person who loves. With regard to the object loved, charity is perfect if the object be loved as much as it is lovable. Now God is as lovable as He is good, and His goodness is infinite, and therefore He is infinitely lovable. But no creature can love Him infinitely since all created power is finite. Consequently no creature's charity can be perfect in this way; the charity of God alone can, by which He loves Himself.

On the part of the person who loves, charity is perfect when he loves as much as he can. This happens in three ways. First, so that a man's whole heart is always actually borne towards God. This is the perfection of the charity of heaven, and is not possible in this life, where, by reason of the weakness of human life, it is impossible to think always actually of God, and to be moved by love towards Him. Secondly, so that man makes an earnest endeavour to give his time to God and Divine things, while scorning other things except in so far as the needs of the present life demand. This is the perfection of charity that is possible to a wayfarer; but it is not common to all who have charity. Thirdly, so that a man gives his whole heart to God habitually, that is, by neither thinking nor desiring anything contrary to the love of God. And this perfection is common to all who have charity.

Reply Obj. 1. The Apostle denies that he has the perfection of heaven, and hence a gloss on the same passage says³ that "he was a perfect wayfarer, but had not yet achieved the perfection to which the way leads."

Reply Obj. 2. This is said on account of venial sins, which are contrary, not to the habit, but to the act of charity; hence they are incompatible, not with the perfection of the way, but with that of heaven.

Reply Obj. 3. The perfection of the way is not perfection absolutely, and so it can always increase.

ARTICLE 9. Whether Charity Is Rightly Distinguished into Three Degrees, Beginning, Progress and Perfection?

We proceed thus to the Ninth Article: It would seem unfitting to distinguish three degrees of charity, beginning, progress and perfection.

Objection 1. For there are many degrees between the beginning of charity and its ultimate perfection. Therefore it is not right to put only one.

Obj. 2. Further, Charity begins to progress as soon as it begins to be. Therefore we ought not to distinguish between charity as progressing and as beginning.

Obj. 3. Further, In this world, however perfect a man's charity may be, it can increase, as stated above (A. 7). Now for charity to increase is to progress. Therefore perfect charity ought not to be distinguished from progressing charity. And so the above degrees are unsuitably assigned to charity.

On the contrary, Augustine says (In prim. canon. Joann., Tract. v.):¹ "As soon as charity is born it takes food," which refers to beginners; "after taking food, it waxes strong," which refers to those who are progressing; "and when it has become strong it is perfected," which refers to the perfect. Therefore there are three degrees of charity.

I answer that, The spiritual increase of charity may be considered in respect of a certain likeness to the growth of the human body. For although this latter growth may be divided into many parts, yet it has certain fixed divisions according to those particular actions or pursuits to which man is brought by this same growth. Thus we speak of a man being an infant until he has the use of reason, after which we distinguish another state of man when he begins to speak and to use his reason, while there is again a third state, that of puberty, when he begins to acquire the power of generation, and so on until he arrives at perfection.

In like manner the different degrees of charity are distinguished according to the different pursuits to which man is brought by the increase of charity. For at first it is incumbent on man to occupy himself chiefly with avoiding sin and resisting his concupiscences, which move him in opposition to charity; and this concerns beginners, in whom charity has to be fed or fostered lest it be destroyed. In the second place man's chief pursuit is to aim at progress in good, and this is the pursuit of the proficient, whose chief aim is to strengthen their charity by adding to it. Man's third pursuit is to aim chiefly at union with and enjoyment of God, and this pertains to the perfect who desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ.

In like manner we observe in local motion that at first there is withdrawal from one term, then approach to the other term, and thirdly, rest in his term.

Reply Obj. 1. All these distinct degrees which can be discerned in the increase of charity, are comprised in the above three, even as every division of continuous things is included in these three,—the beginning, the middle, and the end, as the Philosopher states.²

Reply Obj. 2. Although those who are beginners in charity may progress, yet the chief care that besets them is to resist the sins which disturb them by their onslaught. Afterwards, however, when they come to feel this onslaught less, they begin to tend to perfection with greater security; yet with one hand doing the work, and with the other holding the sword as related in 2 Esdr. 4. 17 about those who built up Jerusalem.

Reply Obj. 3. Even the perfect make progress in charity; yet this is not their chief care, but their aim is principally directed towards union with God. And though both the beginner and the proficient seek this, yet their solicitude is chiefly about other things, with the beginner, about avoiding sin, with the proficient, about progressing in virtue.

ARTICLE 10. Whether Charity Can Decrease?

We proceed thus to the Tenth Article: It seems that charity can decrease.

Objection 1. For contraries by their nature affect the same subject. Now increase and decrease are contraries. Since then charity increases, as stated above (A. 4), it seems that it can also decrease.

Obj. 2. Further, Augustine, speaking to God, Heavens, I, 1 (268^o12).

says¹: "He loves Thee less, who loves aught beside Thee"; and (QQ. LXXXIII, qu. 36)² he says that "what kindles charity quenches cupidity." From this it seems to follow that, on the contrary, what arouses cupidity quenches charity. But cupidity, by which a man loves something beside God, can increase in man. Therefore charity can decrease.

Obj. 3. Further, As Augustine says (Gen. ad lit. viii, 12)³ "God makes the just man, by justifying him, but in such a way, that if the man turns away from God, he no longer retains the effect of the Divine operation." From this we may gather that when God preserves charity in man, He works in the same way as when He first infuses charity into him. Now at the first infusion of charity God infuses less charity into him that prepares himself less. Therefore also in preserving charity, He preserves less charity in him that prepares himself less. Therefore charity can decrease.

On the contrary, In Scripture, charity is compared to fire, according to Cant. 8 6: The lamps thereof, that is, of charity, are fire and flames. Now fire always mounts upward so long as it lasts. Therefore as long as charity endures, it can ascend, but cannot descend, that is, decrease.

I answer that, The quantity which charity has in comparison with its proper object cannot decrease, even as neither can it increase, as stated above (A. 4, reply 1; A. 5.). Since, however, it increases in that quantity which it has in comparison with its subject, we must consider whether here it can decrease in this way. Now, if it decreases, this must be either through an act, or by the mere cessation from act. It is true that virtues acquired through acts decrease and sometimes cease altogether through cessation from act, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LIII, A. 3). Therefore the Philosopher says,⁴ in reference to friendship, "that want of intercourse," that is, the neglect to call upon or speak with one's friends, "has destroyed many a friendship." Now this is because the preservation of a thing depends on its cause, and the cause of an acquired virtue is a human act, so that when human acts cease, the acquired virtue decreases and at last ceases altogether. Yet this does not occur to charity, because it is not the result of human acts, but is caused by God alone, as stated above (A. 2). Hence it follows that even when its act ceases, it does not for this reason decrease, or cease altogether, unless the cessation involves a sin.

The consequence is that a decrease of charity cannot be caused except either by God or by some sin. Now no defect is caused in us by God, except by way of punishment, in so far as He withdraws His grace in punishment of sin. Hence He does not diminish charity except by way of punishment, and this punishment is due on account of sin.

It follows, therefore, that if charity decrease, the cause of this decrease must be sin either effectively or by way of merit. But mortal sin does not diminish charity in either of these ways, but destroys it entirely, both effectively, because every mortal sin is contrary to charity, as we shall state further on (A. 12), and by way of merit, since when, by sinning mortally, a man acts against charity, he deserves that God should withdraw charity from him.

In like manner, neither can venial sin diminish charity either effectively or by way of merit. Not effectively, because it does not touch charity, since charity is about the last end, while venial sin is a disorder about things directed to the end; and a man's love for the end is none the less through his committing an inordinate act as regards the things directed to the end. Thus sick people sometimes, though they love health much, are irregular in keeping to their diet; and thus again, in speculative sciences, the false opinions that are deduced from the principles do not diminish the certitude of the principles. So too, venial sin does not merit a diminution of charity; for when a man offends in a small matter he does not deserve to suffer loss in a great matter. For God does not turn away from man more than man turns away from Him. Therefore he that is out of order in respect of things directed to the end, does not deserve to suffer loss of charity by which he is ordered to the last end.

The consequence is that charity can by no means be diminished, if we speak of direct causality, yet whatever disposes to its corruption may be said to conduce indirectly to its diminution, and such are venial sins, or even the cessation from the practice of works of charity.

Reply Obj. 1. Contraries affect the same subject when that subject stands in equal relation to both. But charity does not stand in equal relation to increase and decrease. For it can have a cause of increase, but not of decrease, as stated above. Hence the argument does not prove.

Reply Obj. 2. Cupidity is twofold, one by which man places his end in creatures, and this

⁴ Ethics, viii, 5 (1157^b13).

kills charity altogether, since it is its poison, as Augustine states.¹ This makes us love God less (that is, less than we ought to love Him by charity), not indeed by diminishing charity but by destroying it altogether. It is thus that we must understand the saying: "He loves Thee less, who loves aught beside Thee," for he adds these words,—“which he loveth not for Thee.” This does not apply to venial sin, but only to mortal sin, since that which we love in venial sin, is loved for God's sake habitually though not actually.—There is another cupidity, that of venial sin, which is always diminished by charity; and yet this cupidity cannot diminish charity, for the reason given above.

Reply Obj. 3. A movement of free choice is requisite in the infusion of charity, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. CXIII, A. 3). Therefore that which diminishes the intensity of free choice conduces dispositively to a diminution in the charity to be infused. On the other hand, no movement of free choice is required for the preservation of charity; otherwise it would not remain in us while we sleep. Hence charity does not decrease on account of an obstacle on the part of the intensity of the movement of free choice.

ARTICLE 11. Whether We Can Lose Charity When Once We Have It?

We proceed thus to the Eleventh Article: It would seem that we cannot lose charity when once we have it.

Objection 1. For if we lose it, this can only be through sin. Now he who has charity cannot sin, for it is written (I John 3. 9): Whosoever is born of God, committeth not sin; for His seed abideth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God. But none save the children of God have charity, “for it is this which distinguishes the children of God from the children of perdition,” as Augustine says (De Trin. xv, 18).² Therefore he that has charity cannot lose it.

Obj. 2. Further, Augustine says (De Trin. viii, 7)³ that “if love be not true, it should not be called love.” Now, as he says again in a letter to Count Julian, “charity which can fail was never true.”⁴ Therefore it was no charity at all.

³ PL 42, 956.

⁴ Cf. Paulinus Aquilensis, De Salutaribus ad Henricum Comitem, vii (PL 90, 202; Cf. PL 40, 1049). See Gratian, Decretum, II, causa 33, Q. 3 De Poenit., d. 2, can. 2 (RF 1, 1190); Lombard, Sent., III, d. 31, chap. 1 (QR II, 690); Jerome, Epist., III (PL 22, 335); Alcuin, Epist., xli (PL 100, 203).

Therefore, when once we have charity, we cannot lose it.

Obj. 3. Further, Gregory says in a homily for Pentecost (In Evang. xxx)⁵ that “God's love works great things where it is; if it ceases to work it is not charity.” Now no man loses charity by doing great things. Therefore if charity be there, it cannot be lost.

Obj. 4. Further, Free choice is not inclined to sin unless by some motive for sinning. Now charity excludes all motives for sinning, both self-love and cupidity, and all such things. Therefore charity cannot be lost.

On the contrary, It is written (Apoc. 2. 4): I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first charity.

I answer that, The Holy Ghost dwells in us by charity, as shown above (A. 2; Q. XXIII, A. 2). We can, accordingly, consider charity in three ways: first on the part of the Holy Ghost, Who moves the soul to love God, and in this respect charity is incompatible with sin through the power of the Holy Ghost, Who does unfailingly whatever He wills to do. Hence it is impossible for these two things to be true at the same time,—that the Holy Ghost should will to move a certain man to an act of charity, and that this man, by sinning, should lose charity. For the gift of perseverance is counted among “the blessings of God by which whoever is delivered, is most certainly delivered,” as Augustine says in his book on the Predestination of the saints (De Dono Persev. xiv).⁶

Secondly charity may be considered as such, and thus it is incapable of anything that is against its notion. Therefore charity cannot sin at all, even as neither can heat cool, nor injustice do good, as Augustine says (De Scrm. Dom. in Monte, ii, 24).⁷

Thirdly charity can be considered on the part of its subject, which is changeable on account of free choice. Moreover charity may be compared with this subject, both from the general point of view of form in comparison with matter, and from the special point of view of habit as compared with power. Now it is of the very notion of a form to be in its subject in such a way that it can be lost, when it does not entirely fill the potentiality of matter; this is evident in the forms of things generated and corrupted, because the matter of such things receives one form in such a way, that it retains within it the potency to another form, as though its potentiality were not completely satisfied with the one form. Hence the one form may be lost by the other being received. On the other hand the form of a celestial body which entirely fills the potentiality of its matter, so that the latter does not retain the potency to another form, is in its subject inseparably. Accordingly the charity of the blessed, because it entirely fills the potentiality of the rational mind, since every actual movement of that mind is directed to God, is possessed by its subject inseparably. But the charity of the wayfarer does not so fill the potentiality of its subject, because the latter is not always actually directed to God. Hence when it is not actually directed to God, something may occur by which charity is lost.

It is proper to a habit to incline a power to act, and this belongs to a habit, in so far as it makes whatever is suitable to it to seem good, and whatever is unsuitable, to seem evil. For as the taste judges of savours according to its disposition, even so does the human mind judge of things to be done according to its habitual disposition. Hence the Philosopher says¹ that "such as a man is, so does the end appear to him." Accordingly charity is inseparable from its possessor, where that which pertains to charity cannot appear otherwise than good, and that is in heaven, where God is seen in His Essence, which is the very essence of goodness. Therefore the charity of heaven cannot be lost, although the charity of the way can, because in this state God is not seen in His Essence, which is the essence of goodness.

Reply Obj. 1. The passage quoted speaks from the point of view of the power of the Holy Ghost, by Whose preservation those whom He wills to move are rendered immune from sin, as much as He wills.

Reply Obj. 2. The charity which comprises in its very notion the possibility of failure is no true charity; for this would be the case were its love given only for a time, and afterwards were to cease, which would be inconsistent with true love. If, however, charity be lost through the changeableness of the subject, and against the purpose of charity included in its act, this is not contrary to true charity.

Reply Obj. 3. The love of God always works great things in its purpose, which pertains to the notion of charity; but it does not always work great things in its act, on account of the condition of its subject.

Reply Obj. 4. Charity according to the character of its act excludes every motive for sinning. But it happens sometimes that charity is no acting actually, and then it is possible for a motive to intervene for sinning, and if we consent to this motive, we lose charity.

ARTICLE 12. Whether Charity Is Lost Through One Mortal Sin?

We proceed thus to the Twelfth Article: It seems that charity is not lost through one mortal sin.

Objection 1. For Origen says (Peri Archon, i):² "When a man who has mounted to the stage of perfection, is satiated, I do not think that he will become empty or fall away suddenly; but he must do so gradually and by little and little." But man falls away by losing charity. Therefore charity is not lost through only one mortal sin.

Obj. 2. Further, Pope Leo in a sermon on the Passion³ addresses Peter thus: "Our Lord saw in thee not a conquered faith, not an averted love, but constancy shaken. Tears abounded where love never failed, and the words uttered in trepidation were washed away by the fount of charity." From this Bernard drew his assertion⁴ that charity in Peter was not quenched but cooled. But Peter sinned mortally in denying Christ. Therefore charity is not lost through one mortal sin.

Obj. 3. Further, Charity is stronger than an acquired virtue. Now a habit of acquired virtue is not destroyed by one contrary sinful act. Much less, therefore, is charity destroyed by one contrary mortal sin.

Obj. 4. Further, Charity denotes love of God and our neighbour. Now it seems that one may commit a mortal sin, and yet retain the love of God and one's neighbour; because an inordinate affection for things directed to the end does not remove the love for the end, as stated above (A. 10). Therefore charity towards God can endure, though there be a mortal sin through an inordinate affection for some temporal good.

Obj. 5. Further, The object of a theological virtue is the last end. Now the other theological virtues, namely faith and hope, are not done away by one mortal sin; in fact they remain though unformed. Therefore charity can remain without a form, even though one mortal sin has been committed.

On the contrary, By mortal sin man becomes deserving of eternal death, according to Rom. 6. 23: The wages of sin is death. On the other hand whoever has charity is deserving of eternal life, for it is written (John 14. 21): He that loveth Me, shall be loved by My Father: and I will love Him, and will manifest Myself to him, in which manifestation everlasting life consists, according to John 17. 3: This is eternal life; that they may know Thee the . . . true God, and Jesus Christ Whom Thou hast sent. Now no man can be worthy, at the same time, of eternal life and of eternal death. Therefore it is impossible for a man to have charity with a mortal sin. Therefore charity is destroyed by one mortal sin.

I answer that, That one contrary is removed by the other contrary supervening. Now every mortal sin is contrary to charity by its very notion, which consists in man's loving God above all things, and subjecting himself to Him entirely, by referring all that is his to God. It is therefore of the very notion of charity that man should so love God as to wish to submit to Him in all things, and always to follow the rule of His commandments; for whatever is contrary to His commandments is manifestly contrary to charity, and therefore by its very nature is capable of destroying charity.

If indeed charity were an acquired habit dependent on the power of its subject, it would not necessarily be removed by one mortal sin, for act is directly contrary, not to habit but to act. Now the endurance of a habit in its subject does not require the endurance of its act, so that when a contrary act supervenes, the acquired habit is not at once done away. But charity, being an infused habit, depends on the action of God Who infuses it, Who stands in relation to the infusion and preservation of charity, as the sun does to the diffusion of light in the air, as stated above (A. 10, obj. 3; Q. IV, A. 4, reply 3). Consequently, just as the light would cease at once in the air, were an obstacle placed to its being lit up by the sun, even so charity ceases at once to be in the soul through the placing of an obstacle to the outpouring of charity by God into the soul.

Now it is evident that through every mortal sin which is contrary to God's commandments, an obstacle is placed to the outpouring of charity, since from the very fact that a man chooses to prefer sin to God's friendship, which requires that we should follow His will, it follows that the habit of charity is lost at once through one mortal sin. Hence Augustine says (Gen. ad lit. viii, 12)¹ that "man is enlightened by God's presence, but he is darkened at once by God's absence, because distance from Him is effected not by change of place but by aversion of the will."

Reply Obj. 1. This saying of Origen may be understood, in one way, that a man who is in the state of perfection does not suddenly go so far as to commit a mortal sin, but is disposed to this by some previous negligence, for which reason venial sins are said to be dispositions to mortal sin, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXXXVIII, A. 3). Nevertheless he falls, and loses charity through the one mortal sin if he commits it.

Since, however, he adds: "If some slight slip should occur, and he recover himself quickly, he does not appear to fall altogether," we may reply in another way, that when he speaks of a man being emptied and falling away altogether, he means one who falls so as to sin through malice; and this does not occur in a perfect man all at once.

Reply Obj. 2. Charity may be lost in two ways; first, directly, by actual contempt, and, in this way, Peter did not lose charity. Secondly, indirectly, when a sin is committed against charity, through some passion of desire or fear. It was by sinning against charity in this way, that Peter lost charity, although he soon recovered it.

The Reply to the Third Objection is evident from what has been said.

Reply Obj. 4. Not every inordinate affection for things directed to the end, that is, for created goods, constitutes a mortal sin, but only such as is directly contrary to the Divine will; and then the inordinate affection is contrary to charity, as stated in this article.

Reply Obj. 5. Charity denotes union with God, but faith and hope do not. Now every mortal sin consists in turning away from God, as stated above (Q. XX, A. 3). Consequently every mortal sin is contrary to charity, but not to faith or hope, but only certain determinate sins, which destroy the habit of faith or of hope, even as charity is destroyed by every mortal sin. Hence it is evident that charity cannot remain without form, since it is itself the ultimate form of the virtues, by reason of its looking to God under the aspect of last end, as stated above (Q. XXXIII, A. 8).

QUESTION XXV OF THE OBJECT OF CHARITY
(In Twelve Articles)

WE must now consider the object of charity; which consideration will be twofold: (1) The things we ought to love out of charity: (2) The order in which they ought to be loved (Q. XXVI).

Under the first head there are twelve points of inquiry: (1) Whether we should love God alone, out of charity, or should we love our neighbour also? (2) Whether charity should be loved out of charity? (3) Whether irrational creatures ought to be loved out of charity? (4) Whether one may love oneself out of charity? (5) Whether one's own body? (6) Whether sinners should be loved out of charity? (7) Whether sinners love themselves? (8) Whether we should love our enemies out of charity? (9) Whether we are bound to show them tokens of friendship? (10) Whether we ought to love the angels out of charity? (11) Whether we ought to love the demons? (12) How to enumerate the things we are bound to love out of charity.

ARTICLE 1. Whether the Love of Charity Stops at God, or Extends to Our Neighbour?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that the love of charity stops at God and does not extend to our neighbour.

Objection 1. For as we owe God love, so do we owe Him fear, according to Deut. 10. 12: And now Israel, what doth the Lord thy God require of thee, but that thou fear . . . and love Him? Now the fear with which we fear man, and which is called human fear, is distinct from the fear with which we fear God, and which is either servile or filial, as is evident from what has been stated above (Q. XIX, A. 2). Therefore also the love with which we love God, is distinct from the love with which we love our neighbour.

Obj. 2. Further, The Philosopher says¹ that "to be loved is to be honoured." Now the honour due to God, which is known as latría, is distinct from the honour due to a creature, and known as dulia. Therefore again the love with which we love God is distinct from that with which we love our neighbour.

Obj. 3. Further, Hope begets charity, as a gloss states² on Matt. 1. 2. Now hope is so due to God that it is reprehensible to hope in man, according to Jerem. 17. 5: Cursed be the man that trusteth in man. Therefore charity is so due to God as not to extend to our neighbour.

On the contrary, It is written (I John 4. 21): This commandment we have from God, that he, who loveth God, love also his brother.

I answer that, As stated above (Part I-II, Q. LIV, A. 3) habits are not differentiated unless their acts are of different species. For every act of the one species belongs to the same habit. Now since the species of an act is derived from its object, considered under its formal aspect, it follows of necessity that it is specifically the same act that tends to an aspect of the object and that tends to the object under that aspect; thus the visual act by which we see the light, and by which we see the colour under the aspect of light is specifically the same.

Now the aspect under which our neighbour is to be loved, is God, since what we ought to love in our neighbour is that he may be in God. Hence it is clear that the act by which we love God, and by which we love our neighbour is specifically the same. Consequently the habit of charity extends not only to the love of God, but also to the love of our neighbour.

Reply Obj. 1 We may fear our neighbour, even as we may love him, in two ways: first, on account of something that is proper to him, as when a man fears a tyrant on account of his cruelty, or loves him by reason of his own desire to get something from him. And human fear of this kind is distinct from the fear of God, and the same applies to love. Secondly, we fear a man or love him on account of what he has of God; as when we fear the secular power by reason of its exercising the ministry of God for the punishment of evil-doers, and love it for its justice. Fear of man of this kind is not distinct from fear of God, as neither is love of this kind.

Reply Obj. 2. Love looks to good in general, but honour looks to the honoured person's own good, for it is given to a person in recognition of his own virtue. Hence love is not differentiated specifically on account of the various degrees of goodness in various persons so long as it is referred to one good common to all; but honour is distinguished according to the good belonging to individuals. Consequently we love all our neighbours with the same love of charity, in so far as they are referred to one good common to them all, which is God; but we give various honours to various people according to each one's own virtue, and likewise to

² Glossa interl. (v, 5r).

God we give the unique honour of latria on account of His unique virtue.

Reply Obj. 3. It is wrong to hope in man as though he were the principal author of salvation, but not to hope in man as helping us ministerially under God. In like manner it would be wrong if a man loved his neighbour as though he were his last end, but not if he loved him for God's sake; and this is what charity does.

ARTICLE 2. Whether We Should Love Charity out of Charity?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that charity need not be loved out of charity.

Objection 1. For the things to be loved out of charity are contained in the two precepts of charity (Matt. 22. 37-39), and neither of them includes charity, since charity is neither God nor our neighbour. Therefore charity need not be loved out of charity.

Obj. 2. Further, Charity is founded on the fellowship of happiness, as stated above (Q. XXIII, A. 1). But charity cannot participate in happiness. Therefore charity need not be loved out of charity.

Obj. 3. Further, Charity is a kind of friendship, as stated above (ibid.). But no man can have friendship for charity or for an accident, since such things cannot return love for love, which pertains to the notion of friendship, as stated in the Ethics.¹ Therefore charity need not be loved out of charity.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Trinit. viii, 7):² "He that loves his neighbour, must, in consequence, love love itself." But we love our neighbour out of charity. Therefore it follows that charity also is loved out of charity.

I answer that, Charity is love. Now love, by reason of the nature of the power whose act it is, is capable of reflecting on itself; for since the object of the will is the universal good, whatever has the aspect of good, can fall under the act of the will, and since to will is itself a good, man can will himself to will. Even so the intellect, whose object is the true, understands that it understands, because this again is something true. But love also, by reason of its own species, is capable of reflecting on itself, because it is a spontaneous movement of the lover towards the beloved, and so from the very fact that a man loves, he loves himself to love.

Yet charity is not absolute love, but has the character of friendship, as stated above (Q. XXIII, A. 1). Now by friendship a thing is loved in two ways: first, as the friend for whom we have friendship, and to whom we wish good things; secondly, as the good which we wish to a friend. It is in the latter and not in the former way that charity is loved out of charity, because charity is the good which we desire for all those whom we love out of charity. The same applies to happiness, and to the other virtues.

Reply Obj. 1. God and our neighbour are those with whom we are friends, but love of them includes the loving of charity, since we love both God and our neighbour, in so far as we love ourselves and our neighbour to love God, and this is to have charity.

Reply Obj. 2. Charity is the fellowship itself of the spiritual life, by which we arrive at happiness; hence it is loved as the good which we desire for all whom we love out of charity.

Reply Obj. 3. This argument considers friendship as referred to those with whom we are friends.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Irrational Creatures Also Ought To Be Loved out of Charity?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that irrational creatures also ought to be loved out of charity.

Objection 1. For it is chiefly by charity that we are conformed to God. Now God loves irrational creatures out of charity, for He loves all things that are (Wisd. 11. 25), and whatever He loves, He loves by Himself Who is charity. Therefore we also should love irrational creatures out of charity.

Obj. 2. Further, Charity is referred to God principally, and extends to other things as referable to God. Now just as the rational creature is referable to God, in so far as it bears the likeness of image, so too, are the irrational creatures, in as much as they bear the likeness of a trace. Therefore charity extends also to irrational creatures.

Obj. 3. Further, Just as the object of charity is God, so is the object of faith. Now faith extends to irrational creatures, since we believe that heaven and earth were created by God, that the fishes and birds were brought forth out of the waters, and animals that walk, and plants, out of the earth. Therefore charity extends also to irrational creatures.

On the contrary, The love of charity extends to none but God and our neighbour. But the word neighbour cannot be extended to irrational creatures, since they have no fellowship with man in the rational life. Therefore charity does not extend to irrational creatures.

I answer that, According to what has been stated above (Q. XXIII, A. 1) charity is a kind of friendship. Now the love of friendship is twofold. First, there is the love for the friend to whom our friendship is given, secondly, the love for those good things which we desire for our friend. With regard to the first, no irrational creature can be loved out of charity, and for three reasons. Two of these reasons refer in a general way to friendship, which cannot have an irrational creature for its object. First because friendship is towards one to whom we wish good things, while, properly speaking, we cannot wish good things to an irrational creature, because it is not able, properly speaking, to possess good, this being proper to the rational creature which, through its free choice, is the master of its disposal of the good it possesses. Hence the Philosopher says¹ that "we do not speak of good or evil happening to such things, except metaphorically." Secondly, because all friendship is based on some fellowship in life "for nothing is so proper to friendship as to live together," as the Philosopher proves.² Now irrational creatures can have no fellowship in human life which is regulated by reason. Hence friendship with irrational creatures is impossible, except metaphorically speaking. The third reason is proper to charity, for charity is based on the fellowship of everlasting happiness, to which the irrational creature cannot attain. Therefore we cannot have the friendship of charity towards an irrational creature.

Nevertheless we can love irrational creatures out of charity, if we regard them as the good things that we desire for others, in so far, namely, as we wish for their preservation, to God's honour and man's use. Thus too does God love them out of charity.

Thus the Reply to the First Objection is evident.

Reply Obj. 2. The likeness by way of trace does not confer the capacity for everlasting life, but the likeness of image does, and so the comparison fails.

Reply Obj. 3. Faith can extend to all that is in any way true, but the friendship of charity extends only to such things as have a natural capacity for everlasting life. Therefore the comparison fails.

² Ethics, VIII, 5 (1157^b19).

ARTICLE 4. Whether a Man Ought To Love Himself out of Charity?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that a man is not bound to love himself out of charity.

Objection 1. For Gregory says in a homily (In Evang. xvii)³ that "there can be no charity between less than two." Therefore no man has charity towards himself.

Obj. 2. Further, Friendship, of its very notion, implies mutual love and equality,⁴ which cannot be of one man towards himself. But charity is a kind of friendship, as stated above (Q. XXIII, A. 1). Therefore a man cannot have charity towards himself.

Obj. 3. Further, Anything relating to charity cannot be blameworthy, since charity dealeth not perversely (I Cor. 13. 4). Now a man deserves to be blamed for loving himself, since it is written (II Tim. 3. 1, 2): In the last days shall come dangerous times, men shall be lovers of themselves. Therefore a man cannot love himself out of charity.

On the contrary, It is written (Levit. 19. 18): Thou shalt love thy friend as thyself. Now we love our friends out of charity. Therefore we should love ourselves too out of charity.

I answer that, Since charity is a kind of friendship, as stated above (Q. XXIII, A. 1), we may consider charity from two standpoints. First, under the common notion of friendship, and in this way we must hold that, properly speaking, a man is not a friend to himself, but something more than a friend, since friendship implies union, for Dionysius says (Div. Nom. iv)⁵ that love is "a unitive force"; but a man is one with himself, which is more than being united to another. Hence, just as unity is the principle of union, so the love with which a man loves himself is the form and root of friendship. For if we have friendship with others it is because we do unto them as we do unto ourselves, hence we read in the *Ethics*⁶ that "the origin of friendly relations with others lies in our relations to ourselves." Thus too, with regard to principles, we have something greater than science, namely understanding.

Secondly, we may speak of charity in respect of its proper notion, namely as denoting man's friendship with God in the first place, and, consequently, with the things of God, among which things is man himself who has charity. Hence, among these other things which he loves out of charity because they pertain to God, he loves also himself out of charity.

⁶ Aristotle, IX, 4, 8 (1166^a1; 1168^b5).

Reply Obj. 1. Gregory speaks there of charity under the common notion of friendship; and the Second Objection is to be taken in the same sense.

Reply Obj. 3. Those who love themselves are to be blamed in so far as they love themselves as regards their sensitive nature, which they indulge. This is not to love oneself truly according to one's rational nature, so as to desire for oneself the good things which pertain to the perfection of reason: and in this way chiefly it is through charity that a man loves himself.

ARTICLE 5. Whether a Man Ought To Love His Body out of Charity?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It seems that a man ought not to love his body out of charity.

Objection 1. For we do not love one with whom we are unwilling to associate. But those who have charity shun the society of the body, according to Rom. 7. 24: Who shall deliver me from the body of this death? and Philip. 1. 23: Having a desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ. Therefore our bodies are not to be loved out of charity.

Obj. 2. Further, The friendship of charity is based on fellowship in the enjoyment of God. But the body can have no share in that enjoyment. Therefore the body is not to be loved out of charity.

Obj. 3. Further, Since charity is a kind of friendship it is towards those who are capable of loving in return. But our body cannot love us out of charity. Therefore it should not be loved out of charity.

On the contrary, Augustine says¹ that there are four things that we should love out of charity, and among them he counts our own body.

I answer that, Our bodies can be considered in two ways, first, in respect of their nature, secondly, in respect of the corruption of sin and its punishment. Now the nature of our body was created, not by an evil principle, as the Manicheans pretend, but by God. Hence we can use it for God's service, according to Rom. 6. 13: Present . . . your members as instruments of justice unto God. Consequently, out of the love of charity with which we love God, we ought to love our bodies also. But we ought not to love the evil effects of sin and the corruption of punishment; we ought rather, by the desire of charity, to long for the removal of such things.

Reply Obj. 1. The Apostle did not shrink from the society of his body, as regards the nature of the body; on the contrary, in this respect he was loth to be deprived of it, according to II Cor. 5. 4: We would not be unclothed, but clothed over. He did, however, wish to escape from the taint of concupiscence, which remains in the body, and from the corruption of the body which weighs down the soul, so as to hinder it from seeing God. Hence he says expressly: From the body of this death.

Reply Obj. 2. Although our bodies are unable to enjoy God by knowing and loving Him, yet by the works which we do through the body, we are able to attain to the perfect enjoyment of God. Hence from the enjoyment in the soul there overflows a certain happiness into the body, namely, "the vigor of health and incorruption," as Augustine states (Ep. ad Dioscor. cxviii).² Hence, since the body has, in a fashion, a share of happiness, it can be loved with the love of charity.

Reply Obj. 3. Mutual love is found in the friendship which is for another, but not in that which a man has for himself, either in respect of his soul or in respect of his body.

ARTICLE 6. Whether We Ought To Love Sinners out of Charity?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that we ought not to love sinners out of charity.

Objection 1. For it is written (Ps. 118. 113): I have hated the unjust. But David had perfect charity. Therefore sinners should be hated rather than loved, out of charity.

Obj. 2. Further, "Love is proved by deeds," as Gregory says in a homily for Pentecost (In Evang. xxx).³ But just men do no works of love for the unjust; on the contrary, they do such as would appear to be works of hate, according to Ps. 100. 8: In the morning I put to death all the wicked of the land; and God commanded (Exod. 22. 18): Wizards thou shalt not suffer to live. Therefore sinners should not be loved out of charity.

Obj. 3. Further, It is part of friendship that one should desire and wish good things for one's friends. Now the saints, out of charity, desire evil things for the wicked, according to Ps. 9. 18: May the wicked be turned into hell.

¹ Christian Doctrine, 1, 23, 26 (PL 34, 27; 29).

Therefore sinners should not be loved out of charity.

Obj. 4. Further, It is proper to friends to rejoice in, and will the same things. Now charity does not make us will what sinners will, nor to rejoice in what gives them joy, but rather the contrary. Therefore sinners should not be loved out of charity.

Obj. 5. Further "It is proper to friends to associate together," according to the Ethics.¹ But we ought not to associate with sinners, according to II Cor. 6. 17: Go ye out from among them. Therefore we should not love sinners out of charity.

On the contrary, Augustine says² that when it is said: Thou shalt love thy neighbour, "it is evident that we ought to look upon every man as our neighbour." Now sinners do not cease to be men, for sin does not destroy nature. Therefore we ought to love sinners out of charity.

I answer that, Two things may be considered in the sinner, his nature and his guilt. According to his nature, which he has from God, he has a capacity for happiness, on the fellowship of which charity is based, as stated above (A. 3; Q. XXIII, AA. 1, 5); therefore we ought to love sinners, out of charity, in respect of their nature. On the other hand their guilt is opposed to God, and is an obstacle to happiness. Therefore, in respect of their guilt by which they are opposed to God, all sinners are to be hated, even one's father or mother or kindred, according to Luke 14. 26. For it is our duty to hate, in the sinner, his being a sinner, and to love in him, his being a man capable of bliss. And this is to love him truly, out of charity, for God's sake.

Reply Obj. 1. The prophet hated the unjust, as such, and the object of his hate was their iniquity, which was their evil. Such hatred is perfect, of which he himself says (Ps. 138. 22): I have hated them with a perfect hatred. Now hatred of a person's evil is equivalent to love of his good. Hence also this perfect hatred belongs to charity.

Reply Obj. 2. As the Philosopher observes,³ when our friends fall into sin, we ought not to deny them the benefits of friendship so long as there is hope of their mending their ways, and we ought to help them more readily to regain virtue than to recover money, had they lost it, since virtue is more akin than money to friendship. When, however, they fall into very great wickedness, and become incurable, we ought no longer to show them friendliness. It is for this reason that both Divine and human laws command such sinners to be put to death, because there is greater likelihood of their harming others than of their mending their ways. Nevertheless the judge puts this into effect not out of hatred for the sinners, but out of the love of charity, by reason of which he prefers the public good to the life of the individual. Moreover the death inflicted by the judge profits the sinner, if he be converted, for the expiation of his crime; and if he be not converted, it profits so as to put an end to the sin, because the sinner is thus deprived of the power to sin any more.

Reply Obj. 3. Imprecations of this kind which we come across in Holy Writ, may be understood in three ways. First, by way of prediction, not by way of wish, so that the sense is: May the wicked be, that is, The wicked shall be, turned into hell. Secondly, by way of wish, yet so that the desire of the wisher is not referred to the man's punishment, but to the justice of the punisher, according to Ps. 57. 11: The just shall rejoice when he shall see the revenge, since, according to Wisd. 1. 13, not even God hath pleasure in the destruction of the wicked (Vulg.,—living) when He punishes them, but He rejoices in His justice, according to Ps. 10. 8. The Lord is just and hath loved justice. Thirdly, so that this desire is referred to the removal of the sin, and not to the punishment itself, to the effect, namely, that the sin be destroyed, but that the man may live.

Reply Obj. 4. We love sinners out of charity, not so as to will what they will, or to rejoice in what gives them joy, but so as to make them will what we will, and rejoice in what rejoices us. Hence it is written (Jerem. 15. 19): They shall be turned to thee, and thou shalt not be turned to them.

Reply Obj. 5. The weak should avoid associating with sinners, on account of the danger in which they stand of being perverted by them. It is commendable for the perfect, of whose corruption there is no fear, to associate with sinners that they may convert them. For thus did Our Lord eat and drink with sinners as related by Matthew (9. 11-13). Yet all should avoid the society of sinners, as regards fellowship in sin; in this sense it is written (II Cor. 6. 17): Go out from among them . . . and touch not the unclean thing, that is, by consenting to sin.

³ Ethics, IX, 3 (1105^b13).

ARTICLE 7. Whether Sinners Love Themselves?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It seems that sinners love themselves.

Objection 1. For that which is the principle of sin, is most of all in the sinner. Now love of self is the principle of sin since Augustine says¹ that it builds up the city of Babylon. Therefore sinners most of all love themselves.

Obj. 2. Further, Sin does not destroy nature. Now it is in keeping with nature that every man should love himself, and so even irrational creatures naturally desire their own good, for instance, the preservation of their being, and so forth. Therefore sinners love themselves.

Obj. 3. Further, Good is beloved by all, as Dionysius states (Div. Nom. iv).² Now many sinners consider themselves to be good. Therefore many sinners love themselves.

On the contrary, It is written (Ps. 10. 6): He that loveth iniquity, hateth his own soul.

I answer that, Love of self is common to all, in one way; in another way it is proper to the good; in a third way, it is proper to the wicked. For it is common to all for each one to love what he thinks himself to be. Now a man is said to be a thing, in two ways: first, in respect of his substance and nature, and this way all think themselves to be what they are, that is, composed of a soul and body. In this way too, all men, both good and wicked, love themselves, in so far as they love their own preservation.

Secondly, a man is said to be something in respect of some predominance, as the sovereign of a state is spoken of as being the state, and so, what the sovereign does, the state is said to do. In this way, all do not think themselves to be what they are. For the reasoning mind is the predominant part of man, while the sensitive and corporeal nature takes the second place, the former of which the Apostle calls the inward man, and the latter, the outward man (II Cor. 4. 16). Now the good look upon their rational nature or the inward man as being the chief thing in them, and so in this way they think themselves to be what they are. On the other hand, the wicked consider their sensitive and corporeal nature, or the outward man, to hold the first place. Therefore, since they do not know themselves rightly, they do not truly love themselves, but love what they think themselves to be. But the good know themselves truly, and therefore truly love themselves.

The Philosopher proves this from five things that are proper to friendship.³ For in the first place, every friend wishes his friend to be and to live; secondly, he desires good things for him; thirdly, he does good things to him; fourthly, he takes pleasure in his company; fifthly, he is of one mind with him, rejoicing and sorrowing in almost the same things. In this way the good love themselves, as to the inward man, because they wish his preservation in his integrity, they wish good things for him, namely spiritual goods, indeed they do their best to obtain them, and they take pleasure in entering into their own hearts, because they find there good thoughts in the present, the memory of past good, and the hope of future good, all of which are sources of pleasure. Likewise they experience no clashing of wills, since their whole soul tends to one thing.

On the other hand, the wicked have no wish to be preserved in the integrity of the inward man, nor do they desire spiritual goods for him, nor do they work for that end. nor do they take pleasure in their own company by entering into their own hearts, because they find there evils present, past and future, which they shrink from; nor do they agree with themselves, on account of the gnawings of conscience, according to Ps. 49. 21: I will reprove thee and set before thy face. And in the same manner it may be shown that the wicked love themselves as regards the corruption of the outward man, but the good do not love themselves thus.

Reply Obj. 1. The love of self which is the principle of sin is that which is proper to the wicked, and reaches "to the contempt of God," as stated in the passage quoted, because the wicked so desire external goods as to despise spiritual goods.

Reply Obj. 2. Although natural love is not altogether forfeited by wicked men, yet it is perverted in them, as explained above.

Reply Obj. 3. The wicked have some share of self-love, in so far as they think themselves good. Yet such love of self is not true but apparent; and even this is not possible in those who are very wicked.

ARTICLE 8. Whether Charity Requires That We Should Love Our Enemies?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It seems that charity does not require us to love our enemies.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (Enchirid. lxxiii)⁴ that "this great good, namely, the love of our enemies, is not so universal in its application as the object of our petition when we say: 'Forgive us our trespasses.' Now no one is forgiven sin unless he has charity, because, according to Prov. 10, 12, charity covereth all sins. Therefore charity does not require that we should love our enemies.

Obj. 2. Further, Charity does not do away with nature. Now everything, even an irrational being, naturally hates its contrary, as a lamb hates a wolf, and water, fire. Therefore charity does not make us love our enemies.

Obj. 3. Further, Charity doth nothing perversely (I Cor. 13. 4). Now it seems perverse to love one's enemies, as it would be to hate one's friends; hence Joab upbraided David by saying (II Kings 19. 6): Thou lovest them that hate thee, and thou hatest them that love thee. Therefore charity does not make us love our enemies.

On the contrary, Our Lord said (Matt. 5. 44) Love your enemies.

I answer that, Love of one's enemies may be understood in three ways. First, as though we were to love our enemies as enemies; this is perverse, and contrary to charity, since it implies love of that which is evil in another.

Secondly love of one's enemies may mean that we love them as to their nature, but in a universal way, and in this sense charity requires that we should love our enemies, namely, that in loving God and our neighbour, we should not exclude our enemies from the love given to our neighbour in general.

Thirdly love of one's enemies may be considered as specially directed to them, namely, that we should have a special movement of love towards our enemies. Charity does not require this absolutely, because it does not require that we should have a special movement of love to every individual man, since this would be impossible. Nevertheless charity does require this, in respect of our being prepared in mind, namely that we should be ready to love our enemies individually, if the necessity were to occur.

That man should actually do so, and love his enemy for God's sake, without it being necessary for him to do so, belongs to the perfection of charity. For since man loves his neighbour out of charity for God's sake, the more he loves God the more he puts enmities aside and shows love towards his neighbour; thus if we loved a certain man very much, we would love his children though they were unfriendly towards us. This is the sense in which Augustine speaks in the passage quoted in the First Objection, the Reply to which is therefore evident.

Reply Obj. 2. Everything naturally hates its contrary as such. Now our enemies are contrary to us, as enemies, and so this fact should be hateful to us, for their enmity should displease us. They are not, however, contrary to us as men and capable of happiness; and it is as such that we are bound to love them.

Reply Obj. 3. It is wrong to love one's enemies as enemies; and charity does not do this, as stated above.

ARTICLE 9 Whether It Is Necessary for Salvation That We Should Show Our Enemies the Signs and Effects of Love?

We proceed thus to the Ninth Article: It seems that charity demands of a man to show his enemy the signs or effects of love.

Objection 1. For it is written (I John 3. 18): Let us not love in word nor in tongue, but in deed and in truth. Now a man loves in deed by showing the one he loves signs and effects of love. Therefore charity requires that a man show his enemies such signs and effects of love.

Obj. 2. Further, Our Lord said in the same breath (Matt. 5. 44): Love your enemies, and, Do good to them that hate you. Now charity demands that we love our enemies. Therefore it demands also that we should do good to them.

Obj. 3. Further, Not only God but also our neighbour is the object of charity. Now Gregory says in a homily for Pentecost (In Evang xxx)¹ that "love of God cannot be idle, for wherever it is it does great things, and if it ceases to work, it is no longer love." Hence charity towards our neighbour cannot be without producing works. But charity requires us to love our neighbour without exception, even though he be an enemy. Therefore charity requires us to show the signs and effects of love towards our enemies.

On the contrary, A gloss on Matt. 5. 44. Do good to them that hate you, says:² "To do good to one's enemies is the height of perfection." Now charity does not require us to do that which pertains to its perfection. Therefore charity does not require us to show the signs and effects of love to our enemies.

I answer that, The effects and signs of charity are the result of inward love, and are in proportion with it. Now it is absolutely necessary, for the fulfilment of the precept, that we should inwardly love our enemies in general, but not individually, except as regards the mind being prepared to do so, as explained above (A. 8). We must accordingly apply this to the showing of the effects and signs of love. For some of the signs and favours of love are shown to our neighbours in general, as when we pray for all the faithful, or for a whole people, or when anyone bestows a favour on a whole community, and the fulfilment of the precept requires that we should show the like favours or signs of love towards our enemies. For if we did not so, it would be a proof of vengeful spite, and contrary to what is written (Levit. 19. 18): Seek not revenge, nor be mindful of the injury of thy citizens.

But there are other favours or signs of love, which one shows to certain persons in particular, and it is not necessary for salvation that we show our enemies such favours and signs of love, except as regards being ready in our minds, for instance to come to their assistance in a case of urgency, according to Prov. 25. 21: If thy enemy be hungry, give him to eat; if he thirst, give him . . . drink. Outside cases of urgency, to show such favours to an enemy belongs to the perfection of charity, by which we not only beware, as in duty bound, of being overcome by evil, but also wish to overcome evil by good, which belongs to perfection; for then we not only beware of being drawn into hatred on account of the hurt done to us, but purpose to induce our enemy to love us on account of our kindness.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

ARTICLE 10. Whether We Ought To Love the Angels out of Charity?

We proceed thus to the Tenth Article: It seems that we are not bound to love the angels out of charity.

Objection 1. For, as Augustine says,¹ "charity is a twofold love.—the love of God and of our neighbour." Now love of the angels is not contained in the love of God, since they are created substances; nor does it seem to be contained in the love of our neighbour, since they do not belong with us to a common species. Therefore we are not bound to love them out of charity.

Obj. 2. Further, Dumb animals have more in common with us than the angels have, since they belong to the same proximate genus as we do. But we do not have charity towards dumb animals, as stated above (A. 3). Neither, therefore, have we towards the angels.

Obj. 3. Further, "Nothing is so proper to friends as companionship with one another."² But the angels are not our companions; we cannot even see them. Therefore we are unable to give them the friendship of charity.

On the contrary, Augustine says:³ "If the name of neighbour is given either to those whom we pity, or to those who pity us, it is evident that the precept binding us to love our neighbour includes also the holy angels from whom we receive many merciful favours."

I answer that, As stated above (Q. XXIII, AA. 1, 5), the friendship of charity is founded upon the fellowship of everlasting happiness, in which men share in common with the angels. For it is written (Matt. 22. 30) that in the resurrection . . . men shall be as the angels of God in heaven. It is therefore evident that the friendship of charity extends also to the angels.

Reply Obj. 1. Our neighbour is not only one who is united to us in a common species, but also one who is united to us by sharing in the blessings pertaining to everlasting life, and it is on the latter fellowship that the friendship of charity is founded.

Reply Obj. 2. Dumb animals are united to us in the proximate genus by reason of their sensitive nature; but we are partakers of everlasting happiness, by reason not of our sensitive nature but of our rational mind, wherein we associate with the angels.

Reply Obj. 3. The companionship of the angels does not consist in outward conversation, which we have in respect of our sensitive nature; it consists in a fellowship of the mind, imperfect indeed in this life, but perfect in heaven, as stated above (Q. XXIII, A. 1, reply 1).

ARTICLE 11. Whether We Are Bound To Love the Demons out of Charity?

We proceed thus to the Eleventh Article: It would seem that we ought to love the demons out of charity.

Objection 1. For the angels are our neighbours by reason of their fellowship with us in a rational mind. But the demons also share in our fellowship thus, since natural gifts, such as life and understanding, remain in them unimpaired, as Dionysius states (Div. Nom. iv)⁴ Therefore we ought to love the demons out of charity.

Obj. 2. Further, The demons differ from the blessed angels in the matter of sin, even as sinners from just men. Now the just man loves the sinner out of charity. Therefore he ought to love the demons also out of charity.

Obj. 3. Further, We ought, out of charity, to love, as being our neighbours, those from whom we receive favours, as appears from the passage of Augustine quoted above (A. 10, on the contrary). Now the demons are useful to us in many things, for "by tempting us they work crowns for us," as Augustine says.¹ Therefore we ought to love the demons out of charity.

On the contrary, It is written (Isa. 28. 18): Your league with death shall be abolished, and your covenant with hell shall not stand. Now the perfection of a peace and covenant is through charity. Therefore we ought not to have charity for the demons who live in hell and administer death.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 6), in the sinner, we are bound, out of charity, to love his nature, but to hate his sin. But the name of demon is given to designate a nature deformed by sin, and therefore demons should not be loved out of charity. Without however laying stress on the word, the question as to whether the spirits called demons ought to be loved out of charity must be answered in accordance with the statement made above (AA. 2, 3), that a thing may be loved out of charity in two ways. First, a thing may be loved as the person who is the object of friendship, and thus we cannot have the friendship of charity towards the demons. For it pertains to the notion of friendship that one should be a well-wisher towards one's friend; and it is impossible for us, out of charity, to desire the good of everlasting life, to which charity is referred, for those spirits whom God has condemned eternally, since this would be in opposition to our charity towards God by which we approve of His justice.

Secondly, we love a thing as being that which we desire to be enduring as another's good. In this way we love irrational creatures out of charity, since we wish them to endure to give glory to God and be useful to man, as stated above (A. 3); and in this way too we can love the nature of the demons even out of charity, in so far as we desire those spirits to be preserved, as to their natural gifts, for God's glory.

Reply Obj. 1. The possession of everlasting happiness is not impossible for the angelic mind as it is for the mind of a demon; consequently the friendship of charity which is based on the fellowship of everlasting life rather than on the fellowship of nature, is possible towards the angels, but not towards the demons.

Reply Obj. 2. In this life, men who are in sin retain the possibility of obtaining everlasting happiness. This is not so of those who are lost in hell, who, in this respect, are in the same case as the demons.

Reply Obj. 3. That the demons are useful to us is due not to their intention but to the ordering of Divine providence; hence this leads us to be friends, not with them, but with God, Who turns their perverse intention to our profit.

ARTICLE 12. Whether Four Things Are Rightly Enumerated As To Be Loved out of Charity, Namely, God, Our Neighbour, Our Body, and Ourselves?

We proceed thus to the Twelfth Article: It would seem that these four things are not rightly enumerated as to be loved out of charity, namely, God, our neighbour, our body, and ourselves.

Objection 1. For, as Augustine states (Tract. super Joann. lxxxiii).² "he that loveth not God, loveth not himself." Hence love of oneself is included in the love of God. Therefore love of oneself is not distinct from the love of God.

Obj. 2. Further, A part ought not to be divided against the whole. But our body is part of ourselves. Therefore it ought not to be divided from ourselves as a distinct object of love.

Obj. 3. Further, Just as a man has a body, so has his neighbour. Since then the love with which a man loves his neighbour is distinct from the love with which a man loves himself, so the love with which a man loves his neighbour's body ought to be distinct from the love with which he loves his own body. Therefore these four things are not rightly distinguished as objects to be loved out of charity.

On the contrary, Augustine says:³ "There are four things to be loved; one which is above us," namely God; "another, which is ourselves, a third which is next to us," namely our neighbour; "and a fourth which is beneath us," namely our own body.

I answer that, As stated above (Q. XXIII, AA. 1, 5), the friendship of charity is based on the fellowship of happiness. Now, in this fellowship, one thing is considered as the principle from which happiness flows, namely God; a second is that which directly partakes of happiness, namely men and angels; a third is a thing to which happiness comes by a kind of overflow, namely the human body. Now the source from which happiness flows is lovable by reason of its being the cause of happiness. But that which is a partaker of happiness can be an object of love for two reasons, either through being one with ourselves, or through being associated with us in the sharing of happiness, and in this respect, there are two things to be loved out of charity, according as man loves both himself and his neighbour.

Reply Obj. 1. The different relations between a lover and the various things loved makes a different kind of lovable. Accordingly, since the relation between the human lover and God is different from his relation to himself, these two are considered as distinct objects of love, for the love of the one is the cause of the love of the other, so that the former love being removed the latter is taken away.

Reply Obj. 2. The subject of charity is the rational mind that can be capable of obtaining happiness, to which the body does not reach directly, but only by a kind of overflow. Hence, by his reasonable mind which holds the first place in him, man, out of charity, loves himself in one way, and his own body in another.

Reply Obj. 3. Man loves his neighbour, both as to his soul and as to his body, by reason of a certain fellowship in happiness. Therefore, on the part of his neighbour, there is only one reason for loving him, and our neighbour's body is not counted as a special object of love.

QUESTION XXVI

OF THE ORDER OF CHARITY

(In Thirteen Articles)

WE must now consider the order of charity, under which head there are thirteen points of inquiry: (1) Whether there is an order in charity? (2) Whether man ought to love God more than his neighbour? (3) Whether more than himself? (4) Whether he ought to love himself more than his neighbour? (5) Whether man ought to love his neighbour more than his own body? (6) Whether he ought to love one neighbour more than another? (7) Whether he ought to love more, a neighbor who is better, or one who is more closely united to him? (8) Whether he ought to love more, one who is akin to him by blood, or one who is united to him by other ties? (9) Whether, out of charity, a man ought to love his son more than his father? (10) Whether he ought to love his mother more than his father? (11) Whether he ought to love his wife more than his father or mother? (12)

Whether we ought to love those who are kind to us more than those whom we are kind to? (13) Whether the order of charity endures in heaven?

ARTICLE 1. Whether There Is Order in Charity?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that there is no order in charity.

Objection 1. For charity is a virtue. But no order is assigned to the other virtues. Neither, therefore, should any order be assigned to charity.

Obj. 2. Further, Just as the object of faith is the First Truth, so is the object of charity the Sovereign Good. Now no order is appointed for faith, but all things are believed equally. Neither, therefore, ought there to be any order in charity.

Obj. 3. Further, Charity is in the will. But ordering belongs, not to the will, but to the reason. Therefore no order should be ascribed to charity.

On the contrary, It is written (Cant. 2. 4): He brought me into the cellar of wine, he set in order charity in me.

I answer that, As the Philosopher says,¹ "the terms before and after are used in reference to some principle." Now order implies that certain things are, in some way, before and after. Hence wherever there is a principle, there must be also order of some kind. But it has been said above (Q. XXIII, A. 1; Q. XXV, A. 12) that the love of charity tends to God as to the principle of happiness, on the fellowship of which the friendship of charity is based. Consequently there must be some order in things loved out of charity, which order is in reference to the first principle of that love, which is God.

Reply Obj. 1. Charity tends towards the last end considered as last end, and this does not apply to any other virtue, as stated above (Q. XXIII, A. 6). Now the end has the character of principle in matters of appetite and action, as was shown above (Q. XXIII, A. 7; Part I-II, Q. XIII, A. 3). Therefore charity, above all, implies relation to the First Principle, and consequently, in charity above all, we find an order in reference to the First Principle.

Reply Obj. 2. Faith pertains to the cognitive power, whose operation depends on the thing known being in the knower. On the other hand, charity is in an affective power, whose operation consists in the soul tending to things themselves. Now order is to be found more especially in things themselves, and flows from them into our knowledge. Hence order is more appropriate to charity than to faith. And yet there is a certain order in faith, in so far as it is chiefly about God, and secondarily about things referred to God.

Reply Obj. 3. Order belongs to reason as the power that orders, and to the appetitive power as to the power which is ordered. It is in this way that order is stated to be in charity.

ARTICLE 2. Whether God Ought To Be Loved More Than Our Neighbour?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that God ought not to be loved more than our neighbour.

Objection 1. For it is written (I John 4 20): He that loveth not his brother whom he seeth, how can he love God, Whom he seeth not? From which it seems to follow that the more a thing is visible the more lovable it is, since "loving begins with seeing," according to the *Ethics*¹ Now God is less visible than our neighbour. Therefore He is less lovable, out of charity, than our neighbour.

Obj. 2 Further, Likeness causes love, according to Eccclus. 13. 19: Every beast loveth its like Now man bears more likeness to his neighbour than to God. Therefore man loves his neighbour, out of charity, more than he loves God

Obj. 3. Further, What charity loves in a neighbour, is God, according to Augustine.² Now God is not greater in Himself than He is in our neighbour. Therefore He is not more to be loved in Himself than in our neighbour. Therefore we ought not to love God more than our neighbour.

On the contrary, A thing ought to be loved more if others ought to be hated on its account. Now we ought to hate our neighbour for God's sake, if, that is, he leads us astray from God, according to Luke 14. 26: If any man come to Me and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters . . . he cannot be My disciple. Therefore we ought to love God, out of charity, more than our neighbour.

I answer that, Each kind of friendship regards chiefly the subject in which we chiefly find the good on the fellowship of which that friendship is based; thus civil friendship regards chiefly the ruler of the state, on whom the entire common good of the state depends; hence to him before all, the citizens owe fidelity and obedience. Now the friendship of charity is based on the fellowship of happiness, which consists essentially in God, as the First Principle, from whom it flows to all who are capable of happiness. Therefore God ought to be loved chiefly and before all out of charity, for He is loved as the cause of happiness, while our neighbour is loved as receiving together with us a share of happiness from Him.

Reply Obj. 1. A thing is a cause of love in two ways. First, as being the reason for loving, and in this way good is the cause of love, since each thing is loved according to its measure of goodness. Secondly, a thing causes love, as being a way to acquire love. It is in this way that seeing is the cause of loving, not as though a thing were lovable according as it is visible, but because by seeing a thing we are led to love it. Hence it does not follow that what is more visible is more lovable, but that as an object of love we meet with it before others; and that is the sense of the Apostle's argument. For, since our neighbour is more visible to us, he is the first lovable object we meet with, because "the soul learns, from those things it knows, to love what it knows not," as Gregory says in a homily (In Evang. xi).³ Hence it can be argued that, if any man does not love his neighbour, neither does he love God, not because his neighbour is more lovable, but because he is the first thing to demand our love. But God is more lovable by reason of His greater goodness.

Reply Obj. 2. The likeness we have to God precedes and causes the likeness we have to our neighbour, because from the very fact that we share along with our neighbour in something received from God, we become like to our neighbour. Hence by reason of this likeness we ought to love God more than we love our neighbour.

Reply Obj. 3. Considered in His substance, God is equally in all, in whomsoever He may be, for He is not lessened by being in anything. And yet our neighbour does not possess God's goodness equally with God, for God has it essentially, and our neighbour by participation ARTICLE 3. Whether, out of Charity, Man Is Bound To Love God More Than Himself?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that man is not bound, out of charity, to love God more than himself.

Objection 1 For the Philosopher says⁴ that "a man's friendly relations with others arise from his friendly relations with himself." Now

¹ Aristotle, IX, 5, 12 (1167^a4; 1171^b20).

⁴ Ethics, IX, 4, 10 (1160^a1; 1168^b5).

the cause is stronger than its effect. Therefore man's friendship towards himself is greater than his friendship for anyone else. Therefore he ought to love himself more than God.

Obj. 2. Further, One loves a thing in so far as it is one's own good. Now the reason for loving a thing is more loved than the thing itself which is loved for that reason, even as the principles which are the reason for knowing a thing are more known. Therefore man loves himself more than any other good loved by him. Therefore he does not love God more than himself.

Obj. 3. Further, A man loves God as much as he loves to enjoy God. But a man loves himself as much as he loves to enjoy God, since this is the highest good a man can wish for himself. Therefore man is not bound, out of charity, to love God more than himself.

On the contrary, Augustine says:¹ "If thou oughtest to love thyself, not for thy own sake, but for the sake of Him in Whom is the rightest end of thy love, let no other man take offence if him also thou lovest for God's sake." Now the cause of a thing being such is yet more so. Therefore man ought to love God more than himself.

I answer that, The good we receive from God is twofold, the good of nature, and the good of grace. Now the fellowship of natural goods bestowed on us by God is the foundation of natural love, in virtue of which not only man, so long as his nature remains unimpaired, loves God above all things and more than himself, but also every single creature, each in its own way, that is, either by an intellectual, or by a rational, or by an animal, or at least by a natural love, as stones do, for instance, and other things bereft of knowledge, because each part naturally loves the common good of the whole more than its own particular good. This is evidenced by its operation, since the principal inclination of each part is towards common action conducive to the usefulness of the whole. It may also be seen in political virtues according to which sometimes the citizens suffer damage even to their own property and persons for the sake of the common good. And so much more is this realized with regard to the friendship of charity which is based on the fellowship of the gifts of grace. Therefore man ought, out of charity, to love God, Who is the common good of all, more than himself, since happiness is in God as in the universal and fountain-head principle of all who are able to have a share of that happiness.

Reply Obj. 1. The Philosopher is speaking of friendly relations towards another person in whom the good, which is the object of friendship, resides in some particular way, and not of friendly relations with another in whom the aforesaid good resides in totality.

Reply Obj. 2. The part does indeed love the good of the whole, as becomes a part, not however so as to refer the good of the whole to itself, but rather itself to the good of the whole.

Reply Obj. 3. That a man wishes to enjoy God pertains to that love of God which is love of concupiscence. Now we love God with the love of friendship more than with the love of concupiscence, because the Divine good is greater in itself than our share of good in enjoying Him. Hence, absolutely, out of charity, man loves God more than himself.

ARTICLE 4. Whether out of Charity, Man Ought To Love Himself More Than His Neighbour?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that a man ought not, out of charity, to love himself more than his neighbour.

Objection 1. For the principal object of charity is God, as stated above (A. 2). Now sometimes our neighbour is more closely united to God than we ourselves. Therefore we ought to love such a one more than ourselves.

Obj. 2. Further, The more we love a person, the more we avoid injuring him. Now a man, out of charity, submits to injury for his neighbour's sake, according to Prov. 12. 26: He that neglecteth a loss for the sake of a friend, is just. Therefore a man ought, out of charity, to love his neighbour more than himself.

Obj. 3. Further, It is written (I Cor. 13. 5) that charity seeketh not its own. Now the thing we love most is the one whose good we seek most. Therefore a man does not, out of charity, love himself more than his neighbour.

On the contrary, It is written (Lev. 19. 18, Matt. 22. 39): Thou shalt love thy neighbour (Lev. loc. cit.,—friend) as thyself. From this it seems to follow that man's love for himself is the exemplar of his love for another. But the exemplar exceeds the copy. Therefore, out of charity, a man ought to love himself more than his neighbour.

I answer that, There are two things in man, his spiritual nature and his corporeal nature. And a man is said to love himself by reason of his loving himself with regard to his spiritual nature, as stated above (Q. XXV, A. 7), so that accordingly, a man ought, out of charity, to love himself more than he loves any other person. This is evident from the very reason for loving, since, as stated above (A. 2; Q. XXV, A. 12), God is loved as the principle of good, on which the love of charity is founded; while man, out of charity, loves himself by reason of his being a partaker of that good, and loves his neighbour by reason of his fellowship in that good. Now fellowship is a reason for love according to a certain union in relation to God. Therefore just as unity surpasses union, the fact that man himself has a share of the Divine good is a more potent reason for loving than that another should be a partner with him in that share. Therefore man, out of charity, ought to love himself more than his neighbour. And a sign of this is that a man ought not to give way to any evil of sin which counteracts his share of happiness, not even that he may free his neighbour from sin.

Reply Obj. 1. The love of charity takes its quantity not only from its object which is God, but also from the lover, who is the man that has charity, even as the quantity of any action depends in some way on the subject. Therefore, though a better neighbour is nearer to God, yet because he is not as near to the man who has charity as this man is to himself, it does not follow that a man is bound to love his neighbour more than himself.

Reply Obj. 2. A man ought to bear bodily injury for his friend's sake, and in this very thing he loves himself more as regards his spiritual mind, because it pertains to the perfection of virtue, which is a good of the mind. In spiritual matters, however, man ought not to suffer injury by sinning in order to free his neighbour from sin, as stated above.

Reply Obj. 3. As Augustine says in his Rule,¹ "the saying, 'charity seeks not her own,' means that it prefers the common to the private good." Now the common good is always more lovable to the individual than his private good, even as the good of the whole is more lovable to the part than the latter's own partial good, as stated above (A. 3).

ARTICLE 5. Whether a Man Ought To Love His Neighbour More Than His Own Body?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that a man is not bound to love his neighbour more than his own body.

Objection 1. For his neighbour includes his neighbour's body. If therefore a man ought to love his neighbour more than his own body, it follows that he ought to love his neighbour's body more than his own.

Obj. 2. Further, A man ought to love his own soul more than his neighbour's, as stated above (A. 4). Now a man's own body is nearer to his soul than his neighbour. Therefore we ought to love our body more than our neighbour.

Obj. 3. Further, A man imperils that which he loves less for the sake of what he loves more. Now every man is not bound to imperil his own body for his neighbour's safety; rather this belongs to the perfect, according to John 15. 13: Greater love than this no man hath, that a man lay down his life for his friends. Therefore a man is not bound, out of charity, to love his neighbour more than his own body.

On the contrary, Augustine says² that "we ought to love our neighbour more than our own body."

I answer that, Out of charity we ought to love more that which has more fully the reason for being loved out of charity, as stated above (AA. 2, 4). Now fellowship in the full participation of happiness which is the reason for loving one's neighbour, is a greater reason for loving than the participation of happiness by way of overflow, which is the reason for loving one's own body. Therefore, as regards the welfare of the soul we ought to love our neighbour more than our own body.

Reply Obj. 1. According to the Philosopher³ "a thing seems to be that which is predominant in it," so that when we say that we ought to love our neighbour more than our own body, this refers to his soul, which is his predominant part.

Reply Obj. 2. Our body is nearer to our soul than our neighbour as regards the constitution of our own nature; but as regards the participation of happiness, our neighbour's soul is more closely associated with our own soul than even our own body is.

Reply Obj. 3. Every man is immediately concerned with the care of his own body, but not with his neighbour's welfare, except perhaps in cases of urgency. Therefore charity does not necessarily require a man to imperil his own body for his neighbour's welfare except in a case where he is under obligation to do so; and if a man of his own accord offer himself for that purpose, this belongs to the perfection of charity.

ARTICLE 6. Whether We Ought To Love One Neighbour More Than Another?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that we ought not to love one neighbour more than another.

Objection 1. For Augustine says.¹ "One ought to love all men equally. Since, however, one cannot do good to all, we ought to consider those chiefly who by reason of place, time or any other circumstance, by a kind of chance, are more closely united to us." Therefore one neighbour ought not to be loved more than another.

Obj. 2. Further, Where there is one and the same reason for loving several, there should be no inequality of love. Now there is one and the same reason for loving all one's neighbours, which reason is God, as Augustine states "Therefore we ought to love all our neighbours equally."

Obj. 3. Further, To love a man is to wish him good things, as the Philosopher states.² Now to all our neighbours we wish an equal good, namely everlasting life. Therefore we ought to love all our neighbours equally.

On the contrary, One's obligation to love a person is proportionate to the gravity of the sin one commits in acting against that love. Now it is a more grievous sin to act against the love of certain neighbours, than against the love of others. Hence the commandment of Lev. 20. 9),—He that curseth his father or mother, dying let him die, which does not apply to those who cursed others than these. Therefore we ought to love some neighbours more than others.

I answer that, There have been two opinions on this question. For some have said³ that we ought, out of charity, to love all our neighbours equally as regards our affection, but not as regards the outward effect. They held that the order of love is to be understood as applying to outward favours, which we ought to confer on those who are close to us in preference to those who are distant, and not to the inward affection, which ought to be given equally to all including our enemies.

But this is unreasonable. For the affection of charity, which is the inclination of grace, is not less orderly than the natural appetite, which is the inclination of nature, for both inclinations flow from Divine wisdom. Now we observe in the physical order that the natural inclination in each thing is proportioned to the act or movement that is fitting to the nature of that thing; thus in earth the inclination of gravity is greater than in water, because it is fitting to earth to be beneath water. Consequently the inclination also of grace which is the affection of charity, must be proportioned to those actions which have to be performed outwardly, so that, namely, the affection of our charity be more intense towards those to whom we ought to behave with greater kindness.

We must, therefore, say that, even as regards the affection we ought to love one neighbour more than another. The reason is that, since the principle of love is God and the person himself who loves, it must be that the affection of love increases in proportion to the nearness to one or the other of those principles. For as we stated above (A. 1), wherever we find a principle, order depends on relation to that principle.

Reply Obj. 1. Love can be unequal in two ways. First, on the part of the good we wish our friend. In this respect we love all men equally out of charity, because we wish them all one same generic good, namely everlasting happiness. Secondly love is said to be greater through its action being more intense. And in this way we ought not to love all equally.

Or we may reply that we have unequal love for certain persons in two ways. First, through our loving some and not loving others. As regards beneficence we are bound to observe this inequality, because we cannot do good to all; but as regards benevolence, love ought not to be thus unequal. The other inequality arises from our loving some more than others; and Augustine does not mean to exclude the latter inequality, but the former, as is evident from what he says of beneficence.

Reply Obj. 2. Our neighbours are not all equally related to God. Some are nearer to Him by reason of their greater goodness, and those we ought, out of charity, to love more than those who are not so near to Him.

Reply Obj. 3. This argument considers the quantity of love on the part of the good which we wish our friends.

ARTICLE 7. Whether We Ought To Love Those Who Are Better More Than Those Who Are More Closely United To Us?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It seems that we ought to love those who are better more than those who are more closely united to us.

Objection 1. For that which is in no way hateful seems more lovable than that which is hateful for some reason, just as a thing is all the whiter for having less black mixed with it. Now those who are connected with us are hateful for some reason, according to Luke 14. 26: If any man come to Me, and hate not his father, etc. On the other hand good men are not hateful for any reason. Therefore it seems that we ought to love those who are better more than those who are more closely connected with us.

Obj. 2. Further, By charity above all, man is likened to God. But God loves more the better man. Therefore man also, out of charity, ought to love the better man more than one who is more closely united to him.

Obj. 3. Further, In every friendship that ought to be loved most which has most to do with the foundation of that friendship: for, by natural friendship we love most those who are connected with us by nature, our parents for instance, or our children. Now the friendship of charity is founded upon the fellowship of happiness, which has more to do with better men than with those who are more closely united to us. Therefore, out of charity, we ought to love better men more than those who are more closely connected with us.

On the contrary, It is written (I Tim. 5. 8): If any man have not care of his own, and especially of those of his house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel. Now the inward affection of charity ought to correspond to the outward effect. Therefore charity regards those who are nearer to us before those who are better.

I answer that, Every act should be proportionate both to its object and to the agent. But from its object it takes its species, while from the power of the agent it takes the mode of its intensity; thus movement has its species from the term to which it tends, while the intensity of its speed arises from the disposition of the thing moved and the power of the mover. Accordingly love takes its species from its object, but its intensity is due to the lover.

Now the object of charity's love is God, and man is the lover. Therefore the specific diversity of the love which is in accordance with charity, as regards the love of our neighbour, depends on his relation to God, so that, out of charity, we should wish a greater good to one who is nearer to God; for though the good which charity wishes to all, namely everlasting happiness, is one in itself, yet it has various degrees according to various shares of happiness, and it belongs to charity to wish God's justice to be maintained, in accordance with which better men have a fuller share of happiness. And this pertains to the species of love; for there are different species of love according to the different goods that we wish for those whom we love.

On the other hand, the intensity of love is measured with regard to the man who loves, and accordingly man loves those who are more closely united to him with more intense affection as to the good he wishes for them, than he loves those who are better as to the greater good he wishes for them.

Again a further difference must be observed here. For some neighbours are near to us by their natural origin, a nearness which cannot be lessened, since that origin makes them to be what they are. But the goodness of virtue, according to which some are close to God, can come and go, increase and decrease, as was shown above (Q. XXIV, AA. 4, 10, 11). Hence it is possible for one, out of charity, to wish this man who is more closely united to one to be better than another, and so reach a higher degree of happiness.

Moreover there is yet another reason for which, out of charity, we love more those who are more nearly connected with us, since we love them in more ways. For, towards those who are not connected with us we have no other friendship than charity, but for those who are connected with us we have certain other friendships, according to the way in which they are connected. Now since the good on which every other friendship of the virtuous is based is directed, as to its end, to the good on which charity is based, it follows that charity commands each act of another friendship, even as the art which is about the end commands the art which is about the means. Consequently this very act of loving someone because he is akin or connected with us, or because he is a fellow-countryman or for any like reason that is referable to the end of charity, can be commanded by charity, so that, out of charity both eliciting and commanding, we love in more ways those who are more nearly connected with us.

Reply Obj. 1. We are commanded to hate, in our kindred, not their kinship, but only the fact of their being an obstacle between us and God. In this respect they are not akin but hostile to us, according to Micah. 7. 6: A man's enemies are they of his own household.

Reply Obj. 2. Charity conforms man to God proportionately, by making man comport himself towards what is his, as God does towards what is His. For we may, out of charity, will certain things as fitting to us which God does not will, because it is fitting to Him not to will them, as stated above (Part I-II, q. XIX, A. 10), when we were treating of the goodness of the will.

Reply Obj. 3. Charity elicits the act of love not only as regards the object, but also as regards the lover, as stated above. The result is that the man who is more nearly united to us is more loved.

ARTICLE 8. Whether We Ought To Love More Those Who Are Connected with Us by Ties of Blood?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It would seem that we ought not to love more those who are more closely united to us by ties of blood.

Objection 1. For it is written (Prov. 18. 24): A man amiable in society, shall be more friendly than a brother. Again, Valerius Maximus says (Fact. et Dict. Memor. iv, 7):¹ "The ties of friendship are most strong and in no way yield to the ties of blood. Moreover it is quite certain and undeniable, that as to the latter, the lot of birth is fortuitous, whereas we contract the former by an untrammelled will, and a solid pledge." Therefore we ought not to love more than others those who are united to us by ties of blood.

Obj. 2. Further, Ambrose says (De Officiis, i, 7):² "I love not less you whom I have begotten in the Gospel, than if I had begotten you in wedlock, for nature is no more eager to love than grace. Surely we ought to love those whom we expect to be with us for ever more than those who will be with us only in this world." Therefore we should not love our kindred more than those who are otherwise connected with us.

Obj. 3. Further, "Love is proved by deeds," as Gregory states (Hom. in Ev. xxx).³ Now we are bound to do acts of love to others than our kindred; thus in the army a man must obey his officer rather than his father. Therefore we are not bound to love our kindred most of all.

On the contrary, The commandments of the decalogue contain a special precept about the honour due to our parents (Exod. 20. 12). Therefore we ought to love more specially those who are united to us by ties of blood.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 7), we ought out of charity to love those who are more closely united to us more, both because our love for them is more intense, and because there are more reasons for loving them. Now intensity of love arises from the union of lover and beloved, and therefore we should measure the love of different persons according to the different kinds of union, so that a man is more loved in matters touching that particular union in respect of which he is loved. And, again, in comparing love to love we should compare one union with another.

Accordingly we must say that friendship among blood relations is based upon their connection by natural origin, the friendship of fellow-citizens on their civic fellowship, and the friendship of those who are fighting side by side on the comradeship of battle. Therefore in matters pertaining to nature we should love our kindred most, in matters concerning relations between citizens, we should prefer our fellow-citizens, and on the battlefield our fellow-soldiers. Hence the Philosopher says⁴ that "it is our duty to render to each class of people such respect as is natural and appropriate. This is in fact the principle upon which we seem to act, for we invite our relations to a wedding. . . . It would seem to be a special duty to afford our parents the means of living . . . and to honour them" And the same applies to other kinds of friendship.

If however we compare union with union, it is evident that the union arising from natural origin is prior to, and more stable than, all others, because it is something affecting the very substance, while other unions are something added above and may cease altogether. Therefore the friendship of kindred is more stable, while other friendships may be stronger in respect of that which is proper to each of them.

Reply Obj. 1. Because the friendship of comrades originates through their own choice, love of this kind takes precedence of the love of kindred in matters where we are free to do as we choose, for instance in matters of action. Yet the friendship of kindred is more stable, since it is more natural, and preponderates over others in matters touching nature. Consequently we are more bound to them in the providing of necessities.

Reply Obj. 2. Ambrose is speaking of love with regard to favours respecting the fellowship of grace, namely, moral instruction. For in this matter, a man ought to provide for his spiritual children whom he has begotten spiritually, more than for the sons of his body, whom he is bound to support in bodily sustenance.

Reply Obj. 3. The fact that in the battle a man obeys his officer rather than his father proves that he loves his father less, not absolutely but relatively, that is, as regards the love which is based on fellowship in battle.

ARTICLE 9. Whether a Man Ought, out of Charity, To Love His Children More Than His Father?

We proceed thus to the Ninth Article: It seems that a man ought, out of charity, to love his children more than his father.

Objection 1. For we ought to love those more to whom we are bound to do good. Now we are more bound to do good to our children than to our parents, since the Apostle says (II Cor. 12. 14): Neither ought the children to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children. Therefore a man ought to love his children more than his parents.

Obj. 2. Further, Grace perfects nature. But parents naturally love their children more than these love them, as the Philosopher states.¹ Therefore a man ought to love his children more than his parents.

Obj. 3. Further, Man's affections are conformed to God by charity. But God loves His children more than they love Him. Therefore we also ought to love our children more than our parents.

On the contrary, Ambrose says² that we ought to love God first, then our parents, then our children, and lastly those of our household.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 4, reply 1, A. 7), the degrees of love may be thought of from two standpoints. First, from that of the object. In this respect the more a thing has the aspect of good, and the more like to God, the more is it to be loved. And in this way a man ought to love his father more than his children, because, namely, he loves his father as his principle, in which respect he is a more exalted good and more like God.

Secondly, the degrees of love may be measured from the standpoint of the lover, and in this respect a man loves more that which is more closely connected with him. In this way a man's children are more lovable to him than his father, as the Philosopher states.³ First, because parents love their children as being part of themselves; but the father is not part of his son, so that the love of a father for his children, is more like a man's love for himself. Secondly, because parents know better that so and so is their child than vice versa. Thirdly, because children are nearer to their parents, as being part of them than their parents are to them to whom they stand in the relation of a principle. Fourthly, because parents have loved longer, for the father begins to love his child at once, while the child begins to love his father after a lapse of time; and the longer love lasts, the stronger it is, according to Eccclus. 9. 14: Forsake not an old friend, for the new will not be like to him.

Reply Obj. 1. The debt due to a principle is submission of respect and honour, while that due to the effect proportionately on the part of the principle is one of influence and care. Hence the duty of children to their parents consists chiefly in honour, while that of parents to their children is especially one of care.

Reply Obj. 2. It is natural for a man as father to love his children more, if we consider them as closely connected with him; but if we consider which is the more exalted good, the son naturally loves his father more.

Reply Obj. 3. As Augustine says,⁴ "God loves us for our good and for His honour." Therefore since our father is related to us as principle, even as God is, it belongs properly to the father to receive honour from his children, and to the children to be provided by their parents with what is good for them. Nevertheless in cases of necessity the child is bound out of the favours received to provide for his parents before all.

ARTICLE 10. Whether a Man Ought To Love His Mother More Than His Father?

We proceed thus to the Tenth Article: It would seem that a man ought to love his mother more than his father.

Objection 1. For, as the Philosopher says,⁵ "the female produces the body in generation." Now man receives his soul, not from his father, but from God by creation, as stated in the First Part (Q. xc, A. 2; Q. cxviii, A. 2). Therefore a man receives more from his mother than from his father, and consequently he ought to love her more than him.

Obj. 2. Further, Where greater love is given, greater love is due. Now a mother loves her child more than the father does, for the Philosopher says⁶ that "mothers have greater love for their children. For the mother labours more in child-bearing, and she knows more surely than the father who are her children." Therefore a man ought to love his mother more than his father.

Obj. 3. Further, Love should be more fond towards those who have laboured for us more, according to Rom. 16. 6: Salute Mary, who hath laboured much among you. Now the mother labours more than the father in giving birth and education to her child; hence it is written (Ecclus. 7. 29): Forget not the groanings of thy mother. Therefore a man ought to love his mother more than his father.

¹ Ethics, viii, 12 (1161^b21). ² Cf. Origen, In Cant., hom. II, on 2.4 (1st G 13, 64). ³ Ethics, viii, 12 (1161^b19).

On the contrary, Jerome says on Ezech. 44. 24¹ that a man ought to love God the Father of all, and then his own father, and mentions the mother afterwards.

I answer that, In making such comparisons as this, we must take the answer in the strict sense, so that the present question is whether the father as father, ought to be loved more than the mother as mother. The reason is that virtue and vice may make such a difference in these matters that friendship may be diminished or destroyed, as the Philosopher remarks.² Hence Ambrose says that good servants should be preferred to wicked children.³

Strictly speaking, however, the father should be loved more than the mother. For father and mother are loved as principles of our natural origin. Now the father is principle in a more excellent way than the mother, because he is the active principle, while the mother is a passive and material principle. Consequently, strictly speaking, the father is to be loved more.

Reply Obj. 1. In the begetting of man, the mother supplies the formless matter of the body, and the latter receives its form through the formative power that is in the semen of the father. And though this power cannot create the rational soul, yet it disposes the matter of the body to receive that form.

Reply Obj. 2. This applies to another kind of love. For the friendship between lover and lover differs specifically from the friendship between child and parent. But the friendship we are speaking of here, is that which a man owes his father and mother through being begotten of them.

The Reply to the Third Objection is evident.

ARTICLE 11. Whether a Man Ought To Love His Wife More Than His Father and Mother?

We proceed thus to the Eleventh Article: It would seem that a man ought to love his wife more than his father and mother.

Objection 1. For no man leaves a thing for another unless he love the latter more. Now it is written (Gen. 2. 24) that a man shall leave father and mother on account of his wife.

Therefore a man ought to love his wife more than his father and mother.

Obj. 2. Further, The Apostle says (Eph. 5. 33) that a husband should love his wife as himself. Now a man ought to love himself more than his parents. Therefore he ought to love his wife also more than his parents.

Obj. 3. Further, Love should be greater where there are more reasons for loving. Now there are more reasons for love in the friendship of a man towards his wife. For the Philosopher says⁴ that "in this friendship there are the motives of utility, pleasure, and also of virtue, if husband and wife are virtuous." Therefore a man's love for his wife ought to be greater than his love for his parents.

On the contrary, According to Eph. 5. 28, men ought to love their wives as their own bodies. Now a man ought to love his body less than his neighbour, as stated above (A. 5), and among his neighbours he should love his parents most. Therefore he ought to love his parents more than his wife.

I answer that, As stated above (AA. 7, 9), the degrees of love may be taken from the aspect of good or from the union between those who love. From the aspect of good, which is on the part of the object loved, a man should love his parents more than his wife, because he loves them as his principles and considered as a more exalted good. But on the part of the union, the wife ought to be loved more, because she is united to her husband as one flesh, according to Matt. 19. 6: Therefore now they are not two, but one flesh. Consequently a man loves his wife more intensely, but greater reverence should be shown to his parents.

Reply Obj. 1. A man does not in all respects leave his father and mother for the sake of his wife, for in certain cases a man ought to succour his parents rather than his wife. He does however leave all his kinsfolk, and cleaves to his wife as regards the union of carnal connection and cohabitation.

Reply Obj. 2. The words of the Apostle do not mean that a man ought to love his wife equally with himself, but that a man's love for himself is the reason for his love of his wife, since she is one with him.

Reply Obj. 3. There are also several reasons for a man's love for his father; and these, in a certain respect, namely, as regards good, are more weighty than those for which a man loves his wife; although the latter outweigh the former as regards the closeness of union.

⁴ Ethics, VIII, 12 (1162^a24).

As to the argument in the contrary sense, it must be observed that in the words quoted, the particle "as" denotes not equality of love but the reason of love. For the principal reason why a man loves his wife is her being united to him in the flesh.

ARTICLE 12. Whether a Man Ought To Love More His Benefactor Than One He Has Benefited?

We proceed thus to the Twelfth Article: It seems that a man ought to love his benefactor more than one he has benefited.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (De Catech. Rud. iv)¹ "Nothing will incite another more to love you than that you love him first: for he must have a hard heart indeed, who not only refuses to love, but declines to return love already given." Now a man's benefactor forestalls him in the kindly deeds of charity. Therefore we ought to love our benefactors above all.

Obj. 2. Further, The more grievously we sin by ceasing to love a man or by working against him, the more ought we to love him. Now it is a more grievous sin to cease loving a benefactor or to work against him than to cease loving one to whom one has hitherto done kindly actions. Therefore we ought to love our benefactors more than those to whom we are kind.

Obj. 3. Further, Of all things lovable, God is to be loved most, and then one's father, as Jerome says.² Now these are our greatest benefactors. Therefore a benefactor should be loved above all others.

I answer that, As stated above (AA. 7, 9, 11), a thing is loved more in two ways: first because it has the character of a more excellent good, secondly by reason of a closer connection. In the first way we ought to love our benefactor most, because, since he is a principle of good to the man he has benefited, he has the character of a more excellent good, as stated above with regard to one's father (A. 9).

In the second way, however, we love those more who have received benefactions from us, as the Philosopher proves⁴ by four arguments. First because the recipient of benefactions is in a sense the handiwork of the benefactor, so that we are accustomed to say of a man: He was made by so and so. Now it is natural to a man to love his own work (thus it is to be observed that poets love their own poems); and the reason is that we love to be and to live, and these are made manifest especially in our action. Secondly, because we all naturally love that in which we see our own good. Now it is true that the benefactor has some good of his in the recipient of his benefaction, and the recipient some good in the benefactor; but the benefactor sees his virtuous good in the recipient, while the recipient sees his useful good in the benefactor. Now it gives more pleasure to see one's virtuous good than one's useful good, both because it is more enduring,—for usefulness quickly passes, and the pleasure of calling a thing to mind is not like the pleasure of having it present,—and because it is more pleasant to recall virtuous goods than the profit we have derived from others. Thirdly, because it is the lover's part to act, since he wills and works the good of the beloved, while the beloved takes a passive part in receiving good, so that to love surpasses being loved, for which reason the greater love is on the part of the benefactor. Fourthly because it is more difficult to give than to receive favours, and we are most fond of things which have cost us most trouble, while in a sense we despise what comes easy to us.

Reply Obj. 1. It is something in the benefactor that incites the recipient to love him, while the benefactor loves the recipient not through being incited by him, but through being moved to this of his own accord. And what we do of our own accord surpasses what we do through another.

Reply Obj. 2. The love of the beneficiary for the benefactor is more of a duty, and therefore the contrary is the greater sin. On the other hand, the love of the benefactor for the beneficiary is more spontaneous, and therefore it is quicker to act.

Reply Obj. 3. God also loves us more than we love Him, and parents love their children more than these love them. Yet it does not follow that we love all who have received good from us more than any of our benefactors. For we prefer such benefactors as God and our parents from whom we have received the greatest favours to those on whom we have bestowed lesser benefits.

ARTICLE 13. Whether the Order of Charity Endures in Heaven?

We proceed thus to the Thirteenth Article: It would seem that the order of charity does not endure in heaven.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (De Vera Relig. xlviii):¹ "Perfect charity consists in loving greater goods more, and lesser goods less." Now charity will be perfect in heaven. Therefore a man will love those who are better more than either himself or those who are connected with him.

Obj. 2. Further, We love more him to whom we wish a greater good. Now each one in heaven wishes a greater good for those who have more good; otherwise his will would not be conformed in all things to God's will, and to be better in heaven is to have more good. Therefore in heaven each one loves more those who are better, and consequently he loves others more than himself, and one who is not connected with him more than one who is.

Obj. 3. Further, In heaven love will be entirely for God's sake, for then will be fulfilled the words of I Cor. 15. 28: That God may be all in all. Therefore he who is nearer God will be loved more, so that a man will love a better man more than himself, and one who is not connected with him, more than one who is.

On the contrary, Nature is not done away, but perfected, by glory. Now the order of charity given above (AA. 3, 6, 7, 8) is derived from nature, since all things naturally love themselves more than others. Therefore this order of charity will endure in heaven.

I answer that, The order of charity as regards the love of God above all things must remain in heaven. For this will be realized absolutely when man shall enjoy God perfectly. But, as regards the order between man himself and other men, a distinction seems to be necessary, because, as we stated above (A. 7), the degrees of love may be distinguished either in respect of the good which a man desires for another, or according to the intensity of love itself. In the first way a man will love better men than himself, and those who are less good, less than himself, because, by reason of the perfect conformity of the human to the Divine will, each of the blessed will desire everyone to have what is due to him according to Divine justice. Nor will that be a time for advancing by means of merit to a yet greater reward, as happens now while it is possible for a man to desire both the virtue and the reward of a better man; but then the will of each one will rest within the limits determined by God.

In the second way however a man will love himself more than even his better neighbours, because the intensity of the act of love arises on the part of the person who loves, as stated above (A. 7). Moreover it is for this that the gift of charity is bestowed by God on each one, namely, that he may first of all direct his mind to God, and this pertains to a man's love for himself, and that, in the second place, he may wish other things to be directed to God, and even work for that end according to his capacity.

As to the order to be observed among our neighbours, a man will love absolutely those who are better, according to the love of charity. Because the entire life of the blessed consists in directing their minds to God, and so the entire ordering of their love will be ruled with respect to God, so that each one will love more and regard as nearer to himself those who are nearer to God. For then one man will no longer succour another, as he needs to in the present life, in which each man has to succour those who are closely connected with him rather than those who are not, no matter what be the nature of their distress; hence it is that in this life, a man, by the inclination of charity, loves more those who are more closely united to him, for he is under a greater obligation to bestow on them the effect of charity. It will however be possible in heaven for a man to love in several ways one who is connected with him, since the causes of virtuous love will not be banished from the mind of the blessed. Yet all these reasons are incomparably surpassed by that which is taken from nearness to God.

Reply Obj. 1. This argument should be granted as to those who are joined together; but as regards man himself, he ought to love himself so much the more than others as his charity is more perfect, since perfect charity orders man to God perfectly, and this pertains to love of oneself, as stated above.

Reply Obj. 2. This argument considers the order of love in respect of the degree of good one wills the person one loves.

Reply Obj. 3. God will be to each one the entire reason of his love, for God is man's entire good. For if we make the impossible supposition that God were not man's good, He would not be man's reason for loving. Hence it is that in the order of love man should love himself more than all else after God.

QUESTION XXVII

OF THE PRINCIPAL ACT OF CHARITY, WHICH IS LOVE (In Eight Articles)

We must now consider the act of charity, and (1) the principal act of charity, which is love,

(2) the other acts or effects which follow from that act (Q. xxviii).

Under the first head there are eight points of inquiry: (1) Which is the more proper to charity, to love or to be loved? (2) Whether to love considered as an act of charity is the same as goodwill? (3) Whether God should be loved for His own sake? (4) Whether God can be loved immediately in this life? (5) Whether God can be loved wholly? (6) Whether the love of God is according to measure? (7) Which is the better, to love one's friend, or one's enemy? (8) Which is the better, to love God, or one's neighbour?

ARTICLE 1. Whether To Be Loved Is More Proper to Charity Than To Love

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that it is more proper to charity to be loved than to love.

Objection 1. For the better charity is to be found in those who are themselves better. But those who are better should be more loved. Therefore to be loved is more proper to charity.

Obj. 2. Further, That which is to be found in more subjects seems to be more in keeping with nature, and, for that reason, better. Now, as the Philosopher says,¹ "many would rather be loved than love, and lovers of flattery always abound." Therefore it is better to be loved than to love, and consequently it is more in keeping with charity.

Obj. 3. Further, The cause of anything being such is yet more so. Now men love because they are loved, for Augustine says (De Catech. Rud. iv)² that "nothing incites another more to love you than that you love him first." Therefore charity consists in being loved rather than in loving.

On the contrary, The Philosopher says³ that "friendship consists in loving rather than in being loved." Now charity is a kind of friendship. Therefore it consists in loving rather than in being loved.

I answer that, To love belongs to charity as charity. For, since charity is a virtue, by its very essence it has an inclination to its proper act. Now to be loved is not the act of the charity of the person loved; for this act is to love, but to be loved belongs to him as coming under the common notion of good, in so far as another is moved towards the good of the person loved by an act of charity. Hence it is clear that to love is more proper to charity than to be loved, for that which befits a thing substantially and by reason of itself pertains to it more than that which is befitting to it by reason of something else. This can be exemplified in two ways. First, in the fact that friends are more commended for loving than for being loved; indeed, if they be loved and yet love not, they are blamed. Secondly, because a mother, whose love is the greatest, seeks rather to love than to be loved; "for some women," as the Philosopher observes,⁴ "entrust their children to a nurse; they do love them indeed, yet seek not to be loved in return, if they happen not to be loved."

Reply Obj. 1. A better man, through being better, is more lovable, but through having more perfect charity, loves more. He loves more, however, in proportion to the person he loves. For a better man does not love that which is beneath him less than it can be loved, while he who is less good fails to love one who is better as much as he can be loved.

Reply Obj. 2. As the Philosopher says,⁵ men wish to be loved in so far as they wish to be honoured. For just as honour is bestowed on a man in order to bear witness to the good which is in him, so by being loved a man is shown to have some good, since good alone is lovable. Accordingly men seek to be loved and to be honoured, for the sake of something else, namely to make known the good which is in the person loved. On the other hand, those who have charity seek to love for the sake of loving, as though this were itself the good of charity, even as the act of any virtue is that virtue's good. Hence it is more proper to charity to wish to love than to wish to be loved.

Reply Obj. 3. Some love on account of being loved, not so that to be loved is the end of their loving, but because it is a kind of way leading a man to love.

ARTICLE 2. Whether To Love Considered As an Act of Charity Is the Same As Goodwill?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that to love considered as an act of charity, is nothing else than goodwill.

Objection 1. For the Philosopher says⁶ that "to love is to wish a person well." But this is goodwill. Therefore the act of charity is nothing but goodwill.

Obj. 2. Further, The act belongs to the same subject as the habit. Now the habit of charity is in the power of the will, as stated above (Q. xxiv, A. 1). Therefore the act of charity is also an act of the will. But it tends to good only, and this is goodwill. Therefore the act of charity is nothing else than goodwill.

Obj. 3. Further, The Philosopher reckons five things pertaining to friendship,¹ the first of which is that a man should wish his friend well; the second, that he should wish him to be and to live; the third, that he should take pleasure in his company; the fourth, that he should make choice of the same things; the fifth, that he should grieve and rejoice with him. Now the first two pertain to goodwill. Therefore goodwill is the first act of charity.

On the contrary, The Philosopher says in the same book² that "goodwill is neither friendship nor love, but the beginning of friendship." Now charity is friendship, as stated above (Q. XXIII. A. 1). Therefore goodwill is not the same as to love considered as an act of charity.

I answer that, Goodwill properly speaking is that act of the will by which we wish well to another. Now this act of the will differs from actual love, considered not only as being in the sensitive appetite but also as being in the intellective appetite or will. For the love which is in the sensitive appetite is a passion. Now every passion seeks its object with a certain eagerness. And the passion of love is not aroused suddenly, but is born of an earnest consideration of the object loved; hence the Philosopher, showing the difference between goodwill and the love which is a passion, says³ that "goodwill does not imply impetuosity or desire," that is to say, does not have an eager inclination, because it is by the sole judgment of his reason that one man wishes another well. Again love of this kind arises from familiarity, but goodwill sometimes arises suddenly, as happens to us if we look at men fighting, and we wish one of the fighters to win. But the love, which is in the intellective appetite also differs from goodwill, because it denotes a certain union of affections between the lover and the beloved, in so far as the lover thinks of the beloved as in some way united to him, or belonging to him, and so tends towards him. On the other hand, goodwill is a simple act of the will by which we wish a person well, even without presupposing the above mentioned union of the affections with him. Accordingly, to love, considered as an act of charity, includes goodwill, but such dilection or love adds union of affections, and so the Philosopher says⁴ that "goodwill is a beginning of friendship."

Reply Obj. 1. The Philosopher, by thus defining "to love," does not describe it fully, but mentions only that part of its definition in which the act of love is chiefly manifested.

Reply Obj. 2. To love is indeed an act of the will tending to the good, but it adds a certain union with the beloved, which union is not denoted by goodwill.

Reply Obj. 3. These things mentioned by the Philosopher belong to friendship because they arise from a man's love for himself, as he says in the same passage, in so far as a man does all these things in respect of his friend, even as he does them to himself; and this belongs to the aforesaid union of the affections.

ARTICLE 3. Whether out of Charity God Ought To Be Loved for Himself?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that God is loved out of charity, not for Himself but for the sake of something else.

Objection 1. For Gregory says in a homily (In Evang. xi):⁵ "The soul learns from the things it knows to love those it knows not," where by things unknown he means the intelligible and the Divine, and by things known he indicates the objects of the senses. Therefore God is to be loved for the sake of something else.

Obj. 2. Further, Love follows knowledge. But God is known through something else, according to Rom. 1. 20: The invisible things of God are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made. Therefore He is also loved on account of something else and not for Himself.

Obj. 3. Further, Hope begets charity as a gloss says⁶ on Matt. 1. 1, and "fear leads to charity," according to Augustine in his commentary on the First Canonical Epistle of John (Tract. ix).⁷ Now hope looks forward to obtain something from God, while fear shuns something which can be inflicted by God. Therefore it seems that God is to be loved on account of some good we hope for, or some evil to be feared. Therefore He is not to be loved for Himself.

On the contrary, According to Augustine,⁸ "to enjoy is to cleave to something for its own sake." Now God is to be enjoyed as he says in the same book.⁹ Therefore God is to be loved for Himself.

I answer that, The preposition "for" denotes

³ Ibid., IX, 5 (1166^b33).

⁴ Ibid. (1167^a3).

⁶ Glossa interl. (v, 5r).

⁷ PL 35, 2048.

a relation of causality. Now there are four kinds of cause, namely final, formal, efficient, and material, to which a material disposition also is to be reduced, though it is not a cause absolutely but relatively. According to these four kinds of causes one thing is said to be loved for another. In respect of the final cause, we love medicine, for instance, for health; in respect of the formal cause, we love a man for his virtue, because, that is, by his virtue he is formally good and therefore lovable; in respect of the efficient cause, we love certain men because, for instance, they are the sons of such and such a father; and in respect of the disposition which is reducible to the genus of a material cause, we speak of loving something for that which disposed us to love it, for example we love a man for the favours received from him, although after we have begun to love our friend, we no longer love him for his favours, but for his virtue.

Accordingly, as regards the first three ways, we love God, not for anything else, but for Himself. For He is not ordered to anything else as to an end, but is Himself the last end of all things; nor does He require to receive any form in order to be good, for His very substance is His goodness, which is itself the exemplar of all other good things; nor again does goodness accrue to Him from anything else, but from Him to all other things.

In the fourth way, however, He can be loved for something else, because we are disposed by certain things to advance in His love, for instance, by favours bestowed by Him, by the rewards we hope to receive from Him, or even by the punishments which we are minded to avoid through Him.

Reply Obj. 1. "From the things it knows the soul learns to love what it knows not," not as though the things it knows were the reason for its loving things it knows not, through being the formal, final, or efficient cause of this love, but because this knowledge disposes man to love the unknown.

Reply Obj. 2. Knowledge of God is indeed acquired through other things, but after He is known, He is no longer known through them, but through Himself, according to John 4. 42: We now believe, not for thy saying: for we ourselves have heard Him, and know that this is indeed the Saviour of the world.

Reply Obj. 3. Hope and fear lead to charity by way of a certain disposition, as was shown above (Q. XVII, A. 8; Q. XIX, AA. 4, 7, 10; also above, Ans.).

ARTICLE 4. Whether God Can Be Loved Immediately in This Life?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that God cannot be loved immediately in this life.

Objection 1. For "the unknown cannot be loved" as Augustine says (De Trin. x, 1, 2).¹ Now we do not know God immediately in this life, since we see now through a glass, in a dark manner (I Cor. 13. 12). Neither, therefore, do we love Him immediately.

Obj. 2. Further, He who cannot do what is less, cannot do what is more. Now it is more to love God than to know Him, since he who is joined to God by love, is one spirit with Him (I Cor. 6. 17). But man cannot know God immediately. Therefore much less can he love Him immediately.

Obj. 3. Further, Man is severed from God by sin, according to Isa. 59. 2: Your iniquities have divided between you and your God. Now sin is in the will rather than in the intellect. Therefore man is less able to love God immediately than to know Him immediately.

On the contrary, Knowledge of God, because it is mediate, is said to be enigmatic, and falls away in heaven, as stated in I Cor. 13. 12. But charity does not fall away as stated in the same passage (verse 8). Therefore the charity of the way adheres to God immediately.

I answer that, As stated above (Q. XXVI, A. 1, reply 2), the act of a cognitive power is completed by the thing known being in the knower, while the act of an appetitive power consists in the appetite being inclined towards the thing in itself. Hence it follows that the movement of the appetitive power is towards things in respect of their own condition, while the act of a cognitive power follows the mode of the knower.

Now in itself the very order of things is such that God is knowable and lovable for Himself, since He is essentially truth and goodness itself, by which other things are known and loved. But with regard to us, since our knowledge is derived through the senses, those things are knowable first, which are nearer to our senses, and the last term of knowledge is that which is most remote from our senses.

Accordingly, we must assert that to love, which is an act of the appetitive power, tends, even in this state of life, to God first, and flows on from Him to other things, and in this sense charity loves God immediately, and other things through God. On the other hand, with regard to knowledge, it is the reverse, since we know God through other things, either as a cause through its effects, or by way of pre-eminence or negation as Dionysius states (Div. Nom. i).¹

Reply Obj. 1. Although the unknown cannot be loved, it does not follow that the order of knowledge is the same as the order of love, since love is the term of knowledge, and consequently, love can begin at once where knowledge ends, namely in the thing itself which is known through another thing.

Reply Obj. 2. Since to love God is something greater than to know Him, especially in this state of life, it follows that love of God presupposes knowledge of God. And because this knowledge does not rest in creatures, but, through them, tends to something else, love begins there, and thence goes on to other things by a kind of circular movement; for knowledge begins from creatures, tends to God, and love begins with God as the last end, and passes on to creatures.

Reply Obj. 3. Turning away from God, which is brought about by sin, is removed by charity, but not by knowledge alone; hence charity, by loving God, unites the soul immediately to Him with a chain of spiritual union.

ARTICLE 5. Whether God Can Be Loved Wholly?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It seems that God cannot be loved wholly.

Objection 1. For love follows knowledge. Now God cannot be wholly known by us, since this would imply comprehension of Him. Therefore He cannot be wholly loved by us.

Obj. 2. Further, Love is a kind of union, as Dionysius shows (Div. Nom. iv).² But the heart of man cannot be wholly united to God, because God is greater than our heart (I John 3. 20). Therefore God cannot be loved wholly.

Obj. 3. Further, God loves Himself wholly. If therefore He be loved wholly by another, this one will love Him as much as God loves Himself. But this is unreasonable. Therefore God cannot be wholly loved by a creature.

On the contrary, It is written (Deut. 6. 5): Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart.

I answer that, Since love may be understood as something between lover and beloved, when we ask whether God can be wholly loved the question may be understood in three ways.

First so that the mode "wholly" be referred to the thing loved, and thus God is to be loved wholly, since man should love all that pertains to God. Secondly, it may be understood as though "wholly" referred to the lover and thus again God ought to be loved wholly, since man ought to love God with all his might, and to order all he has to the love of God, according to Deut. 6. 5: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart. Thirdly, it may be understood by way of comparison of the lover to the thing loved, so that the mode of the lover equal the mode of the thing loved. This is impossible: for, since a thing is lovable in proportion to its goodness, God is infinitely lovable, since His goodness is infinite. Now no creature can love God infinitely, because all power of creatures, whether it be natural or infused, is finite.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections, because the first three objections consider the question in this third sense, while the last takes it in the second sense.

ARTICLE 6. Whether in Loving God We Ought To Observe Any Mode?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that we ought to observe some mode in loving God.

Objection 1. For the notion of good consists in "mode, species and order," as Augustine states (De Nat. Boni, iii) ³ Now the love of God is the best thing in man, according to Coloss. 3. 14: Above all . . . things, have charity Therefore there ought to be a mode of the love of God.

Obj. 2. Further, Augustine says (De Morib. Eccl. viii): ⁴ "Prithee, tell me which is the mode of love. For I fear lest I burn with the desire and love of my Lord, more or less than I ought." But it would be useless to seek the mode of the Divine love unless there were one. Therefore there is a mode of the love of God.

Obj. 3. Further, As Augustine says (Gen. ad lit. iv, 3), ⁵ "the measure which is appointed to each thing, is its mode." Now the measure of the human will, as also of external action, is the reason. Therefore just as it is necessary for the reason to appoint a mode to the exterior effect of charity, according to Rom. 12. 1: Your reasonable service, so also the interior love of God requires a mode.

On the contrary, Bernard says (De Dilig. Deum, 1) ⁶ that "God is the cause of our loving

⁶ PL 182, 974.

God; the measure is to love Him without measure."

I answer that, As appears from the words of Augustine quoted above (obj. 3) mode signifies a determination of measure, which determination is to be found both in the measure and in the thing measured, but not in the same way. For it is found in the measure essentially, because a measure is of itself the determining and modifying rule of other things; but in the things measured, it is found relatively, that is in so far as they attain to the measure. Hence there can be nothing unmodified in the measure; but the thing measured is unmodified if it fails to attain to the measure, whether by deficiency or by excess.

Now in all matters of appetite and action the measure is the end, because the proper reason for all that we desire or do should be taken from the end, as the Philosopher proves.¹ Therefore the end has a mode by itself, while the means take their mode from being proportionate to the end. Hence, according to the Philosopher,² in every art, the desire for the end is endless and unlimited, while there is a limit to the means. Thus the physician does not put limits to health, but makes it as perfect as he possibly can; but he puts a limit to medicine, for he does not give as much medicine as he can, but according as health demands, so that if he give too much or too little, the medicine would be immoderate.

Again, the end of all human actions and affections is the love of God, by which we attain principally to our last end, as stated above (Q. XXIII, A. 6), and therefore the mode in the love of God must not be taken as in a thing measured where we find too much or too little, but as in the measure itself, where there cannot be excess, and where the more the rule is attained the better it is, so that the more we love God the better our love is.

Reply Obj. 1. That which is so by its essence takes precedence of that which is so through another, and therefore the goodness of the measure which has the mode essentially, takes precedence of the goodness of the thing measured, which has its mode through something else; and so too, charity, which has a mode as a measure has is above the other virtues, which have a mode through being measured.

Reply Obj. 2. As Augustine adds in the same passage, the measure of our love for God, is to love Him with our whole heart, that is, to love Him as much as He can be loved, and this pertains to the mode which is proper to the measure.

Reply Obj. 3. An affection whose object is subject to reason's judgment, should be measured by reason. But the object of the Divine love which is God surpasses the judgment of reason, and therefore it is not measured by reason but exceeds it. Nor is there parity between the interior act and external acts of charity. For the interior act of charity has the character of an end, since man's ultimate good consists in his soul cleaving to God, according to Ps. 72. 28: It is good for me to adhere to my God; but the exterior acts are as means to the end, and so have to be measured both according to charity and according to reason.

ARTICLE 7. Whether It Is More Meritorious To Love an Enemy Than To Love a Friend?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It seems more meritorious to love an enemy than to love a friend.

Objection 1. For it is written (Matt. 5. 46): If you love them that love you, what reward shall you have? Therefore it is not deserving of reward to love one's friend. But, as the same passage proves, to love one's enemy is deserving of a reward. Therefore it is more meritorious to love one's enemy than to love one's friend.

Obj. 2. Further, An act is the more meritorious through proceeding from a greater charity. But it belongs "to the perfect children of God" to love their enemies as Augustine says,³ while those also who have imperfect charity love their friends. Therefore it is more meritorious to love one's enemy than to love one's friend.

Obj. 3. Further, Where there is more effort for good, there seems to be more merit, since every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour (I Cor. 3. 8). Now a man has to make a greater effort to love his enemy than to love his friend, because it is more difficult. Therefore it seems more meritorious to love one's enemy than to love one's friend.

Obj. 4. On the contrary, The better an action is, the more meritorious it is. Now it is better to love one's friend, since it is better to love a better man, and the friend who loves you is better than the enemy who hates you. Therefore it is more meritorious to love one's friend than to love one's enemy.

I answer that, God is the reason for our loving our neighbour out of charity, as stated above (Q. xxv, A. 1). When therefore it is asked which is better or more meritorious, to love one's friend or one's enemy, these two loves may be compared in two ways: first, on the part of our neighbour whom we love, secondly, on the part of the reason for which we love him.

In the first way, love of one's friend surpasses love of one's enemy, because a friend is both better and more closely united to us, so that he is a more suitable matter of love, and consequently the act of love pervading this matter is better, and therefore its opposite is worse, for it is worse to hate a friend than an enemy.

In the second way, however, it is better to love one's enemy than one's friend, and this for two reasons. First, because it is possible to love one's friend for another reason than God, whereas God is the only reason for loving one's enemy. Secondly, because if we suppose that both are loved for God, our love for God is proved to be all the stronger through carrying a man's affections to things which are furthest from him, that is, even to the love of his enemies, just as the power of a fire is proved to be the stronger according as it throws its heat to more distant objects. Hence our love for God is proved to be so much the stronger, as the things we accomplish for its sake are the more difficult, just as the power of fire is so much the stronger, as it is able to set fire to a less inflammable matter.

Yet just as the same fire acts with greater force on what is near than on what is distant, so too, charity loves with greater fervour those who are united to us than those who are far removed; and in this respect the love of friends, considered in itself, is more ardent and better than the love of one's enemy.

Reply Obj. 1. The words of Our Lord must be taken in their strict sense, because the love of one's friends is not meritorious in God's sight when we love them merely because they are our friends; and this would seem to be the case when we love our friends in such a way that we love not our enemies. On the other hand the love of our friends is meritorious if we love them for God's sake, and not merely because they are our friends.

The Reply to the other objections is evident from what has been said in the article, because the two arguments that follow consider the reason for loving, while the last considers the question on the part of those who are loved.

ARTICLE 8. Whether It Is More Meritorious To Love One's Neighbour Than to Love God?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It would seem that it is more meritorious to love one's neighbour than to love God.

Objection 1. For the more meritorious thing would seem to be what the Apostle preferred. Now the Apostle preferred the love of our neighbour to the love of God, according to Rom. 9. 3; I wished myself to be an anathema from Christ, for my brethren. Therefore it is more meritorious to love one's neighbour than to love God.

Obj. 2. Further, In a certain sense it seems to be less meritorious to love one's friend, as stated above (A. 7). Now God is our chief friend, since He hath first loved us (I John 4. 10). Therefore it seems less meritorious to love God.

Obj. 3. Further, Whatever is more difficult seems to be more virtuous and meritorious, since virtue is about that which is difficult and good.¹ Now it is easier to love God than to love one's neighbour, both because all things love God naturally, and because there is nothing unlovable in God, and this cannot be said of one's neighbour. Therefore it is more meritorious to love one's neighbour than to love God.

On the contrary, That on account of which a thing is such, is yet more so. Now the love of one's neighbour is not meritorious except by reason of his being loved for God's sake. Therefore the love of God is more meritorious than the love of our neighbour.

I answer that, This comparison may be taken in two ways. First, by considering both loves separately; and then, without doubt, the love of God is the more meritorious, because a reward is due to it for its own sake, since the ultimate reward is the enjoyment of God, to Whom the movement of the love of God tends. Hence a reward is promised to him that loves God (John 14. 21): He that loveth Me, shall be loved of My Father, and I will . . . manifest Myself to him. Secondly, the comparison may be understood to be between the love of God alone on the one side, and the love of one's neighbour for God's sake, on the other. In this way love of our neighbour includes love of God, while love of God does not include love of our neighbour. Hence the comparison will be between perfect love of God, extending also to our neighbour, and inadequate and imperfect love of God, for this commandment we have from God, that he, who loveth God, love also his brother (I John 4. 21).

Reply Obj. 1. According to one gloss,¹ the Apostle did not desire this, that is, to be severed from Christ for his brethren, when he was in a state of grace, but had formerly desired it when he was in a state of unbelief, so that we should not imitate him in this respect.

We may also reply, with Chrysostom (De Compunct. 1)² that this does not prove the Apostle to have loved his neighbour more than God, but that he loved God more than himself. For he wished to be deprived for a time of the Divine enjoyment which pertains to love of one-self in order that God might be honoured in his neighbour, which pertains to the love of God.

Reply Obj. 2 A man's love for his friends is sometimes less meritorious in so far as he loves them for their sake, so as to fall short of the true reason for the friendship of charity, which is God. Hence that God be loved for His own sake does not diminish the merit, but is the entire reason for merit.

Reply Obj. 3. The "good" has, more than the "difficult," to do with the reason of merit and virtue. Therefore it does not follow that whatever is more difficult is more meritorious, but only what is more difficult and at the same time better.

QUESTION XXVIII

OF JOY

(In Four Articles)

WE must now consider the effects which result from the principal act of charity which is love, and (1) the interior effects, (2) the exterior effects (Q. XXXI). As to the first, three things have to be considered: (1) Joy, (2) Peace (Q. XXIX), (3) Mercy (Q. XXX).

Under the first head there are four points of inquiry, (1) Whether joy is an effect of charity? (2) Whether this kind of joy is compatible with sorrow (3) Whether this joy can be full? (4) Whether it is a virtue?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Joy Is an Effect in Us of Charity?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that joy is not an effect in us of charity.

Objection 1. For the absence of what we love causes sorrow rather than joy. But God, Whom we love by charity, is absent from us, so long as we are in this state of life, since while we are in the body, we are absent from the Lord (II Cor. 5. 6). Therefore charity causes sorrow in us rather than joy.

Obj. 2. Further, It is chiefly through charity that we merit happiness. Now mourning, which pertains to sorrow, is put among those things by which we merit happiness, according to Matt. 5. 5: Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted. Therefore sorrow, rather than joy, is an effect of charity.

Obj. 3. Further, Charity is a virtue distinct from hope, as shown above (Q. XVII, A. 6). Now joy is caused by hope, according to Rom. 12. 12: Rejoicing in hope. Therefore it is not caused by charity.

On the contrary, It is written (Rom. 5. 5): The charity of God is poured forth in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, Who is given to us. But joy is caused in us by the Holy Ghost according to Rom. 14. 17: The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but justice and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Therefore charity is a cause of joy.

I answer that, As stated above (Part I-II, Q. XXV, A. 3; Q. XXVI, A. 1, reply 2), when we were treating of the passions, joy and sorrow proceed from love, but in contrary ways. For joy is caused by love either through the presence of the thing loved or because the proper good of the thing loved exists and endures in it; and the latter is the case chiefly in the love of benevolence, whereby a man rejoices in the well-being of his friend, even though he be absent. On the other hand sorrow arises from love either through the absence of the thing loved, or because the loved object to which we wish well is deprived of its good or afflicted with some evil. Now charity is love of God, Whose good is unchangeable, since He is His goodness; and from the very fact that He is loved, He is in those who love Him by His most excellent effect, according to I John 4. 16: He that abideth in charity abideth in God, and God in him. Therefore spiritual joy, which is about God, is caused by charity.

Reply Obj. 1. So long as we are in the body, we are said to be absent from the Lord, in comparison with that presence by which He is present to some by the vision of sight; hence the Apostle goes on to say (ibid.): For we walk by faith and not by sight. Nevertheless, even in this life, He is present to those who love Him, by the indwelling of His grace.

Reply Obj. 2. The mourning that merits happiness is about those things that are contrary to happiness. Therefore it amounts to the same that charity causes this mourning, and this spiritual joy about God, since to rejoice in a certain good amounts to the same as to grieve for things that are contrary to it.

Reply Obj. 3. There can be spiritual joy about God in two ways. First, when we rejoice in the Divine good considered in itself; secondly, when we rejoice in the Divine good as participated by us. The former joy is the better, and proceeds from charity chiefly. But the latter joy proceeds also from hope, by which we look forward to enjoy the Divine good, although this enjoyment itself, whether perfect or imperfect, is obtained according to the measure of one's charity.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the Spiritual Joy, Which Is Caused by Charity, Is Compatible With an Admixture of Sorrow?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that the spiritual joy that is caused by charity is compatible with an admixture of sorrow.

Objection 1. For it pertains to charity to rejoice in our neighbour's good, according to I Cor. 13. 4, 6: Charity . . . rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth with the truth. But this joy is compatible with an admixture of sorrow, according to Rom. 12. 15: Rejoice with them that rejoice, weep with them that weep. Therefore the spiritual joy of charity is compatible with an admixture of sorrow.

Obj. 2. Further, According to Gregory (Hom. in Evang. xxxiv),¹ penance consists in "deploring past sins, and in not committing again those we have deplored." But there is no true penance without charity. Therefore the joy of charity has an admixture of sorrow.

Obj. 3. Further, It is through charity that man desires to be with Christ according to Philip 1. 23: Having a desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ. Now this desire gives rise, in man, to a certain sadness, according to Ps. 119. 5: Woe is me that my sojourning is prolonged! Therefore the joy of charity admits of a seasoning of sorrow.

On the contrary, The joy of charity is joy about the Divine wisdom. Now this kind of joy has no admixture of sorrow, according to Wisd. 8. 16: Her conversation hath no bitterness. Therefore the joy of charity is incompatible with an admixture of sorrow.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1, reply 3), a twofold joy in God arises from charity. One, the more excellent, is proper to charity; and with this joy we rejoice in the Divine good considered in itself. This joy of charity is incompatible with an admixture of sorrow, even as the good which is its object is incompatible with any admixture of evil: hence the Apostle says (Philip. 4. 4): Rejoice in the Lord always.

The other is the joy of charity by which we rejoice in the Divine good as participated by us. This participation can be hindered by anything contrary to it, and therefore, in this respect, the joy of charity is compatible with an admixture of sorrow, in so far as a man grieves for that which hinders the participation of the Divine good, either in us or in our neighbour, whom we love as ourselves.

Reply Obj. 1. Our neighbour does not weep save on account of some evil. Now every evil implies lack of participation in the sovereign good. Hence charity makes us weep with our neighbour in so far as he is hindered from participating in the Divine good.

Reply Obj. 2. Our sins divide between us and God, according to Isa. 59. 2; therefore this is the reason why we grieve for our past sins, or for those of others, in so far as they hinder us from participating in the Divine good.

Reply Obj. 3. Although in this unhappy abode we participate, after a fashion, in the Divine good, by knowledge and love, yet the unhappiness of this life is an obstacle to a perfect participation in the Divine good such as will exist in heaven. Hence this very sorrow, by which a man grieves for the delay of glory, is connected with the hindrance to a participation of the Divine good.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the Spiritual Joy Which Is Caused by Charity Can Be Filled?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that the spiritual joy which is caused by charity cannot be filled.

Objection 1. For the more we rejoice in God, the more is our joy in Him filled. But we can never rejoice in Him as much as it is fitting that we should rejoice in God, since His goodness which is infinite, surpasses the creature's joy which is finite. Therefore joy in God can never be filled.

Obj. 2. Further, That which is filled cannot be increased. But the joy, even of the blessed, can be increased, since one's joy is greater than another's. Therefore joy in God cannot be filled in a creature.

Obj. 3. Further, Comprehension seems to be nothing else than the fulness of knowledge. Now, just as the cognitive power of a creature is finite, so is its appetitive power. Since therefore God cannot be comprehended by any creature, it seems that no creature's joy in God can be filled.

On the contrary, Our Lord said to His disciples (John 15. 11): That My joy may be in you, and your joy may be filled.

I answer that, Fulness of joy can be understood in two ways. First, on the part of the thing rejoiced in, so that one rejoice in it as much as it is fitting that one should rejoice in it, and thus God's joy alone in Himself is filled, because it is infinite, and this is wholly fitting to the infinite goodness of God; but the joy of any creature must be finite. Secondly, fulness of joy may be understood on the part of the one who rejoices. Now joy is compared to desire as rest to movement, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XXV, AA. 1, 2), when we were treating of the passions, and rest is full when there is no more movement. Hence joy is full, when there remains nothing to be desired. But as long as we are in this world, the movement of desire does not cease in us, because it still remains possible for us to approach nearer to God by grace, as was shown above (Q. XXIV, AA. 4, 7). When once, however, perfect happiness has been attained, nothing will remain to be desired because then there will be full enjoyment of God, in which man will obtain whatever he had desired, even with regard to other goods, according to Ps 102. 5: Who satisfieth thy desire with good things. Hence desire will be at rest, not only our desire for God, but all our desires, so that the joy of the blessed is full to perfection,—indeed over-full, since they will obtain more than they were capable of desiring: for neither hath it entered into the heart of man, what things God hath prepared for them that love Him (I Cor. 2. 9). This is what is meant by the words of Luke 6. 38: Good measure and pressed down, and shaken together, and running over shall they give into your bosom. Yet, since no creature is capable of the joy wholly fitting to God, it follows that this perfectly full joy is not taken into man, but, on the contrary, man enters into it, according to Matt. 25. 21: Enter into the joy of thy Lord.

Reply Obj. 1. This argument takes the fulness of joy in reference to the thing in which we rejoice.

Reply Obj. 2. When each one attains to Happiness he will reach the term appointed to him by Divine predestination, and nothing further will remain to which he may tend, although by reaching that term, some will approach nearer to God than others. Hence each one's joy will be full with regard to himself, because his desire will be fully set at rest; yet one's joy will be greater than another's, on account of a fuller participation of the Divine happiness.

Reply Obj. 3. Comprehension denotes fulness of knowledge in respect of the thing known, so that it is known as much as it can be. There is however a fulness of knowledge in respect of the knower, just as we have said of joy. Hence the Apostle says (Coloss. 1. 9): That you may be filled with the knowledge of His will, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding.

ARTICLE 4. Whether Joy Is a Virtue?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that joy is a virtue.

Objection 1. For vice is contrary to virtue. Now sorrow is set down as a vice, as in the case of acedia and envy. Therefore joy also should be accounted a virtue.

Obj. 2. Further, As love and hope are passions, the object of which is the good, so also is joy. Now love and hope are considered to be virtues. Therefore joy also should be considered a virtue.

Obj. 3. Further, The precepts of the Law are about acts of virtue. But we are commanded to rejoice in the Lord, according to Philip. 4. 4. Rejoice in the Lord always. Therefore joy is a virtue.

On the contrary, It is not numbered among the theological virtues, nor among the moral, nor among the intellectual virtues, as is evident from what has been said above (Part I-II, Q. LVII, A. 2; Q. LX, A. 3; Q. LXII, A. 3).

I answer that, As stated above (Part I-II, Q. LV, A. 2), virtue is an operative habit, and so by its very notion it has an inclination to a certain act. Now it may happen that from the same habit there proceed several ordered acts of the same character, each of which follows from another. And since the subsequent acts do not proceed from the virtuous habit except through the preceding act, hence it is that the virtue is defined and named in reference to that preceding act, although those other acts also proceed from the virtue. Now it is evident from what we have said about the passions (Part I-II, Q. XXV, AA. 1, 2, 3; Q. XXVII, A. 4) that love is the first affection of the appetitive power, and that both desire and joy follow from it. Hence the same virtuous habit inclines us to love and desire the beloved good, and to rejoice in it. But because love is the first of these acts, that virtue takes its name, not from joy, nor from desire, but from love, and is called charity. Hence joy is not a virtue distinct from charity, but an act, or effect, of charity. And for this reason it is numbered among the Fruits (Gal. 5. 22).

Reply Obj. 1. The sorrow which is a vice is caused by inordinate self-love, and this is not a special vice but a general source of the vices, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXXVII, A. 4); and so it was necessary to account certain particular sorrows as special vices, because they do not arise from a special, but from a general vice. On the other hand love of God is accounted a special virtue, namely charity, to which joy is reduced, as its proper act, as stated above (here and A. 2).

Reply Obj. 2. Hope proceeds from love even as joy does, but hope adds, on the part of the object, a special character, namely difficult, and possible to obtain; for which reason it is accounted a special virtue. On the other hand joy does not add to love any special aspect that might cause a special virtue.

Reply Obj. 3. The Law prescribes joy as being an act of charity, although it is not its first act.

QUESTION XXIX

OF PEACE

(In Four Articles)

WE must now consider peace, under which head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether peace is the same as concord? (2) Whether all things desire peace? (3) Whether peace is an effect of charity? (4) Whether peace is a virtue?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Peace Is the Same as Concord?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that peace is the same as concord.

Objection 1. For Augustine says,¹ "Peace among men is well ordered concord." Now we are speaking here of no other peace than that of men. Therefore peace is the same as concord.

Obj. 2. Further, Concord is union of wills. Now the notion of peace consists in such union, for Dionysius says (Div. Nom. xi)² that "peace unites all, and makes them of one mind." Therefore peace is the same as concord.

Obj. 3. Further, Things whose opposites are identical are themselves identical. Now the one same thing is opposed to concord and peace, namely dissension; hence it is written (I Cor. 14. 33): God is not the God of dissension but of peace. Therefore peace is the same as concord.

On the contrary, There can be concord in evil between wicked men. But there is no peace to the wicked (Isa. 48. 22). Therefore peace is not the same as concord.

I answer that, Peace includes concord and adds something to it. Hence wherever peace is, there is concord, but there is not peace wherever there is concord, if we give peace its proper meaning. For concord, properly speaking, is between one man and another, in so far as the wills of various hearts agree together in consenting to the same thing. Now the heart of one man may happen to tend to different things, and this in two ways. First, in respect of the different appetitive powers; thus the sensitive appetite very often tends to that which is opposed to the rational appetite, according to Gal. 5. 17: The flesh lusteth against the spirit. Secondly, in so far as one and the same appetitive power tends to different objects of appetite, which it cannot obtain all at the same time, so that there is of necessity a clashing of the movements of the appetite. Now the union of such movement is of the very notion of peace, because man's heart is not at peace so long as he does not have what he wants, or if, having what he wants, there still remains something for him to want, and which he cannot have at the same time. On the other hand this union does not belong to the notion of concord; and so concord denotes union of appetites among various persons, while peace denotes, in addition to this union, the union of the appetites even in one man.

Reply Obj. 1. Augustine is speaking there of that peace which is between one man and another, and he says that this peace is concord, not indeed any kind of concord, but that which is well ordered, through one man agreeing with another in respect of something befitting to both of them. For if one man concord with another, not by a spontaneous will but through being forced, as it were, by the fear of some evil that threatens him, such concord is not really peace, because the order of each concordant is not observed, but is disturbed by some fear-inspiring cause. For this reason he premises that "peace is tranquillity of order," which tranquillity consists in all the appetitive movements in one man being set at rest together.

Reply Obj. 2. If one man consent to the same thing together with another man, his consent is nevertheless not entirely united to himself, unless at the same time all his appetitive movements be in agreement.

Reply Obj. 3. A twofold dissension is opposed to peace, namely dissension between a man and himself, and dissension between one man and another. The latter alone is opposed to concord.

ARTICLE 2. Whether All Things Desire Peace?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that not all things desire peace.

Objection 1. For, according to Dionysius (Div. Nom. xi),¹ peace "unites consent." But there cannot be unity of consent in things which lack knowledge. Therefore such things cannot desire peace.

Obj. 2. Further, The appetite does not tend to opposite things at the same time. Now many desire war and dissension. Therefore all men do not desire peace.

Obj. 3. Further, Good alone is an object of appetite. But a certain peace is, it seems, evil, for otherwise Our Lord would not have said (Matt. 10. 34): I came not to send peace. Therefore all things do not desire peace.

Obj. 4. Further, That which all desire would seem to be the sovereign good which is the last end. But this is not true of peace, since it is attainable even by a wayfarer; otherwise Our Lord would in vain command (Mark 9. 49): Have peace among you. Therefore all things do not desire peace.

On the contrary, Augustine says² that all things desire peace and Dionysius says the same (Div. Nom. xi).³

I answer that, From the very fact that a man desires a certain thing it follows that he desires to obtain what he desires, and, in consequence, to remove whatever may be an obstacle to his obtaining it. Now a man may be hindered from obtaining the good he desires by a contrary desire either of his own or of some other, and both are removed by peace, as stated above (A. 1). Hence it follows of necessity that whoever desires anything desires peace, in so far as he who desires anything desires to attain, with tranquillity and without hindrance, to that which he desires; and this is what is meant by peace which Augustine defines "the tranquillity of order."⁴

Reply Obj. 1. Peace denotes union not only of the intellectual or rational appetite, or of the animal appetite, in both of which consent may be found, but also of the natural appetite.

Hence Dionysius says (ibid.) that "peace is the cause of consent and of connaturalness," where consent denotes the union of appetites proceeding from knowledge, and connaturalness, the union of natural appetites.

Reply Obj. 2. Even those who seek war and dissension desire nothing but peace, which they do not consider themselves to have. For as we stated above (A. 1. reply 1), there is no peace when a man agrees with another man counter to what he would prefer. Consequently men seek by means of war to break this concord, because it is a defective peace, in order that they may obtain a peace in which nothing is contrary to their will. Hence all wars are waged that men may find a more perfect peace than that which they had before.

Reply Obj. 3. Peace gives calm and unity to the appetite. Now just as the appetite may tend to what is good absolutely, or to what is good apparently, so too, peace may be either true or apparent. There can be no true peace except where the appetite is directed to what is truly good, since every evil, though it may appear good in a way, so as to calm the appetite in some respect, has, nevertheless many defects, which cause the appetite to remain restless and disturbed. Hence true peace is only in good men and about good things. The peace of the wicked is not a true peace but a semblance of peace, and so it is written (Wisd. 14. 22): Whereas they lived in a great war of ignorance, they call so many and so great evils peace.

Reply Obj. 4. Since true peace is only about good things, as the true good is possessed in two ways, perfectly and imperfectly, so there is a twofold true peace. One is perfect peace. It consists in the perfect enjoyment of the supreme good, and unites all one's desires by giving them rest in one object. This is the last end of the rational creature, according to Ps. 147. 14: Who hath placed peace in thy borders. The other is imperfect peace, which may be had in this world, for though the chief movement of the soul finds rest in God, yet there are certain things within and without which disturb that peace.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Peace Is the Proper Effect of Charity?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that peace is not the proper effect of charity.

Objection 1. For one cannot have charity without sanctifying grace. But some have peace who have not sanctifying grace; for instance

⁴ City of God, XIX, 13 (PL 41, 640).

the gentiles sometimes have peace. Therefore peace is not the effect of charity.

Obj. 2. Further, If a certain thing is caused by charity, its contrary is not compatible with charity. But dissension, which is contrary to peace, is compatible with charity, for we find that even holy doctors, such as Jerome and Augustine, dissented in some of their opinions.¹ We also read that Paul and Barnabas dissented from one another (Acts 15.). Therefore it seems that peace is not the effect of charity.

Obj. 3. Further, The same thing is not the proper effect of different things. Now peace is the effect of justice, according to Isa. 32. 17: And the work of justice shall be peace. Therefore it is not the effect of charity.

On the contrary, It is written (Ps 118. 165): Much peace have they that love Thy Law.

I answer that, Peace implies a twofold union, as stated above (A. 1). The first is the result of one's own appetites being directed to one object, while the other results from one's own appetite being united with the appetite of another. And each of these unions is effected by charity. The first, in so far as man loves God with his whole heart, by referring all things to Him, so that all his desires tend to one object. The second, in so far as we love our neighbour as ourselves, the result being that we wish to fulfil our neighbour's will as though it were ours; hence it is reckoned a sign of friendship if people make choice of the same things,² and Tully says (De Amicitia)³ that friends like and dislike the same things.

Reply Obj. 1. Without sin no one falls from a state of sanctifying grace, for it turns man away from his due end by making him place his end in something undue, so that his appetite does not cleave chiefly to the true final good, but to some apparent good. Hence, without sanctifying grace, peace is not real but only apparent.

Reply Obj. 2. As the Philosopher says,⁴ friends need not agree in opinion, but only upon such goods as conduce to life, and especially upon such as are important; because dissension in small matters is scarcely accounted dissension. Hence nothing hinders those who have charity from holding different opinions. Nor is this an obstacle to peace, because opinions concern the intellect, which precedes the appetite that is united by peace. In like manner if there be concord as to goods of importance, dissension with regard to some that are of little account is not contrary to charity. For such a dissension proceeds from a difference of opinion, because one man thinks that the particular good, which is the object of dissension, belongs to the good about which they agree, while the other thinks that it does not. Accordingly such dissension about very slight matters and about opinions is inconsistent with a state of perfect peace, in which the truth will be known fully, and every desire fulfilled, but it is not inconsistent with the imperfect peace of the wayfarer.

Reply Obj. 3. Peace is the work of justice indirectly, in so far as justice removes the obstacles to peace; but it is the work of charity directly, since charity, according to its very notion, causes peace. For love is "a unitive force" as Dionysius says (Div. Nom. iv.)⁵ and peace is the union of the appetite's inclinations.

ARTICLE 4. Whether Peace Is a Virtue?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that peace is a virtue.

Objection 1. For nothing is a matter of precept, unless it is an act of virtue. But there are precepts about keeping peace, for example: Have peace among you (Mark 9. 49). Therefore peace is a virtue.

Obj. 2. Further, We do not merit except by acts of virtue. Now it is meritorious to keep peace, according to Matt. 5. 9: Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God. Therefore peace is a virtue.

Obj. 3. Further, Vices are opposed to virtues. But dissensions, which are contrary to peace, are numbered among the vices (Gal. 5. 20). Therefore peace is a virtue.

On the contrary, Virtue is not the last end, but the way to it. But peace is the last end, after a fashion, as Augustine says.⁶ Therefore peace is not a virtue.

I answer that, As stated above (Q. xxviii, A. 4), when a number of acts all proceeding uniformly from an agent follow one from the other, they all arise from the same virtue, nor do they each have a virtue from which they proceed, as may be seen in corporeal things. For, though fire by heating, both liquefies and rarefies, there are not two powers in fire, one of liquefaction, the other of rarefaction, but fire produces all such actions by its one power of heating.

Since then peace is caused by charity from its very character of being love of God and of our neighbour, as shown above (A. 3), there is no other virtue except charity whose proper act is peace, as we have also said in reference to joy (Q. XXVIII, A. 4).

Reply Obj. 1. We are commanded to keep peace because it is an act of charity; and for this reason too it is a meritorious act. Hence it is placed among the beatitudes, which are acts of perfect virtue, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXIX, AA. 1, 3). It is also numbered among the fruits, in so far as it is a final good, having spiritual sweetness.

This suffices for the Reply to the Second Objection.

Reply Obj. 3. Several vices are opposed to one virtue in respect of its various acts, so that not only is hatred opposed to charity, in respect of its act which is love, but also acedia and envy, in respect of joy, and dissension in respect of peace.

QUESTION XXX

OF MERCY

(In Four Articles)

WE must now go on to consider Mercy,¹ under which head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether evil is the cause of mercy on the part of the person pitied? (2) To whom does it belong to pity? (3) Whether mercy is a virtue? (4) Whether it is the greatest of virtues?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Evil Is Properly the Motive of Mercy?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that, properly speaking, evil is not the motive of mercy.

Objection 1. For, as shown above (Q. XIX, A. 1; Part I, Q. XLVIII, A. 6), fault is an evil rather than punishment. Now fault provokes indignation rather than mercy. Therefore evil does not excite mercy.

Obj. 2. Further, Cruelty and harshness seem to excel other evils. Now the Philosopher says² that "harshness does not call for pity but drives it away." Therefore evil, as such, is not the motive of mercy.

Obj. 3. Further, Signs of evils are not true evils. But signs of evils excite one to mercy, as the Philosopher states.³ Therefore evil, properly speaking, is not an incentive to mercy.

² Rhetoric, II, 8 (1380^a22). ³ Ibid. (1386^b2).

On the contrary, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. II, 14)⁴ that "mercy is a kind of sorrow." Now evil is the motive of sorrow. Therefore it is the motive of mercy.

I answer that, As Augustine says,⁵ "mercy is heartfelt sympathy for another's distress, impelling us to succour him if we can." For mercy takes its name miseriordia from denoting a man's compassionate heart (miserum cor) for another's unhappiness. Now unhappiness is opposed to happiness. And it is of the very notion of happiness or felicity that one should obtain what one wishes and what pertains to justice; for, according to Augustine (De Trin. XIII, 5),⁶ happy is he "who has whatever he desires, and desires nothing amiss." Hence, on the other hand, it belongs to unhappiness that a man should suffer what he wishes not.

Now a man wishes a thing in three ways: first, by his natural appetite; thus all men naturally wish to be and to live. Secondly, a man wishes a thing from deliberate choice. Thirdly, a man wishes a thing, not in itself, but in its cause; thus, if a man wishes to eat what is harmful for him, we say that, in a way, he wishes to be ill.

Accordingly the motive of mercy, being something pertaining to misery, is, in the first way, anything contrary to the will's natural appetite, namely corruptive or distressing evils, the contrary of which man desires naturally. Hence the Philosopher says⁷ that "pity is sorrow for a visible evil, whether corruptive or distressing." Secondly, such evils are yet more provocative of pity if they are contrary to deliberate choice, and so the Philosopher says⁸ that those evils excite our pity "when they are the result of an accident, as when something turns out ill, whereas we hoped well of it." Thirdly, they cause yet greater pity, if they are entirely contrary to the will, as when evil befalls a man who has always striven to do well. And so the Philosopher says⁹ that "we pity most the distress of one who suffers undeservedly."

Reply Obj. 1. It is of the very notion of fault that it be voluntary; and in this respect it deserves punishment rather than mercy. Since, however, fault may be, in a way, a punishment, through having something connected with it that is against the sinner's will, it may, in this respect, call for mercy. It is in this sense that we pity and commiserate sinners. Thus Gregory says in a homily (Hom. in Ev. XXXIV)¹⁰ that

"true justice is not disdainful," that is, towards sinners, "but compassionate," and again it is written (Matt. 9. 36) that Jesus seeing the multitudes, had compassion on them: because they were distressed, and lying like sheep that have no shepherd.

Reply Obj. 2. Since pity is compassion for another's distress, it is directed, properly speaking, towards another, and not to oneself, except figuratively, like justice, according as a man is considered to have various parts.¹ Thus it is written (Ecclus. 30. 24): Have pity on thy own soul, pleasing God. Accordingly just as, properly speaking, a man does not pity himself, but suffers in himself, as when we suffer cruel treatment in ourselves, so too, in the case of those who are so closely united to us as to be as it were part of ourselves, such as our children or our parents, we do not pity their distress, but suffer as for our own wounds; in this sense the Philosopher says that "harshness drives pity away."

Reply Obj. 3. Just as pleasure results from hope and memory of good things, so does sorrow arise from the prospect or the recollection of evil things; though not so keenly as when they are present to the senses. Hence the signs of evil move us to pity, in so far as they represent as present the evil that excites our pity.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the Reason for Taking Pity Is a Defect in the Person Who Pities?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that the reason for taking pity is not a defect in the person who takes pity.

Objection 1. For it is proper to God to be merciful, wherefore it is written (Ps. 144. 9): His tender mercies are over all His works. But there is no defect in God. Therefore a defect cannot be the reason for taking pity.

Obj. 2. Further, If a defect is the reason for taking pity, those in whom there is most defect, must take most pity. But this is false, for the Philosopher says² that "those who are completely ruined are pitiless." Therefore it seems that the reason for taking pity is not a defect in the person who pities.

Obj. 3. Further, To be treated with contempt pertains to defect. But the Philosopher says³ that "those who are disposed to contumely are pitiless." Therefore the reason for taking pity is not a defect in the person who pities.

On the contrary, Pity is a kind of sorrow. But a defect is the reason of sorrow; hence those who are in bad health give way to sorrow more easily, as we have said (Part I-II, Q. XLVII, A. 3). Therefore the reason why one takes pity is a defect in oneself.

I answer that, Since pity is grief for another's distress, as stated above (A. 1), from the very fact that a person takes pity on anyone, it follows that another's distress grieves him. And since sorrow or grief is about one's own ills, one grieves or sorrows for another's distress in so far as one looks upon another's distress as one's own. Now this happens in two ways: first, through union of the affections, which is the effect of love. For, since he who loves another looks upon his friend as another self, he counts his friend's hurt as his own, so that he grieves for his friend's hurt as though he were hurt himself. Hence the Philosopher⁴ accounts "grieving with one's friend" as being one of the signs of friendship, and the Apostle says (Rom. 12. 15): Rejoice with them that rejoice, weep with them that weep.

Secondly, it happens through real union, for instance when another's evil comes near to us, so as to pass to us from him. Hence the Philosopher says⁵ that men pity such as are akin to them, and like them, because it makes them realize that the same may happen to themselves. This also explains why the old and the wise who consider that they may fall upon evil times, as also feeble and timorous persons, are more inclined to pity. On the contrary, however, those who consider themselves happy, and so far powerful as to think themselves in no danger of suffering any hurt, are not so inclined to pity. Accordingly a defect is always the reason for taking pity, either because one looks upon another's defect as one's own, through being united to him by love, or on account of the possibility of suffering like things.

Reply Obj. 1. God takes pity on us through love alone, in so far as He loves us as belonging to Him.

Reply Obj. 2. Those who are already in infinite distress do not fear to suffer more, and therefore they are without pity. In like manner this applies to those also who are in great fear, for they are so intent on their own passion, that they pay no attention to the suffering of others.

Reply Obj. 3. Those who are disposed to contumely, whether through having been despised, or because they wish to despise others, are incited to anger and daring, which are manly passions and arouse the human spirit to attempt difficult things. Hence they make a man think that he is going to suffer something in the future, so that while they are disposed in that way they are pitiless, according to Prov. 27. 4: Anger hath no mercy, nor fury when it breaketh forth. For a like reason the proud are without pity, because they despise others, and think them wicked, so that they account them as suffering deservedly whatever they suffer. Hence Gregory says (Hom. in Ev. xxxiv)¹ that "false godliness, that is, of the proud, is not compassionate but disdainful."

ARTICLE 3. Whether Mercy Is a Virtue?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that mercy is not a virtue.

Objection 1. For the chief part of virtue is choice as the Philosopher states.² Now "choice is the desire of what has been already counselled."³ Therefore whatever hinders counsel cannot be called a virtue. But mercy hinders counsel, according to the saying of Sallust (Catilin.),⁴ "All those that take counsel about matters of doubt, should be free from . . . anger . . . and mercy, because the mind does not easily see the truth when these things stand in the way." Therefore mercy is not a virtue.

Obj. 2. Further, Nothing contrary to virtue is praiseworthy. But "nemesis is contrary to mercy," as the Philosopher states,⁵ and yet it is a praiseworthy passion.⁶ Therefore mercy is not a virtue.

Obj. 3. Further, Joy and peace are not special virtues, because they result from charity, as stated above (Q. XXVIII, A. 4; Q. XXIX, A. 4). Now mercy, also, results from charity; for it is out of charity that we weep with them that weep, as we rejoice with them that rejoice. Therefore mercy is not a special virtue.

Obj. 4. Further, Since mercy belongs to the appetitive power, it is not an intellectual virtue, and, since it has not God for its object, neither is it a theological virtue. Moreover it is not a moral virtue, because neither is it about operations, for this belongs to justice; nor is it about passions, since it is not reduced to one of the twelve means mentioned by the Philosopher.⁷ Therefore mercy is not a virtue.

On the contrary, Augustine says:⁸ "Cicero in praising Cæsar expresses himself much better and in a fashion at once more humane and more in accordance with religious feeling, when he says: 'Of all thy virtues none is more marvellous or more graceful than thy mercy.' " Therefore mercy is a virtue.

I answer that, Mercy signifies grief for another's distress. Now this grief may denote, in one way, a movement of the sensitive appetite, in which case mercy is not a virtue but a passion. But, in another way, it may denote a movement of the intellectual appetite, according as one person's evil is displeasing to another. This movement may be ruled in accordance with reason, and in accordance with this movement regulated by reason, the movement of the lower appetite may be regulated. Hence Augustine says⁹ that "this movement of the mind" namely mercy, "obeys the reason, when mercy is vouchsafed in such a way that justice is safeguarded, whether we give to the needy or forgive the repentant." And since it belongs to the notion of human virtue that the movements of the soul should be regulated by reason, as was shown above (Part I-II, Q. LVI, A. 4; Q. LIX, A. 4; Q. LX, A. 5), it follows that mercy is a virtue.

Reply Obj. 1. The words of Sallust are to be understood as applying to the mercy which is a passion unregulated by reason; for thus it impedes the counselling of reason, by making it wander from justice.

Reply Obj. 2. The Philosopher is speaking there of pity and nemesis considered both as passions. They are contrary to one another on the part of their respective estimation of another's evils, for which pity grieves in so far as it esteems someone to suffer undeservedly, while nemesis rejoices, in so far as it esteems someone to suffer deservedly, and grieves if things go well with the undeserving; "both of these are praiseworthy and come from the same disposition of character."¹⁰ Properly speaking, however, it is envy which is opposed to pity, as we shall state further on (Q. XXXVI, A. 3, reply 3).

Reply Obj. 3. Joy and peace add nothing to the aspect of good which is the object of charity, and so they do not require any other virtue besides charity. But mercy regards a certain special aspect, namely the misery of the person pitied.

Reply Obj. 4. Mercy, considered as a virtue, is a moral virtue having relation to the passions, and it is reduced to the mean called nemesis, because "they both proceed from the same character."¹¹ Now the Philosopher proposes these means not as virtues, but as passions, because, even as passions, they are praiseworthy. Yet nothing prevents them from proceeding from some elective habit, in which case they assume the character of a virtue.

ARTICLE 4. Whether Mercy Is the Greatest of the Virtues?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that mercy is the greatest of the virtues.

Objection 1. For the worship of God seems a most virtuous act. But mercy is preferred before the worship of God, according to Os. 6. 6 and Matt. 12. 7: I have desired mercy and not sacrifice. Therefore mercy is the greatest virtue.

Obj. 2. Further, On the words of I Tim. 4. 8: Godliness is profitable to all things, a gloss says:¹ "The sum total of a Christian's rule of life consists in mercy and godliness." Now the Christian rule of life embraces every virtue. Therefore the sum total of all virtues is contained in mercy.

Obj. 3. Further, Virtue is that which makes its subject good. Therefore the more a virtue makes a man like God, the better is that virtue: since man is the better for being more like God. Now this is chiefly the result of mercy, since of God is it said (Ps. 144. 9) that His tender mercies are over all His works, and (Luke 6. 36) Our Lord said: Be ye . . . merciful, as your Father also is merciful. Therefore mercy is the greatest of virtues.

On the contrary, The Apostle after saying (Col. 3. 12): Put ye on . . . as the elect of God . . . the bowels of mercy, etc., adds (verse 14): Above all things have charity. Therefore mercy is not the greatest of virtues.

I answer that, A virtue may take precedence of others in two ways: first, in itself; secondly, in relation to its subject. In itself, mercy takes precedence of other virtues, for it pertains to mercy to be bountiful to others, and, what is more, to succour others in their wants, which pertains chiefly to one who stands above. Hence mercy is accounted as being proper to God. His omnipotence is declared to be chiefly manifested in this.

On the other hand, with regard to its subject, mercy is not the greatest virtue, unless that subject be greater than all others, surpassed by none and excelling all; since for him that has anyone above him it is better to be united to that which is above than to supply the defect of that which is beneath. Hence, as regards man, who has God above him, charity which unites him to God is greater than mercy, by which he supplies the defects of his neighbour. But of all the virtues which relate to our neighbour, mercy is the greatest, even as its act surpasses all others, since it belongs to one who is higher and better to supply the defect of another, in so far as the latter is deficient.

Reply Obj. 1. We worship God by external sacrifices and gifts, not for His own profit, but for that of ourselves and our neighbour. For He does not need our sacrifices, but wishes them to be offered to Him in order to arouse our devotion and to profit our neighbour. Hence mercy, by which we supply others' defects is a sacrifice more acceptable to Him, as conducing more directly to our neighbour's well-being, according to Heb. 13. 16: Do not forget to do good and to impart, for by such sacrifices God's favour is obtained.

Reply Obj. 2. The sum total of the Christian religion consists in mercy, as regards external works; but the inward love of charity by which we are united to God preponderates over both love and mercy for our neighbour.

Reply Obj. 3. Charity likens us to God by uniting us to Him in the bond of love. And therefore it surpasses charity which likens us to God as regards similarity of works.

QUESTION XXXI

OF BENEFICENCE

(In Four Articles)

WE must now consider the outward acts or effects of charity, (1) Beneficence, (2) Alms-deeds, which are a part of beneficence (Q. XXXII), (3) Fraternal correction, which is a kind of alms (Q. XXXIII).

Under the first head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether beneficence is an act of charity? (2) Whether we ought to be beneficent to all? (3) Whether we ought to be more beneficent to those who are more closely united to us? (4) Whether beneficence is a special virtue?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Beneficence Is an Act of Charity?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that beneficence is not an act of charity.

Objection 1. For charity is chiefly directed to God. Now we cannot benefit God, according to Job 35. 7: What shalt thou give Him? or what shall He receive of thy hand? Therefore beneficence is not an act of charity.

Obj. 2. Further, Beneficence consists chiefly in making gifts. But this belongs to liberality. Therefore beneficence is an act of liberality and not of charity.

Obj. 3. Further, What a man gives, he gives either as being due, or as not due. But a benefit conferred as being due belongs to justice, while a benefit conferred as not due, is given freely, and in this respect is an act of mercy. Therefore every benefit conferred is either an act of justice, or an act of mercy. Therefore it is not an act of charity.

On the contrary, Charity is a kind of friendship, as stated above (Q. XXIII, A. 1). Now the Philosopher places among the acts of friendship doing good, that is, being beneficent, to one's friends.¹ Therefore it is an act of charity to do good to others.

I answer that, Beneficence simply means doing good to someone. This good may be considered in two ways. First under the general aspect of good, and this belongs to beneficence in general, and is an act of friendship, and, consequently, of charity. For the act of love includes goodwill by which a man wishes his friend well, as stated above (Q. XXIII, A. 1; Q. XXVII, A. 2). Now the will carries into effect if possible, the things it wills, so that, consequently, the result of an act of love is that a man is beneficent to his friends. Therefore beneficence in its general notion is an act of friendship or charity.

But if the good which one man does another, be considered under some special aspect of good, then beneficence will assume a special character and will belong to some special virtue.

Reply Obj. 1. According to Dionysius (Div. Nom. iv),² "love moves those whom it orders, to a mutual relationship: it turns the inferior to the superior to be perfected by them; it moves the superior to watch over the inferior"; and in this respect beneficence is an effect of love. Hence it is not for us to benefit God, but to honour Him by obeying Him, while it is for Him, out of His love, to bestow good things on us.

Reply Obj. 2. Two things must be observed in the bestowal of gifts. One is the thing given outwardly, while the other is the inward passion that a man has in the delight of riches. It pertains to liberality to moderate this inward passion, so as to avoid excessive desire and love for riches; for this makes a man more ready to part with his wealth. Hence, if a man makes some great gift, while yet desiring to keep it for himself, his is not a liberal giving. On the other hand, as regards the outward gift, the act of beneficence belongs in general to friendship or charity. Hence it does not detract from a man's friendship, if, through love, he give his friend something he would like to keep for himself; rather does this prove the perfection of his friendship.

Reply Obj. 3. Just as friendship or charity sees, in the benefit bestowed, the general aspect of good, so does justice see therein the aspect of debt, while pity considers the relieving of distress or defect.

ARTICLE 2. Whether We Ought to Do Good to All?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that we are not bound to do good to all.

Objection 1. For Augustine says³ that "we are unable to do good to everyone." Now virtue does not incline one to the impossible. Therefore it is not necessary to do good to all.

Obj. 2. Further, It is written (Ecclus. 12. 5): Give to the good, and receive not a sinner. But many men are sinners. Therefore we need not do good to all.

Obj. 3. Further, Charity dealeth not perversely (I Cor. 13. 4). Now to do good to some is to deal perversely; for instance if one were to do good to an enemy of the common weal, or if one were to do good to an excommunicated person, since, by doing so, he would be holding communion with him. Therefore, since beneficence is an act of charity, we ought not to do good to all.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (Gal. 6. 10): Whilst we have time, let us work good to all men.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1, reply 1), beneficence follows on love in so far as love moves the superior to watch over the inferior. Now degrees among men are not unchangeable as among angels, because men are subject to many failings, so that he who is superior in one respect, is or may be inferior in another. Therefore, since the love of charity extends to all, beneficence also should extend to all, but according as time and place require; for all acts of virtue must be modified with a view to their due circumstances.

Reply Obj. 1. Absolutely speaking it is impossible to do good to every single one; yet it is true of each individual that one may be bound to do good to him in some particular case. Hence charity binds us, though not actually doing good to someone, to be prepared in mind to do good to anyone if we have time to spare. There is however a good that we can do to all, if not to each individual, at least to all in general, as when we pray for all, for unbelievers as well as for the faithful.

³ Christian Doctrine, I, 28 (PL 34, 30).

Reply Obj. 2. In a sinner there are two things, his guilt and his nature. Accordingly we are bound to succour the sinner as to the maintenance of his nature, but not so as to abet his sin, for this would be to do evil rather than good.

Reply Obj. 3. The excommunicated and the enemies of the commonweal are deprived of all beneficence, in so far as this prevents them from doing evil deeds. Yet if their nature be in urgent need of succour lest it fail, we are bound to help them; for instance, if they be in danger of death through hunger or thirst, or suffer some like distress, unless this be according to the order of justice.

ARTICLE 3. Whether We Ought to Do Good to Those Rather Who Are More Closely United to Us?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that we are not bound to do good to those rather who are more closely united to us.

Objection 1. For it is written (Luke 14. 12): When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, nor thy kinsmen. Now these are the most closely united to us. Therefore we are not bound to do good to those rather who are more closely united to us, but preferably to strangers and to those who are in want; hence the text goes on: But, when thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, etc.

Obj. 2. Further, To help another in the battle is an act of very great goodness. But a soldier on the battlefield is bound to help a fellow-soldier who is a stranger rather than a kinsman who is a foe. Therefore in doing acts of kindness we are not bound to give the preference to those who are most closely united to us.

Obj. 3. Further, We should pay what is due before conferring gratuitous favours. But it is a man's duty to be good to those who have been good to him. Therefore we ought to do good to our benefactors rather than to those who are closely united to us.

Obj. 4. Further, A man ought to love his parents more than his children, as stated above

(Q. xxvi, A. 9). Yet a man ought to be more beneficent to his children, since neither ought the children to lay up for the parents, according to II Cor. 12. 14. Therefore we are not bound to be more beneficent to those who are more closely united to us.

On the contrary, Augustine says:¹ "Since one cannot do good to all, we ought to consider those chiefly who by reason of place, time or any other circumstance, by a kind of chance are more closely united to us."

I answer that, Grace and virtue imitate the order of nature, which is established by Divine wisdom. Now the order of nature is such that every natural agent pours forth its activity first and most of all on the things which are nearest to it; thus fire heats most what is next to it. In like manner God pours forth the gifts of His goodness first and most plentifully on the substances which are nearest to Him, as Dionysius declares (Cal. Hier. vii)² But the bestowal of benefits is an act of charity towards others. Therefore we ought to be most beneficent towards those who are most closely connected with us.

Now one man's nearness to another may be measured in reference to the various matters in which men are engaged together; (thus the intercourse of kinsmen is in natural matters, that of fellow-citizens is in civic matters, that of the faithful is in spiritual matters and so forth); and various benefits should be conferred in various ways according to these various fellowships, because we ought in preference to bestow on each one such benefits as pertain to the matter in which, speaking absolutely, he is most closely joined to us. And yet this may vary according to the various requirements of time, place or matter in hand, because in certain cases one ought, for instance, to succour a stranger, in extreme necessity, rather than one's own father, if he is not in such urgent need.

Reply Obj. 1. Our Lord did not absolutely forbid us to invite our friends and kinsmen to eat with us, but to invite them so that they may invite us in return, since that would be an act not of charity but of cupidity. The case may occur, however, that one ought rather to invite strangers, on account of their greater want. For it must be understood that, other things being equal, one ought to succour those rather who are most closely connected with us. And if of two, one be more closely connected and the other in greater want, it is not possible to decide by any general rule which of them we ought to help rather than the other, since there are various degrees of want as well as of connection, and the matter requires the judgment of a prudent man.

Reply Obj. 2. The common good of many is more Godlike than the good of an individual. Therefore it is a virtuous action for a man to endanger even his own life, either for the spiritual or for the temporal common good of his country. Since therefore men engage together in warlike acts in order to safeguard the common weal, the soldier who with this in view succours his comrade, succours him not as a private individual, but with a view to the welfare of his country as a whole. Therefore it is not a matter for wonder if a stranger be preferred to one who is a blood relation.

Reply Obj. 3. A thing may be due in two ways. There is one which should be numbered, not among the goods of the debtor, but rather as belonging to the person to whom it is due; for instance, a man may have another's goods, whether in money or in kind, either because he has stolen them, or because he has received them on loan or in deposit, or in some other way. In this case a man ought to pay what he owes, rather than benefit his connections out of it, unless perhaps, the case be so urgent that it would be lawful for him to take another's property in order to relieve the one who is in need. Yet, again, this would not apply if the creditor were in equal distress. In such a case, however, the claims on either side would have to be weighed with regard to such other conditions as a prudent man would take into consideration, because, on account of the different particular cases, as the Philosopher states,¹ it is impossible to lay down a general rule.

The other kind of due is one which is counted among the goods of the debtor and not of the creditor; for instance, a thing may be due not because justice requires it, but on account of a certain moral equity, as in the case of benefits received freely. Now no benefactor confers a benefit equal to that which a man receives from his parents, and therefore in paying back benefits received, we should give the first place to our parents before all others, unless, on the other side, there be such weightier motives as need or some other circumstance, for instance the common good of the Church or state. In other cases we must take into account the connection and the benefit received; and here again no general rule can be laid down.

Reply Obj. 4. Parents are like superiors, and so a parent's love tends to conferring benefits, while the children's love tends to honour their parents. Nevertheless in a case of extreme urgency it would be lawful to abandon one's children rather than one's parents, to abandon whom it is by no means lawful, on account of the obligation we lie under towards them for the benefits we have received from them, as the Philosopher states.²

ARTICLE 4. Whether Beneficence Is a Special Virtue?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that beneficence is a special virtue.

Objection 1. For precepts are directed to virtue, since "lawgivers purpose to make men virtuous."³ Now beneficence and love are prescribed as distinct from one another, for it is written (Matt. 5. 44): Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you. Therefore beneficence is a virtue distinct from charity.

Obj. 2. Further, Vices are opposed to virtues. Now there are opposed to beneficence particular vices by which a hurt is inflicted on our neighbour, for instance, rapine, theft and so forth. Therefore beneficence is a special virtue.

Obj. 3. Further, Charity is not divided into many species. But there would seem to be many kinds of beneficence, according to the various kinds of benefits. Therefore beneficence is a distinct virtue from charity.

On the contrary, The internal and the external act do not require different virtues. Now beneficence and goodwill differ only as external and internal act, since beneficence is the execution of goodwill. Therefore as goodwill is not a distinct virtue from charity, so neither is beneficence.

I answer that, Virtues differ according to the different aspects of their objects. Now the formal aspect of the object of charity and of beneficence is the same, since both virtues look to the common aspect of good, as explained above (A. 1). Therefore beneficence is not a distinct virtue from charity, but denotes an act of charity.

Reply Obj. 1. Precepts are given, not about habits but about acts of virtue. Therefore distinction of precept denotes distinction, not of habits, but of acts.

Reply Obj. 2. Even as all benefits conferred on our neighbour, if we consider them under the common aspect of good, are to be traced to love, so all hurts, considered under the common aspect of evil, are to be traced to hatred. But if we consider these same things under certain special aspects of good or of evil, they are to be traced to certain special virtues or vices, and in this way also there are various kinds of benefits.

Hence the Reply to the Third Objection is evident.

QUESTION XXXII

OF ALMSDEEDS

(In Ten Articles)

WE must now consider almsdeeds under which head there are ten points of inquiry: (1) Whether almsgiving is an act of charity? (2) Of the different kinds of alms. (3) Which alms are of greater account, spiritual or corporal? (4) Whether corporal alms have a spiritual effect? (5) Whether the giving of alms is a matter of precept? (6) Whether corporal alms should be given out of the things we need? (7) Whether corporal alms should be given out of ill-gotten goods? (8) Who can give alms? (9) To whom should we give alms? (10) How should alms be given?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Almsgiving Is an Act of Charity?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that almsgiving is not an act of charity.

Objection 1. For without charity one cannot do acts of charity. Now it is possible to give alms without having charity, according to I Cor. 13. 3: If I should distribute all my goods to feed the poor . . . and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing. Therefore almsgiving is not an act of charity.

Obj. 2. Further, Almsdeeds are counted among works of satisfaction, according to Dan. 4. 24: Redeem thou thy sins with alms. Now satisfaction is an act of justice. Therefore almsgiving is an act of justice and not of charity.

Obj. 3. Further, The offering of sacrifices to God is an act of worship. But almsgiving is offering a sacrifice to God, according to Heb. 13. 16: Do not forget to do good and to impart, for by such sacrifices God's favour is obtained. Therefore almsgiving is not an act of charity, but of worship.

Obj. 4. Further, The Philosopher says¹ that to give for a good purpose is an act of liberality. Now this is especially true of almsgiving. Therefore almsgiving is not an act of charity.

On the contrary, It is written (I John 3. 17): He that hath the substance of this world, and shall see his brother in need, and shall put up his bowels from him, how doth the charity of God abide in him?

I answer that, External acts belong to that virtue to which the motive for doing those acts pertains. Now the motive for giving alms is to relieve one who is in need. Therefore some have defined alms as being "a deed whereby something is given to the needy, out of compassion and for God's sake,"² which motive belongs to mercy, as stated above (Q. xxx, A. 4). Hence it is clear that almsgiving is, properly speaking, an act of mercy. This appears in its very name, for in Greek (ἐλεημοσύνη) it is derived from having mercy (ἐλεειν) even as the Latin miseratio is. And since mercy is an effect of charity, as shown above (Q. xxx, A. 2; A. 3. obj. 3), it follows that almsgiving is an act of charity through the medium of mercy.

Reply Obj. 1. An act of virtue may be taken in two ways. First materially, and thus an act of justice is to do what is just; and such an act of virtue can be without the virtue, since many, without having the habit of justice, do what is just, led by the natural light of reason, or through fear, or in the hope of gain. Secondly, we speak of a thing being an act of justice formally, and thus an act of justice is to do what is just, in the same way as a just man, that is, with readiness and delight, and such an act of virtue cannot be without the virtue. Accordingly almsgiving can be materially without charity, but to give alms formally, that is, for God's sake, with delight and readiness, and altogether as one ought, is not possible without charity.

Reply Obj. 2. Nothing hinders the proper elicited act of one virtue being attributed to another virtue as commanding it and directing it to this other virtue's end. It is in this way that almsgiving is placed among works of satisfaction in so far as pity for the one in distress is directed to the satisfaction for his sin. And in so far as it is directed to placate God, it has the character of a sacrifice, and thus it is commanded by worship.

Hence the Reply to the Third Objection is evident.

Reply Obj. 4. Almsgiving pertains to liberality in so far as liberality removes an obstacle to that act, which might arise from excessive love of riches, the result of which is that one clings to them more than one ought.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the Different Kinds of Almsdeeds Are Suitably Enumerated?

We proceed then to the Second Article: It seems that the different kinds of almsdeeds are unsuitably enumerated.

Objection 1. For we count seven corporal almsdeeds, namely, to feed the hungry, to give drink to the thirsty, to clothe the naked, to harbour the harbourless, to visit the sick, to ransom the captive, to bury the dead; all of which are expressed in the following verse:

"To visit, to quench or to feed, to ransom, clothe, harbour or bury."¹

Again we count also seven spiritual alms, namely, to instruct the ignorant, to counsel the doubtful, to comfort the sorrowful, to reprove the sinner, to forgive injuries, to bear with those who trouble and annoy us, and to pray for all, which are all contained in the following verse:

"To counsel, reprove or console, to pardon, forbear, or to pray."² Yet so that counsel includes both advice and instruction.

And it seems that these various almsdeeds are unsuitably enumerated. For the purpose of almsdeeds is to succour our neighbour. But a dead man profits nothing by being buried; otherwise Our Lord would not have spoken truly when He said (Matt. 10. 28):³ Be not afraid of them who kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do. This explains why Our Lord, in enumerating the works of mercy, made no mention of the burial of the dead (Matt. 25. 35, 36). Therefore it seems that these almsdeeds are unsuitably enumerated.

Obj. 2. Further, As stated above (A. 1), the purpose of giving alms is to relieve our neighbour's need. Now there are many needs of human life other than those mentioned above, for instance, a blind man needs a leader, a lame man needs someone to lean on, a poor man needs riches. Therefore these almsdeeds are unsuitably enumerated.

Obj. 3. Further, Almsgiving is a work of mercy. But the reproof of the wrong-doer pertains, apparently, to severity rather than to mercy. Therefore it ought not to be counted among the spiritual almsdeeds.

Obj. 4. Further, Almsgiving is intended for the supply of a defect. But no man is without the defect of ignorance in some matter or other. Therefore, apparently, each one ought to instruct anyone who is ignorant of what he knows himself.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Hom. in Ev. ix):⁴ "Let him that hath understanding beware lest he withhold his knowledge; let him that hath abundance of wealth, watch lest he slacken his merciful bounty; let him who is a servant to art be most solicitous to share his skill and profit with his neighbour; let him who has an opportunity of speaking with the wealthy, fear lest he be condemned for retaining his talent, if when he has the chance he plead not with him the cause of the poor." Therefore the above mentioned almsdeeds are suitably enumerated in respect of those things of which men have abundance or insufficiency.

I answer that, The above mentioned distinction of almsdeeds is suitably taken from the various needs of our neighbour, some of which affect the soul, and are relieved by spiritual almsdeeds, while others affect the body, and are relieved by corporal almsdeeds. For corporal need occurs either during this life or afterwards. If it occurs during this life, it is either a common need in respect of things needed by all, or it is a special need occurring through some accident supervening. In the first case, the need is either internal or external. Internal need is twofold: one which is relieved by solid food, namely hunger, in respect of which we have to feed the hungry; while the other is relieved by liquid food, namely thirst, and in respect of this we have to give drink to the thirsty. The common need with regard to external help is twofold: one in respect of clothing, and as to this we have to clothe the naked; while the other is in respect of a dwelling place, and as to this we have to harbour the harbourless. Again if the need be special, it is either the result of an internal cause, like sickness, and then we have to visit the sick, or it results from an external cause, and then we have to ransom the captive. After this life we give burial to the dead.

In like manner spiritual needs are relieved by spiritual acts in two ways: first by asking for help from God, and in this respect we have prayer, by which one man prays for others; secondly, by giving human assistance, and this in three ways. First, in order to relieve a deficiency on the part of the intellect, and if this deficiency be in the speculative intellect, the remedy is applied by instructing, and if in the practical intellect, the remedy is applied by counselling. Secondly, there may be a deficiency on the part of the appetitive power, especially by way of sorrow, which is remedied by comforting. Thirdly, the deficiency may be due to a disordered act, and this may be the subject of a threefold consideration. First, in respect of the sinner, since sin proceeds from his disordered will, and thus the remedy takes the form of reproof. Secondly, in respect of the person sinned against; and if the sin be committed against ourselves, we apply the remedy by pardoning the injury, while, if it be committed against God or our neighbour, "it is not in our choice to pardon," as Jerome observes (Super Matt. 18, 15).¹ Thirdly, in respect of the result of the disordered act, on account of which the sinner is an annoyance to those who live with him, even apart from the sinner's intention, in which case the remedy is applied by bearing with him, especially with regard to those who sin out of weakness, according to Rom. 15. 1: We that are stronger, ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not only as regards their being infirm and consequently troublesome on account of their unruly actions, but also by bearing any other burdens of theirs with them, according to Gal. 6. 2: Bear ye one another's burdens.

Reply Obj. 1. Burial does not profit a dead man as though his body could be capable of perception after death. In this sense Our Lord said that those who kill the body have no more that they can do; and for this reason He did not mention the burial of the dead with the other works of mercy, but those only which are more clearly necessary. Nevertheless it does concern the deceased what is done with his body, both that he may live in the memory of man whose respect he forfeits if he remain without burial, and as regards a man's fondness for his own body while he was yet living, a fondness which kindly persons should imitate after his death. It is thus that some are praised for burying the dead, as Tobias, and those who buried Our Lord, as Augustine says (De Cura pro Mort. iii.)²

Reply Obj. 2. All other needs are reduced to these, for blindness and lameness are kinds of sickness, so that to lead the blind, and to support the lame, come to the same as visiting the sick. In like manner to assist a man against any distress that is due to an extrinsic cause comes to the same as the ransom of captives. And the wealth with which we relieve the poor is sought merely for the purpose of relieving those needs; hence there was no reason for special mention of this particular need.

Reply Obj. 3. The reproof of the sinner, as to the exercise of the act of reproving, seems to imply the severity of justice, but, as to the intention of the reprover, who wishes to free a man from the evil of sin, it is an act of mercy and lovingkindness, according to Prov. 27. 6: Better are the wounds of a friend, than the deceitful kisses of an enemy.

Reply Obj. 4. Nescience is not always a defect, but only when it is about what one ought to know, and it is a part of almsgiving to supply this defect by instruction. In doing this however we should observe the due circumstances of persons, place and time, even as in other virtuous acts.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Corporal Alms Are of More Account Than Spiritual Alms?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that corporal alms are of more account than spiritual alms.

Objection 1. For it is more praiseworthy to give an alms to one who is in greater want, since an almsdeed is to be praised because it relieves one who is in need. Now the body which is relieved by corporal alms, is by nature more needy than the spirit which is relieved by spiritual alms. Therefore corporal alms are of more account.

Obj. 2. Further, an alms is less praiseworthy and meritorious if the kindness is compensated, and so Our Lord says (Luke 14. 12): When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy neighbours who are rich, lest perhaps they also invite thee again. Now there is always compensation in spiritual almsdeeds, since he who prays for another, profits thereby, according to Ps. 35. 13: My prayer shall be turned into my bosom; and he who teaches another, makes progress himself in knowledge, which cannot be said of corporal almsdeeds. Therefore corporal almsdeeds are of more account than spiritual almsdeeds.

Obj. 3. Further, an alms is to be commended if the needy one is comforted by it; hence it is written (Job 31. 20): If his sides have not blessed me, and the Apostle says to Philemon (verse 7): The bowels of the saints have been refreshed by thee, brother. Now a corporal alms is sometimes more welcome to a needy man than a spiritual alms. Therefore bodily almsdeeds are of more account than spiritual almsdeeds.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Serm. Dom. in Monte, i, 20)¹ on the words, Give to him that asketh of thee (Matt. 5. 42): "You should give so as to injure neither yourself nor another, and when you refuse what another asks, you must not lose sight of the claims of justice, and send him away empty; at times indeed you will give what is better than what is asked for, if you reprove him that asks unjustly." Now reproof is a spiritual alms. Therefore spiritual almsdeeds are preferable to corporal almsdeeds.

I answer that, There are two ways of comparing these almsdeeds. First, speaking absolutely, and in this respect, spiritual almsdeeds hold the first place, for three reasons. First, because the offering is more excellent, since it is a spiritual gift, which surpasses a corporal gift, according to Prov. 4. 2: I will give you a good gift, forsake not My Law. Secondly, on account of what is succoured, because the spirit is more excellent than the body, and so, even as a man in looking after himself, ought to look to his soul more than to his body, so ought he in looking after his neighbour, whom he ought to love as himself. Thirdly, as regards the acts themselves by which our neighbour is succoured, because spiritual acts are more excellent than corporal acts, which are, in a fashion, servile.

Secondly, we may compare them with regard to some particular case, when some corporal alms excels some spiritual alms; for instance, a man in hunger is to be fed rather than instructed, and as the Philosopher observes,² for a needy man money is better than philosophy, although the latter is better absolutely.

Reply Obj. 1. It is better to give to one who is in greater want, other things being equal, but if he who is less needy is better, and is in want of better things, it is better to give to him; and it is thus in the case in point.

Reply Obj. 2. Compensation does not detract from the merit and praise of almsgiving if it be not intended, even as human glory, if not intended, does not detract from virtue. Thus Sallust says of Cato (Catilin.)³ that "the less he sought fame, the more he became famous"; and thus it is with spiritual almsdeeds. Nevertheless the intention of gaining spiritual goods does not detract from merit, as the intention of gaining corporal goods.

Reply Obj. 3. The merit of an almsgiver depends on that in which the will of the recipient should rest reasonably, and not on that in which it rests when it is disordered.

ARTICLE 4 Whether Corporal Almsdeeds Have a Spiritual Effect?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that corporal almsdeeds have not a spiritual effect.

Object 1. For no effect exceeds its cause. But spiritual goods exceed corporal goods. Therefore corporal almsdeeds have no spiritual effect.

Obj. 2. Further, the sin of simony consists in giving the corporal for the spiritual, and it is to be utterly avoided. Therefore one ought not to give alms in order to receive a spiritual effect.

Obj. 3. Further, to multiply the cause is to multiply the effect. If therefore corporal almsdeeds cause a spiritual effect, the greater the alms, the greater the spiritual profit, which is contrary to what we read (Luke 21.) of the widow who cast two brass mites into the treasury, and in Our Lord's own words cast in more than . . . all. Therefore bodily almsdeeds have no spiritual effect.

On the contrary, It is written (Ecclus. 17. 18): The alms of a man . . . shall preserve the grace of a man as the apple of the eye.

I answer that, Corporal almsdeeds may be considered in three ways. First, with regard to their substance, and in this way they have merely a corporal effect, in so far, namely, as they supply our neighbour's corporal needs. Secondly, they may be considered with regard to their cause, in so far as a man gives a corporal alms out of love for God and his neighbour, and in this respect, they bring forth a spiritual fruit, according to Ecclus. 29. 13, 14: Lose thy money for thy brother . . . place thy treasure in the commandments of the Most High, and it shall bring thee more profit than gold.

Thirdly, with regard to the effect, and in this way again, they have a spiritual fruit, in so far as our neighbour, who is succoured by a corporal alms, is moved to pray for his benefactor; hence the above text goes on (verse 15): Shut up alms in the heart of the poor, and it shall obtain help for thee from all evil.

Reply Obj. 1. This argument considers corporal almsdeeds as to their substance.

Reply Obj. 2 He who gives an alms does not intend to buy a spiritual thing with a corporal thing, for he knows that spiritual things infinitely surpass corporal things, but he intends to merit a spiritual fruit through the love of charity.

³ Chap. 54 (DD 58).

Reply Obj. 3. The widow who gave less in quantity gave more in proportion; and thus we gather that the fervour of her charity, from which corporal almsdeeds derive their spiritual efficacy, was greater.

ARTICLE 5. Whether Almsgiving Is a Matter of Precept?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that almsgiving is not a matter of precept.

Objection 1. For the counsels are distinct from the precepts. Now almsgiving is a matter of counsel, according to Dan. 4. 24: Let my counsel be acceptable to the King; (Vulg.,—to thee, and) redeem thou thy sins with alms. Therefore almsgiving is not a matter of precept.

Obj. 2. Further, it is lawful for everyone to use and to keep what is his own. Yet by keeping it he will not give alms. Therefore it is lawful not to give alms, and consequently almsgiving is not a matter of precept.

Obj. 3. Further, whatever is a matter of precept binds the transgressor at some time or other under pain of mortal sin, because positive precepts are binding for some fixed time. Therefore, if almsgiving were a matter of precept, it would be possible to point to some fixed time when a man would commit a mortal sin unless he gave an alms. But it does not appear how this can be so, because it can always be deemed probable that the person in need can be relieved in some other way, and that what we would spend in almsgiving might be needful to ourselves either now or in some future time. Therefore it seems that almsgiving is not a matter of precept.

Obj. 4. Further, Every commandment is reducible to the precepts of the Decalogue. But these precepts contain no reference to almsgiving. Therefore almsgiving is not a matter of precept.

On the contrary, No man is punished eternally for omitting to do what is not a matter of precept. But some are punished eternally for omitting to give alms, as is clear from Matt. 25. 41-43. Therefore almsgiving is a matter of precept.

I answer that, As love of our neighbour is a matter of precept, whatever is a necessary condition to the love of our neighbour is a matter of precept also. Now the love of our neighbour requires that not only should we be our neighbour's well-wishers, but also his well-doers, according to I John 3. 18: Let us not love in word, nor in tongue, but in deed, and in truth. And in order to be a person's well-wisher and well-doer, we ought to succour his needs: this is done by almsgiving. Therefore almsgiving is a matter of precept.

Since, however, precepts are about acts of virtue, it follows that all almsgiving must be a matter of precept in so far as it is necessary to virtue, namely, in so far as it is demanded by right reason. Now right reason demands that we should take into consideration something on the part of the giver, and something on the part of the recipient. On the part of the giver, it must be noted that he should give of his surplus, according to Luke 11. 41: That which remaineth, give alms. This surplus is to be taken in reference not only to himself, so as to denote what is unnecessary to the individual, but also in reference to those of whom he has charge, because each one must first of all look after himself and then after those over whom he has charge, and afterwards with what remains relieve the needs of others (in respect of these things we have the expression necessary to the person taking the word person as expressive of dignity). Thus nature first, by its nutritive power, takes what it requires for the upkeep of one's own body, and afterwards yields the residue for the formation of another by the power of generation.

On the part of the recipient it is requisite that he should be in need, for otherwise there would be no reason for giving him alms; yet since it is not possible for one individual to relieve the needs of all, we are not bound to relieve all who are in need, but only those who could not be succoured if we did not succour them. For in such cases the words of Ambrose apply, "Feed him that dies of hunger; if thou hast not fed him, thou hast slain him."¹

Accordingly we are bound to give alms of our surplus, as also to give alms to one whose need is extreme; otherwise almsgiving, like any other greater good, is a matter of counsel.

Reply Obj. 1. Daniel spoke to a king who was not subject to God's Law, and therefore such things as were prescribed by the Law which he did not profess, had to be counselled to him. Or he may have been speaking in reference to a case in which almsgiving was not a matter of precept.

Reply Obj. 2. The temporal goods which God grants us are ours as to the ownership, but as to the use of them, they belong not to us alone but also to such others as we are able to succour out of what we have over and above our needs. Hence Basil says:¹ "If you acknowledge them," namely, your temporal goods, "as coming from God, is He unjust because He apportioned them unequally? Why are you rich while another is poor, unless it be that you may have the merit of a good stewardship, and he the reward of patience? It is the hungry man's bread that you withhold, the naked man's cloak that you have stored away, the shoe of the barefoot that you have left to rot, the money of the needy that you have buried underground: and so you injure as many as you might help." Ambrose expresses himself in the same way,² as he is quoted in the Decretals.³

Reply Obj. 3. There is a time when we sin mortally if we omit to give alms; on the part of the recipient when we see that his need is evident and urgent, and that he is not likely to be succoured otherwise—on the part of the giver, when he has superfluous goods, which he does not need for the time being, as far as he can judge with probability. Nor need he consider every case that may possibly occur in the future, for this would be to think about the morrow, which Our Lord forbade us to do (Matt. 6. 34), but he should judge what is superfluous and what necessary, according as things probably and generally occur.

Reply Obj. 4. All succour given to our neighbour is reduced to the precept about honouring our parents. For thus does the Apostle interpret it (I Tim. 4. 8) where he says: *Dutifulness*⁴ (Douay,—Godliness) is profitable to all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come, and he says this because the precept about honouring our parents contains the promise, that thou mayest be longlived upon the land (Exod. 20. 12); and dutifulness comprises all kinds of almsgiving.

ARTICLE 6. Whether One Ought To Give Alms Out of What One Needs?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that one ought not to give alms out of what one needs.

Objection 1. For the order of charity should be observed not only as regards the effect of our benefactions but also as regards our interior affections. Now it is a sin to invert the order of charity, because this order is a matter of precept. Since, then, the order of charity requires that a man should love himself more than his neighbour, it seems that he would sin if he deprived himself of what he needed, in order to succour his neighbour.

Obj. 2. Further, Whoever gives away what he needs himself, squanders his own substance, and that is to be a prodigal, according to the Philosopher.⁵ But no vicious deed should be done. Therefore we should not give alms out of what we need.

Obj. 3. Further, The Apostle says (I Tim. 5. 8): If any man have not care of his own, and especially of those of his house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel. Now if a man gives of what he needs for himself or for his charge, he seems to detract from the care he should have for himself or his charge. Therefore it seems that whoever gives alms from what he needs, sins gravely.

On the contrary, Our Lord said (Matt. 19. 21): If thou wilt be perfect, go, sell what thou hast, and give to the poor. Now he that gives all he has to the poor, gives not only what he needs not, but also what he needs. Therefore a man may give alms out of what he needs.

I answer that, A thing is necessary in two ways: first, because without it something is impossible, and it is altogether wrong to give alms out of what is necessary to us in this sense; for instance, if a man found himself in the presence of a case of urgency, and had merely sufficient to support himself and his children, or others under his charge, he would be throwing away his life and that of others if he were to give away in alms what was then necessary to him. Yet I say this without prejudice to such a case as might happen, supposing that by depriving himself of necessities a man might help a great personage, and a support of the Church or State, since it would be a praiseworthy act to endanger one's life and the lives of those who are under our charge for the delivery of such a person, since the common good is to be preferred to one's own.

Secondly, a thing is said to be necessary, if a man cannot without it live in keeping with the condition or state either of his own person or the persons of whom he has charge. The "necessary" considered thus is not an invariable quantity, for one might add much more to a man's property, and yet not go beyond what he needs in this way, or one might take much from him, and he would still have sufficient for the decencies of life in keeping with his own position. Accordingly it is good to give alms of this kind of "necessary"; and it is a matter not of precept but of counsel. Yet it would be inordinate to deprive oneself of one's own in order to give to others to such an extent that the remainder would be insufficient for one to live in keeping with one's station and the ordinary occurrences of life; for no man ought to live unbecomingly.

There are, however, three exceptions to the above rule. The first is when a man changes his state of life, for instance, by entering religion, for then he gives away all his possessions for Christ's sake, and performs the work of perfection by transferring himself to another state. Secondly, when that which he deprives himself of, though it be required for the decencies of life, can nevertheless easily be recovered, so that he does not suffer extreme inconvenience. Thirdly, when he is in presence of extreme indigence in a private person, or great need on the part of the common weal. For in such cases it would seem praiseworthy to forego the requirement of one's station, in order to provide for a greater need.

The objections may be easily solved from what has been said.

ARTICLE 7. Whether One May Give Alms Out of Ill-Gotten Goods?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It seems that one may give alms out of ill-gotten goods.

Objection 1. For it is written (Luke 16 9): Make unto you friends of the mammon of iniquity. Now mammon signifies riches. Therefore it is lawful to make spiritual friends for oneself by giving alms out of ill-gotten riches.

Obj. 2. Further, All filthy lucre seems to be ill-gotten. But the profits from whoredom are filthy lucre; therefore it was forbidden (Luke 23. 18) to offer therefrom sacrifices or oblations to God: Thou shalt not offer the hire of a strumpet . . . in the house of . . . thy God. In like manner gains from games of chance are ill-gotten, for, as the Philosopher says,¹ "we take such gains from our friends to whom we ought rather to give." And most of all are the profits from simony ill-gotten, since thereby the Holy Ghost is wronged. Nevertheless out of such gains it is lawful to give alms. Therefore one may give alms out of ill-gotten goods.

Obj. 3. Further, Greater evils should be avoided more than lesser evils. Now it is less sinful to keep back another's property than to commit murder of which a man is guilty if he fails to succour one who is in extreme need, as appears from the words of Ambrose who says (loc. cit. A. 5): "Feed him that dies of hunger, if thou hast not fed him, thou hast slain him." Therefore, in certain cases, it is lawful to give alms of ill-gotten goods.

On the contrary, Augustine says (Serm. cxiii, 2):² "Give alms from your just labours. For you will not bribe Christ your judge, not to hear you with the poor whom you rob . . . Give not alms from interest and usury: I speak to the faithful to whom we dispense the Body of Christ."

I answer that, A thing may be ill-gotten in three ways. In the first place a thing is ill-gotten if it be due to the person from whom it is gotten, and may not be kept by the person who has obtained possession of it; as in the case of rapine, theft and usury, and of such things a man may not give alms since he is bound to restore them.

Secondly, a thing is ill-gotten, when he that has it may not keep it and yet he may not return it to the person from whom he received it, because he received it unjustly, while the latter gave it unjustly. This happens in simony, where both giver and receiver act against the justice of the Divine Law, so that restitution is to be made not to the giver, but by giving alms. The same applies to all similar cases of illegal giving and receiving.

Thirdly, a thing is ill-gotten not because the taking was unlawful, but because it is the outcome of something unlawful, as in the case of a woman's profits from whoredom. This is filthy lucre properly so called, because the practice of whoredom is filthy and against the Law of God, yet the woman does not act unjustly or unlawfully in taking money. Consequently it is lawful to keep and to give in alms what is thus acquired by an unlawful action.

Reply Obj. 1. As Augustine says,³ "Some have misunderstood this saying of Our Lord, so as to take another's property and give thereof to the poor, thinking that they are fulfilling the commandment by so doing. This interpretation must be amended." Yet "all riches are called riches of iniquity," as stated in De Quæst. Ev. ii.,⁴ because "riches are not unjust save for those who are themselves unjust, and put all their trust in them." Or, according to Ambrose in his commentary on Luke 16. 9, "Make unto yourselves friends, etc., He calls mammon unjust, because it draws our affections by the various allurements of wealth¹—Or, because "among the many ancestors whose property you inherit, there is one who took the property of others unjustly, although you know nothing about it," as Basil says in a homily.²—Or, all riches are styled riches of iniquity, that is, of inequality, because they are not distributed equally among all, one being in need, and another in affluence.

Reply Obj. 2. We have already explained how alms may be given out of the profits of whoredom. Yet sacrifices and oblations were not made from these at the altar, both on account of the scandal, and through reverence for sacred things. It is also lawful to give alms out of the profits of simony, because they are not due to him who paid, but rather he deserves to lose them. But as to the profits from games of chance, there would seem to be something unlawful as being contrary to the Divine Law, when a man wins from one who cannot alienate his property, such as minors, lunatics and so forth, or when a man, with the desire of making money out of another man, entices him to play, and wins from him by cheating. In these cases he is bound to restitution, and consequently cannot give away his gains in alms. Then again there would seem to be something unlawful as being against the positive civil law, which altogether forbids any such profits.³ Since, however, a civil law does not bind all, but only those who are subject to that law, and moreover may be abrogated through desuetude, it follows that all such as are bound by these laws are bound to make restitution of such gains, unless perhaps the contrary custom prevail, or unless a man win from one who enticed him to play, in which case he is not bound to restitution, because the loser does not deserve to be paid back; and yet he cannot lawfully keep what he has won, so long as that positive law is in force, and so in this case he ought to give it away in alms.

Reply Obj. 3. All things are common property in a case of extreme necessity. Hence one who is in such dire straits may take another's goods in order to succour himself, if he can find no one who is willing to give him something. For the same reason a man may retain what belongs to another, and give alms of them; or even take something if there be no other way of succouring the one who is in need. If however this be possible without danger, he must ask the owner's consent, and then succour the poor man who is in extreme necessity.

ARTICLE 8. Whether One Who Is Under Another's Power Can Give Alms?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It would seem that one who is under another's power can give alms.

Objection 1. For religious are under the power of their prelates to whom they have vowed obedience. Now if it were unlawful for them to give alms, they would lose by entering the state of religion, for as Ambrose says⁴ on I Tim. 4. 8: Dutifulness (Douay—Godliness) is profitable to all things: "The sum total of the Christian religion consists in dutiful conduct," and the most creditable form of this is to give alms. Therefore those who are in another's power can give alms.

Obj. 2. Further, A wife is under her husband's power (Gen. 3. 16). But a wife can give alms since she is her husband's partner; hence it is related of the Blessed Lucy that she gave alms without the knowledge of her betrothed.⁵ Therefore a person is not prevented from giving alms, by being under another's power.

Obj. 3. Further, The subjection of children to their parents is founded on nature, and so the Apostle says (Eph. 6. 1): Children, obey your parents in the Lord. But, apparently, children may give alms out of their parents' property. For it is in a way their own, since they are the heirs; therefore, since they can employ it for some bodily use it seems that much more can they use it in giving alms so as to profit their souls. Therefore those who are under another's power can give alms.

Obj. 4. Further, Servants are under their master's power, according to Tit. 2. 9: Exhort servants to be obedient to their masters. Now they may lawfully do anything that will profit their masters, and this would be especially the case if they gave alms for them. Therefore those who are under another's power can give alms.

On the contrary, Alms should not be given out of another's property, "but each one should give alms out of the just profit of his own labour," as Augustine says (De Verb. Dom.).¹ Now if those who are subject to anyone were to give alms, this would be out of another's property. Therefore those who are under another's power cannot give alms.

I answer that, Anyone who is under another's power must, as such, be ruled in accordance with the power of his superior; for the natural order demands that the inferior should be ruled according to its superior. Therefore in those matters in which the inferior is subject to his superior, his ministrations must be subject to the superior's permission. Accordingly he that is under another's power must not give alms of anything in respect of which he is subject to that other, except in so far as he has been commissioned by his superior. But if he has something in respect of which he is not under the power of his superior, he is no longer subject to another in its regard, being independent in respect of that particular thing, and he can give alms from it.

Reply Obj. 1. If a monk be dispensed through being commissioned by his superior, he can give alms from the property of his monastery, in accordance with the terms of his commission; but if he has no such dispensation, since he has nothing of his own, he cannot give alms without his abbot's permission either express or presumed for some probable reason, except in a case of extreme necessity, when it would be lawful for him to commit a theft in order to give an alms. Nor does it follow that he is worse off than before, because, as stated in De Eccles. Dogm. (lxxi),² "it is a good thing to give one's property to the poor little by little, but it is better still to give all at once in order to follow Christ, and being freed from care, to be needy with Christ."

Reply Obj. 2. A wife, who has other property besides her dowry which is for the support of the burdens of marriage, whether that property be gained by her own industry or by any other lawful means, can give alms out of that property without asking her husband's permission; yet such alms should be moderate, lest through giving too much she impoverish her husband. Otherwise she ought not to give alms without the express or presumed consent of her husband, except in cases of necessity, as stated, in the case of a monk, in the preceding Reply. For though the wife be her husband's equal in the marriage act, yet in matters of housekeeping, the head of the woman is the man, as the Apostle says (I Cor. 11. 3). As regards Blessed Lucy, she had a betrothed, not a husband, and so she could give alms with her mother's consent.

Reply Obj. 3. What belongs to the children belongs also to the father. Therefore the child cannot give alms, except in such small quantity that one may presume the father to be willing, unless, as might happen, the father authorize his child to dispose of any particular property. The same applies to servants. Hence the Reply to the Fourth Objection is clear.

ARTICLE 9. Whether One Ought To Give Alms to Those Rather Who Are More Closely United to Us?

We proceed thus to the Ninth Article: It seems that one ought not to give alms to those rather who are more closely united to us.

Objection 1. For it is written (Ecclus. 12. 4, 6): Give to the merciful and uphold not the sinner . . . Do good to the humble and give not to the ungodly. Now it happens sometimes that those who are closely united to us are sinful and undutiful. Therefore we ought not to give alms to them in preference to others.

Obj. 2. Further, Alms should be given that we may receive an eternal reward in return, according to Matt. 6. 18: And thy Father Who seeth in secret, will repay thee. Now the eternal reward is gained chiefly by the alms which are given to the saints, according to Luke 16. 9: Make unto you friends of the mammon of iniquity, that when you shall fail, they may receive you into everlasting dwellings, which passage Augustine expounds (De Verb. Dom. xxxv):³ "Who shall have everlasting dwellings unless the saints of God? And who are they that shall be received by them into their dwellings, if not those who succour them in their needs?" Therefore alms should be given to the more holy persons rather than to those who are more closely united to us.

Obj. 3. Further, Man is more closely united to himself. But a man cannot give himself an alms. Therefore it seems that we are not bound to give alms to those who are most closely united to us.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (I Tim. 5. 8): If any man have not care of his own, and especially of those of his house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel.

I answer that, As Augustine says,⁴ it falls to us by lot, as it were, to have to look to the welfare of those who are more closely united to us. Nevertheless in this matter we must employ discretion, according to the various degrees of connection, holiness and utility. For we ought to give alms to one who is much holier and in greater want, and to one who is more useful to the common good, rather than to one who is more closely united to us, especially if the latter be not very closely united, and has no special claim on our care then and there, and who is not in very urgent need.

Reply Obj. 1. We ought not to help a sinner as such, that is by encouraging him to sin, but as man, that is by supporting his nature.

Reply Obj. 2. Almsdeeds deserve on two counts to receive an eternal reward. First because they are rooted in charity, and in this respect an almsdeed is meritorious in so far as it observes the order of charity, which requires that, other things being equal, we should, in preference, help those who are more closely connected with us. Therefore Ambrose says (De Officiis, i, 30):¹ "It is with commendable liberality that you forget not your kindred, if you know them to be in need, for it is better that you should yourself help your own family, who would be ashamed to beg help from others." Secondly, almsdeeds deserve to be rewarded eternally through the merit of the recipient, who prays for the giver, and it is in this sense that Augustine is speaking.

Reply Obj. 3. Since almsdeeds are works of mercy, just as a man does not, properly speaking, pity himself, but only by a kind of comparison, as stated above (Q. xxx, A. 1, reply 2), so too, properly speaking, no man gives himself an alms, unless he act in another's person; thus when a man is appointed to distribute alms, he can take something for himself, if he be in want, on the same ground as when he gives to others.

ARTICLE 10. Whether Alms Should Be Given in Abundance?

We proceed thus to the Tenth Article: It would seem that alms should not be given in abundance.

Objection 1. For we ought to give alms to those chiefly who are most closely connected with us. But we ought not to give to them in such a way that they are likely to become richer thereby, as Ambrose says (De Offic. i, 30).² Therefore neither should we give abundantly to others.

Obj. 2. Further, Ambrose says (ibid.): "We should not lavish our wealth on others all at once, we should dole it out by degrees." But to give abundantly is to give lavishly. Therefore alms should not be given in abundance.

Obj. 3. Further, The Apostle says (II Cor. 8. 13): Not that others should be eased, that is, should live on you without working themselves, and you burthened, that is, impoverished. But this would be the result if alms were given in abundance. Therefore we ought not to give alms abundantly.

On the contrary, It is written (Tob. 4. 9): If thou have much, give abundantly.

I answer that, Alms may be considered abundant in relation either to the giver, or to the recipient; in relation to the giver, when that which a man gives is great as compared with his means. To give thus is praiseworthy, and so Our Lord (Luke 21. 3, 4) commended the widow because of her want, she cast in all the living that she had. Nevertheless those conditions must be observed which were laid down when we spoke of giving alms out of one's necessary goods (A 6).

On the part of the recipient, an alms may be abundant in two ways. First, by relieving his need sufficiently, and in this sense it is praiseworthy to give alms. Secondly, by relieving his need more than sufficiently; this is not praiseworthy, and it would be better to give to several that are in need. Hence the Apostle says (I Cor. 13. 3): If I should distribute . . . to feed the poor, on which words a gloss comments:³ "Thus we are warned to be careful in giving alms, and to give, not to one only, but to many, that we may profit many."

Reply Obj. 1. This argument considers abundance of alms as exceeding the needs of the recipient.

Reply Obj. 2. The passage quoted considers abundance of alms on the part of the giver; but the sense is that God does not wish a man to lavish all his wealth at once, except when he changes his state of life, and so he goes on to say: "Except we imitate Eliseus who slew his oxen and fed the poor with what he had, so that no household cares might keep him back."

Reply Obj. 3. In the passage quoted the words, not that others should be eased or refreshed, refer to that abundance of alms which surpasses the need of the recipient, to whom one should give alms not that he may have an easy life, but that he may have relief. Nevertheless we must bring discretion to bear on the matter, on account of the various conditions of men, some of whom are more daintily nurtured, and need finer food and clothing. Hence Ambrose says (De Offic. i, 30):¹ "When you give an alms to a man, you should take into consideration his age and his weakness; and sometimes the shame which proclaims his good birth; and again that perhaps he has fallen from riches to indigence through no fault of his own."

With regard to the words that follow, and you burthened, they refer to abundance on the part of the giver. Yet, as a gloss says on the same passage,² "he says this, not because it would be better to give in abundance, but because he fears for the weak, and he admonishes them so to give that they lack not for themselves."

QUESTION XXXIII OF FRATERNAL CORRECTION (In Eight Articles)

WE must now consider Fraternal Correction, under which head there are eight points of inquiry: (1) Whether fraternal correction is an act of charity? (2) Whether it is a matter of precept? (3) Whether this precept binds all, or only superiors? (4) Whether this precept binds the subject to correct his superior? (5) Whether a sinner may correct anyone? (6) Whether one ought to correct a person who becomes worse through being corrected? (7) Whether secret correction should precede denouncement? (8) Whether witnesses should be called before denouncement?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Fraternal Correction Is an Act of Charity?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that fraternal correction is not an act of charity.

Objection 1. For a gloss on Matt. 18. 15, If thy brother shall offend against thee, says that a man should reprove his brother out of zeal for justice.³ But justice is a distinct virtue from charity. Therefore fraternal correction is an act, not of charity, but of justice.

Obj. 2. Further, Fraternal correction is given by secret admonition. Now admonition is a kind of counsel, which is an act of prudence, for "a prudent man is one who is of good counsel."⁴ Therefore fraternal correction is an act, not of charity, but of prudence.

Obj. 3. Further, Contrary acts do not belong to the same virtue. Now it is an act of charity to bear with a sinner, according to Gal. 6. 2: Bear ye one another's burdens and so you shall fulfil the law of Christ, which is the law of charity. Therefore it seems that the correction of a sinning brother, which is contrary to bearing with him, is not an act of charity.

On the contrary, To correct the wrongdoer is a spiritual almsdeed. But almsdeeds are works of charity, as stated above (Q. XXXII. A. 1). Therefore fraternal correction is an act of charity.

I answer that, The correction of the wrongdoer is a remedy which should be employed against a man's sin. Now a man's sin may be considered in two ways: first as being harmful to the sinner; secondly as conducing to the harm of others, by hurting or scandalizing them, or by being detrimental to the common good, the justice of which is disturbed by that man's sin.

Consequently the correction of a wrongdoer is twofold. One applies a remedy to the sin considered as an evil of the sinner himself. This is fraternal correction properly so called, which is directed to the amendment of the sinner. Now to do away with anyone's evil is the same as to procure his good, and to procure a person's good is an act of charity, by which we wish and do our friend well. Consequently fraternal correction also is an act of charity, because thereby we drive out our brother's evil, namely sin, the removal of which pertains to charity even more than the removal of an external loss, or of a bodily injury, by so much the more as the contrary good of virtue is more akin to charity than the good of the body or of external things. Therefore fraternal correction is an act of charity rather than the healing of a bodily infirmity, or the relieving of an external bodily need.

There is another correction which applies a remedy to the sin of the wrongdoer, considered as hurtful to others, and especially to the common good. This correction is an act of justice, whose concern it is to safeguard the rectitude of justice between one man and another.

Reply Obj. 1. This gloss speaks of the second correction which is an act of justice. Or if it speaks of the first correction, then it takes justice as denoting a general virtue, as we shall state further on (Q. LVIII. A. 5), in which sense again all sin is iniquity (I John 3. 4). through being contrary to justice.

Reply Obj. 2. According to the Philosopher,¹ "prudence regulates whatever is directed to the end," about which things counsel and choice are concerned. Nevertheless when, guided by prudence, we perform rightly some action which is directed to the end of some virtue, such as temperance or fortitude, that action belongs chiefly to the virtue to whose end it is directed. Since, then, the admonition which is given in fraternal correction is directed to the removal of a brother's sin, which removal pertains to charity, it is evident that this admonition is chiefly an act of charity, which virtue commands it, so to speak, but secondarily an act of prudence, which executes and directs the action.

Reply Obj. 3. Fraternal correction is not opposed to forbearance with the weak, but on the contrary it results from it. For a man bears with a sinner, in so far as he is not disturbed against him, and retains his goodwill towards him, the result being that he strives to make him do better.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Fraternal Correction Is a Matter of Precept?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that fraternal correction is not a matter of precept.

Objection 1. For nothing impossible is a matter of precept, according to the saying of Jerome:² "Accursed be he who says that God has commanded anything impossible." Now it is written (Ecclus 7. 14): Consider the works of God, that no man can correct whom He hath despised. Therefore fraternal correction is not a matter of precept.

Obj. 2. Further, All the precepts of the Divine law are reduced to the precepts of the Decalogue. But fraternal correction does not come under any precept of the Decalogue. Therefore it is not a matter of precept.

Obj. 3. Further, The omission of a Divine precept is a mortal sin, which has no place in a holy man. Yet holy and spiritual men are found to omit fraternal correction: since Augustine says:³ "Not only those of low degree, but also those of high position, refrain from reproving others, moved by a guilty cupidity, not by the claims of charity." Therefore fraternal correction is not a matter of precept.

Obj. 4. Further, Whatever is a matter of precept is something due. If, therefore fraternal correction is a matter of precept, it is due to our brethren that we correct them when they sin. Now when a man owes anyone a corporal due, such as the payment of a sum of money, he must not be content that his creditor come to him, but he should seek him out, that he may pay him his due. Hence we should have to go seeking for those who need correction, in order that we might correct them; which appears to be unfitting, both on account of the great number of sinners, for whose correction one man could not suffice, and because religious would have to leave the cloister in order to reprove men, which would be unbecoming. Therefore fraternal correction is not a matter of precept.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Verb. Dom. i):⁴ "You become worse than the sinner if you fail to correct him." But this would not be so unless, by this neglect, one omitted to observe some precept. Therefore fraternal correction is a matter of precept.

I answer that, Fraternal correction is a matter of precept. We must observe, however, that while the negative precepts of the Law forbid sinful acts, the positive precepts inculcate acts of virtue. Now sinful acts are evil in themselves, and cannot become good, no matter how, or when, or where, they are done, because of themselves they are connected with an evil end, as stated in the Ethics,⁵ therefore negative precepts bind always and for all times. On the other hand acts of virtue must not be done anyhow, but by observing the due circumstances which are required in order that an act be virtuous; namely, that it be done where, when, and how it ought to be done. And since the disposition of whatever is directed to the end depends on the character of the end, the chief of these circumstances of a virtuous act is this aspect of the end, which in this case is the good of virtue. If therefore such a circumstance be omitted from a virtuous act as entirely takes away the good of virtue, such an act is contrary to a precept. If, however, the circumstance omitted from a virtuous act be such as not to destroy the virtue altogether, though it does not perfectly attain the good of virtue, it is not against a precept. Hence the Philosopher says⁶ that if we depart but little from the mean, it is not contrary to the virtue, but if we depart much from the mean, virtue is destroyed in its act. Now fraternal correction is directed to a brother's amendment, so that it is a matter of precept in so far as it is necessary for that end, but not so that we have to correct our erring brother at all places and times.

Reply Obj. 1. In all good deeds man's action is not efficacious without the Divine assistance, and yet man must do what is in his power. Hence Augustine says (De Correp. et Gratia, xv):¹ "Since we do not know who is predestined and who is not, charity should so guide our feelings, that we wish all to be saved." Consequently we ought to do our brethren the kindness of correcting them, with the hope of God's help.

Reply Obj. 2. As stated above (Q. xxxii, A. 5, reply 4) all the precepts about rendering service to our neighbour are reduced to the precept about the honour due to parents.

Reply Obj. 3. Fraternal correction may be omitted in three ways. First, meritoriously, when out of charity one omits to correct someone. For Augustine says:² "If a man refrains from chiding and reproving wrongdoers, because he awaits a suitable time for so doing, or because he fears lest, if he does so, they may become worse, or hinder, oppress, or turn away from the faith, others who are weak and need to be instructed in a life of goodness and virtue, this does not seem to result from covetousness, but to be counselled by charity."

Secondly, fraternal correction may be omitted in such a way that one commits a mortal sin, namely, "when (as he says in the same passage) one fears what people may think, or lest one may suffer grievous pain or death"; provided, however, that the mind is so dominated by such things, that it gives them the preference to fraternal charity. This would seem to be the case when a man thinks that he might probably withdraw some wrongdoer from sin, and yet omits to do so, through fear or covetousness.

Thirdly, such an omission is a venial sin, when through fear or covetousness, a man is reluctant to correct his brother's faults, and yet not to such a degree that if he saw clearly that he could withdraw him from sin, he would still forbear from so doing, through fear or covetousness, because in his own mind he prefers fraternal charity to these things. It is in this way that holy men sometimes omit to correct wrongdoers.

Reply Obj. 4. We are bound to pay that which is due to some fixed and certain person, whether it be a corporal or a spiritual good, without waiting for him to come to us, but by taking proper steps to find him. Therefore just as he that owes money to a creditor should seek him, when the time comes, so as to pay him what he owes, so he that has spiritual charge of some person is bound to seek him out, in order to reprove him for a sin. On the other hand we are not bound to seek someone on whom to bestow such favours as are due not to any certain person but to all our neighbours in general, whether those favours be material or spiritual goods, but it suffices that we bestow them when the opportunity occurs; because, as Augustine says,³ we must look upon this "as a matter of chance." For this reason he says (De Verb. Dom. xvi, 1)⁴ that "Our Lord warns us not to be listless in regard of one another's sins; not indeed by being on the look out for something to denounce, but by correcting what we see"; otherwise we should become spies on the lives of others, which is against the saying of Prov. 24, 15: Lie not in wait, nor seek after wickedness in the house of the just, nor spoil his rest. It is evident from this that there is no need for religious to leave their cloister in order to rebuke evil-doers.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Fraternal Correction Belongs Only to Prelates?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that fraternal correction belongs to prelates alone.

Objection 1. For Jerome says (cf. Origen, Hom. vii in Jos.)⁵ to let priests endeavour to fulfil this saying of the Gospel: "If thy brother sin against thee," etc. Now prelates having charge of others were usually designated under the name of priests. Therefore it seems that fraternal correction belongs to prelates alone.

Obj. 2. Further, Fraternal correction is a spiritual alms. Now corporal almsgiving belongs to those who are placed above others in temporal matters, that is, to the rich. Therefore fraternal correction belongs to those who are placed above others in spiritual matters, that is, to prelates.

Obj. 3. Further, When one man reproves another he moves him by his rebuke to something better. Now in natural things the inferior is moved by the superior. Therefore in the order of virtue also, which follows the order of nature, it belongs to prelates alone to correct inferiors.

On the contrary, It is written (xxiv. q. iiii. can. Tam Sacerdotes):¹ "Both priests and all the rest of the faithful should be most solicitous for those who perish, so that their reproof may either correct their sinful ways, or, if they be incorrigible, cut them off from the Church."

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1), correction is twofold. One is an act of charity, which seeks in a special way the recovery of an erring brother by means of a simple warning. And such correction belongs to anyone who has charity, be he subject or prelate. But there is another correction which is an act of justice purposing the common good, which is procured not only by warning one's brother, but also, sometimes, by punishing him, that others may, through fear, desist from sin. Such a correction belongs only to prelates, whose business it is not only to admonish, but also to correct by means of punishments.

Reply Obj. 1. Every one regards that fraternal correction which is common to all, prelates have a more grave responsibility, as Augustine says;² for just as a man ought to bestow temporal favours on those especially of whom he has temporal care, so too ought he to confer spiritual favours, such as correction, teaching and the like, on those who are entrusted to his spiritual care. Therefore Jerome does not mean that the precept of fraternal correction concerns priests only, but that it concerns them in a special way.

Reply Obj. 2. Just as he who has the means with which to give corporal assistance is rich in this respect, so he whose reason is gifted with a sane judgment, so as to be able to correct another's wrong-doing, is, in this respect, to be looked on as a superior.

Reply Obj. 3. Even in the physical order certain things act mutually on one another, through being in some respect higher than one another, in so far as each is somewhat in act, and somewhat in potency with regard to another. In like manner one man can correct another in so far as he has a sane judgment in a matter in which the other is lacking, though he is not his superior absolutely.

ARTICLE 4. Whether a Man Is Bound To Correct His Prelate?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that no man is bound to correct his prelate.

Objection 1. For it is written (Exod. 19. 12): The beast that shall touch the mount shall be stoned (Vulg.,—Everyone that shall touch the mount, dying he shall die.), and (II Kings 6. 7) it is related that the Lord struck Oza for touching the ark. Now the mount and the ark signify our prelates. Therefore prelates should not be corrected by their subjects.

Obj. 2. Further, A gloss on Gal. 2. 11, I withstood him to the face, adds: "as an equal."³ Therefore, since a subject is not equal to his prelate, he ought not to correct him.

Obj. 3. Further, Gregory says (Moral. xxiii)⁴ that "one ought not to presume to reprove the conduct of holy men, unless one thinks better of oneself." But one ought not to think better of oneself than of one's prelate. Therefore one ought not to correct one's prelate.

On the contrary, Augustine says in his Rule:⁵ "Show mercy not only to yourselves, but also to him who (that is, prelates), being in the higher position among you, is therefore in greater danger." But fraternal correction is a work of mercy. Therefore prelates also ought to be corrected.

I answer that, A subject is not able to administer to his prelate the correction which is an act of justice through the coercive nature of punishment; but the fraternal correction which is an act of charity pertains to everyone in respect of any person towards whom he is bound by charity, provided there be something in that person which requires correction. Now an act which proceeds from a habit or power extends to whatever is contained under the object of that power or habit; thus vision extends to all things comprised in the object of sight. Since, however, a virtuous act needs to be moderated by due circumstances, it follows that when a subject corrects his prelate, he ought to do so in a becoming manner, not with impudence and harshness, but with gentleness and respect. Hence the Apostle says (I Tim. 5. 1): An ancient man rebuke not, but entreat him as a father. Hence Dionysius finds fault with the monk Demophilus⁶ for rebuking a priest with insolence, by striking and turning him out of the church.

Reply Obj. 1. It would seem that a subject touches his prelate inordinately when he upbraids him with insolence, as also when he speaks ill of him; and this is signified by God's condemnation of those who touched the mount and the ark.

Reply Obj. 2. To withstand anyone in public exceeds the mode of fraternal correction, and so Paul would not have withstood Peter then, unless he were in some special way his equal as regards the defence of the faith. But even one who is not an equal can reprove privately and respectfully. Hence the Apostle in writing to the Colossians (4. 17) tells them to admonish their prelate: *Say to Archippus: Fulfil thy ministry.*¹ It must be observed, however, that if the faith were endangered, a subject ought to rebuke his prelate even publicly. Hence Paul, who was under Peter, rebuked him in public, on account of the imminent danger of scandal concerning faith, and, as the gloss of Augustine says² on Gal. 2. 11, "Peter gave an example to superiors that if at any time they should happen to stray from the straight path, they should not disdain to be reproved by their subjects."

Reply Obj. 3. To presume oneself to be better absolutely than one's prelate, would seem to be presumptuous pride; but there is no presumption in thinking oneself better in some respect, because, in this life no man is without some fault. We must also remember that when a man reproves his prelate charitably, it does not follow that he thinks himself any better, but merely that he offers his help to one who, "being in the higher position among you, is therefore in greater danger," as Augustine observes in his Rule quoted above.

ARTICLE 5. Whether a Sinner Ought To Reprove a Wrongdoer?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that a sinner ought to reprove a wrongdoer.

Objection 1. For no man is excused from obeying a precept by having committed a sin. But fraternal correction is a matter of precept, as stated above (A. 2). Therefore it seems that a man ought not to forbear from such correction for the reason that he has committed a sin.

Obj. 2. Further, Spiritual almsdeeds are of more account than corporal almsdeeds. Now one who is in sin ought not to abstain from administering corporal alms. Much less therefore ought he, on account of a previous sin, to refrain from correcting wrongdoers.

Obj. 3. Further, It is written (I John 1. 8):

¹ Vulg.,—Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfil it. Cf. II Tim. 4. 5.

² Glossa ordin. (vi, 81B); Glossa Lombardi (PL 192, 109); cf. Augustine, Epist., LXXXII, 2 (PL 33, 278).

If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves. Therefore if, on account of a sin, a man is hindered from reproof his brother, there will be none to reprove the wrongdoer. But the latter proposition is unreasonable, and so therefore is the former also.

On the contrary, Isidore says (De Summo Bono, iii):³ "He that is subject to vice should not correct the vices of others." Again it is written (Rom. 2. 1): Wherein thou judgest another, thou condemnest thyself. For thou dost the same things which thou judgest.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 3, Reply 2), to correct a wrongdoer belongs to a man, in so far as his reason is gifted with right judgment. Now sin, as stated above (Part I-II, q. LXXXV, A. 2), does not destroy the good of nature so as to deprive the sinner's reason of all right judgment, and in this respect he may be competent to find fault with others for committing sin. Nevertheless a previous sin proves somewhat of a hindrance to this correction, for three reasons. First because this previous sin renders a man unworthy to rebuke another; and especially is he unworthy to correct another for a lesser sin, if he himself has committed a greater. Hence Jerome says on the words, Why seest thou the mote? etc. (Matt. 7. 3): "He is speaking of those who, while they are themselves guilty of mortal sin, have no patience with the lesser sins of their brethren."⁴

Secondly, such correction becomes unfitting on account of the scandal which ensues if the corrector's sin be well known, because it would seem that he corrects, not out of charity, but more for the sake of ostentation. Hence the words of Matt. 7. 4, How sayest thou to thy brother? etc. are expounded by Chrysostom thus:⁵ "That is,—'With what object?' Out of charity, think you, that you may save your neighbour? No, because you would look after your own salvation first. What you want is, not to save others, but to hide your evil deeds with good teaching, and to seek to be praised by men for your knowledge."

Thirdly, on account of the rebuker's pride; when, for instance, a man thinks lightly of his own sins, and, in his own heart, sets himself above his neighbour, judging the latter's sins with harsh severity, as though he himself were a just man. Hence Augustine says (De Serm. Dom. in Monte, ii, 19):⁶ "To reprove the faults of others is the duty of good and kindly men; when a wicked man rebukes anyone, his rebuke is the latter's acquittal." And so, as Augustine says (ibid.): "When we have to find fault with anyone, we should think whether we were never guilty of his sin; and then we must remember that we are men, and might have been guilty of it; or that we once had it on our conscience, but have it no longer; and then we should be-think ourselves that we are all weak, in order that our reproof may be the outcome, not of hatred, but of pity. But if we find that we are guilty of the same sin, we must not rebuke him, but groan with him, and invite him to repent with us."

It appears from this that, if a sinner reprove a wrongdoer with humility, he does not sin, nor does he bring a further condemnation on himself, although thereby he proves himself deserving of condemnation, either in his brother's or in his own conscience, on account of his previous sin.

Hence the Replies to the Objections are clear.

ARTICLE 6 Whether One Ought To Forbear From Correcting Someone, Through Fear Lest He Become Worse?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that one ought not to forbear from correcting someone through fear lest he become worse.

Objection 1. For sin is weakness of the soul, according to Ps. 6. 3: Have mercy on me, O Lord, for I am weak. Now he that has charge of a sick person, must not cease to take care of him, even if he be fractious or contemptuous, because then the danger is greater, as in the case of madmen. Much more, therefore should one correct a sinner, no matter how badly he takes it.

Obj. 2. Further, According to Jerome vital truths are not to be foregone on account of scandal.¹ Now God's commandments are vital truths. Since, therefore, fraternal correction is a matter of precept, as stated above (A. 2), it seems that it should not be foregone for fear of scandalizing the person to be corrected.

Obj. 3. Further, According to the Apostle (Rom. 3. 8) we should not do evil that good may come of it. Therefore, in like manner, good should not be omitted lest evil befall. Now fraternal correction is a good thing. Therefore it should not be omitted for fear lest the person corrected become worse.

On the contrary It is written (Prov 9. 8): Rebuke not a scorner lest he hate thee, where a gloss remarks:² "You must not fear lest the scorner insult you when you rebuke him: rather should you bear in mind that by making him hate you, you may make him worse." Therefore one ought to forego fraternal correction, when we fear lest we may make a man worse.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 3) the correction of the wrongdoer is twofold. One, which belongs to prelates, and is directed to the common good, has coercive force. Such correction should not be omitted for fear that the person corrected be disturbed, both because if he is unwilling to amend his ways of his own accord he should be made to cease sinning by being punished, and because, if he be incorrigible, the common good is safeguarded in this way, since the order of justice is observed, and others are deterred by one being made an example of. Hence a judge does not forbear from pronouncing sentence of condemnation against a sinner for fear of disturbing him or his friends.

The other fraternal correction is directed to the amendment of the wrongdoer, whom it does not coerce, but merely admonishes. Consequently when it is thought probable that the sinner will not take the warning, and will become worse, such fraternal correction should be foregone, because the means should be regulated according to the requirements of the end.

Reply Obj. 1 The doctor uses force towards a madman who is unwilling to submit to his treatment; and this may be compared with the correction administered by prelates, which has coercive power, but not with simple fraternal correction.

Reply Obj. 2 Fraternal correction is a matter of precept in so far as it is an act of virtue, and it will be a virtuous act in so far as it is proportionate to the end. Consequently whenever it is a hindrance to the end, for instance when a man becomes worse through it, it is no longer a vital truth, nor is it a matter of precept.

Reply Obj. 3 Whatever is directed to an end becomes good through being directed to the end. Hence whenever fraternal correction hinders the end, namely the amendment of our brother, it is no longer good, so that when such a correction is omitted, good is not omitted lest evil should befall.

ARTICLE 7. Whether the Precept of Fraternal Correction Demands That a Private Admonition Should Precede Denunciation?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It would seem that the precept of fraternal correction does not demand that a private admonition should precede denunciation.

Objection 1. For, in works of charity, we should above all follow the example of God, according to Eph. 5. 1, 2: Be ye followers of God, as most dear children, and walk in love. Now God sometimes punishes a man for a sin, without previously warning him in secret. Therefore it seems that there is no need for a private admonition to precede denunciation.

Obj. 2. Further, According to Augustine (De Mendacio, xv),¹ "we learn from the deeds of holy men how we ought to understand the commandments of Holy Writ." Now among the deeds of holy men we find that a hidden sin is publicly denounced, without any previous admonition in private. Thus we read (Gen 37 2) that Joseph accused his brethren to his father of a most wicked crime; and (Acts 5. 4, 9) that Peter publicly denounced Ananias and Saphira who had secretly by fraud kept back the price of the land, without beforehand admonishing them in private; nor do we read that Our Lord admonished Judas in secret before denouncing him. Therefore the precept does not require that secret admonition should precede public denunciation.

Obj. 3. Further, It is a graver matter to accuse than to denounce. Now one may go to the length of accusing a person publicly, without previously admonishing him in secret; for it is decided in the Decretal (Cap. Qualiter, De Accusationibus)² that "nothing else need precede accusation except inscription."³ Therefore it seems that the precept does not require that a secret admonition should precede public denunciation.

Obj. 4. Further, It does not seem probable that the customs observed by religious in general are contrary to the precepts of Christ. Now it is customary among religious orders to proclaim in chapter this or that one for a fault, without any previous secret admonition. Therefore it seems that this admonition is not required by the precept.

Obj. 5. Further, Religious are bound to obey their prelates. Now a prelate sometimes commands either all in general, or someone in particular, to tell him if they know of anything that requires correction. Therefore it would seem that they are bound to tell them this, even before any secret admonition. Therefore the precept does not require secret admonition before public denunciation.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Verb. Dom xvi)⁴ on the words, Rebuke him between thee and him alone (Matt. 18. 15): "Aiming at his amendment, while avoiding his disgrace. For perhaps from shame he might begin to defend his sin; and him whom you thought to make a better man, you make worse." Now we are bound by the precept of charity to beware lest our brother become worse. Therefore the order of fraternal correction comes under the precept.

I answer that, With regard to the public denunciation of sins it is necessary to make a distinction, because sins may be either public or secret. In the case of public sins, a remedy is required not only for the sinner, that he may become better, but also for others, who know of his sin, lest they be scandalized. Therefore such sins should be denounced in public, according to the saying of the Apostle (1 Tim. 5. 20). Them that sin reprove before all, that the rest also may have fear, which is to be understood as referring to public sins, as Augustine states (De Verb. Dom.)⁵

On the other hand, in the case of secret sins, the words of Our Lord seem to apply (Matt. 18. 15): If thy brother shall offend against thee, etc. For if he offend thee publicly in the presence of others, he no longer sins against thee alone, but also against others whom he disturbs. Since, however, a man's neighbour may take offence even at his secret sins, it seems that we must make yet a further distinction. For certain secret sins are hurtful to our neighbour either in his body or in his soul, as, for instance, when a man plots secretly to betray his country to its enemies, or when a heretic secretly turns other men away from the faith. And since he that sins thus in secret, sins not only against you in particular, but also against others, it is necessary to take steps to denounce him at once, in order to prevent him doing such harm, unless by chance you were firmly persuaded

On the other hand there are other sins which injure none but the sinner, and the person sinned against, either because he alone is hurt by the sinner, or at least because he alone knows about his sin, and then our one purpose should be to succour our sinning brother; and just as the physician of the body restores the sick man to health, if possible, without cutting off a limb, but, if this be unavoidable, cuts off a limb which is least indispensable, in order to preserve the life of the whole body, so too he who desires his brother's amendment should, if possible, so amend him as regards his conscience that he keep his good name.

For a good name is useful, first of all to the sinner himself, not only in temporal matters, wherein a man suffers many losses if he lose his good name, but also in spiritual matters, because many are restrained from sinning through fear of dishonour, so that when a man finds his good name lost, he puts no curb on his sinning. Hence Jerome says¹ on Matt. 18. 15: "If he sin against thee, thou shouldst rebuke him in private, lest he persist in his sin if he should once become shameless or unabashed." Secondly, we ought to safeguard our sinning brother's good name, first because the dishonour of one leads to the dishonour of others, according to the saying of Augustine (Ep. ad pleb. Hipponeus. lxxviii):² "When a few of those who bear a name for holiness are reported falsely or proved in truth to have done anything wrong, people will seek by busily repeating it to make it believed of all"; and also when one man's sin is made public others are incited to sin likewise.

Since, however, one's conscience should be preferred to a good name, Our Lord wished that we should publicly denounce our brother and so deliver his conscience from sin, even though he should forfeit his good name. Therefore it is evident that the precept may require a secret admonition to precede public denunciation.

Reply Obj. 1. Whatever is hidden, is known to God, and so hidden sins are to the judgment of God just what public sins are to the judgment of man. Nevertheless God does rebuke sinners often by secretly admonishing them, so to speak, with an inward inspiration, either while they wake or while they sleep, according to Job 33. 15-37: By a dream in a vision by night, when deep sleep falleth upon men . . . then He openeth the ears of men, and teaching instruct- eth them in what they are to learn, that He may withdraw a man from the things he is doing.

Reply Obj. 2. Our Lord as God knew the sin of Judas as though it were public, and so He could have made it known at once. Yet He did not, but warned Judas of his sin in words that were obscure. The sin of Ananias and Saphira was denounced by Peter acting for God, by Whose revelation he knew of their sin. With regard to Joseph it is probable that he warned his brethren, though Scripture does not say so. Or we may say that the sin was public with regard to his brethren, and so it is stated in the plural that he accused his brethren.

Reply Obj. 3. When there is danger to a great number of people, those words of Our Lord do not apply, because then your brother does not sin against you alone.

Reply Obj. 4. Proclamations made in the chapter of religious are about little faults which do not affect a man's good name. Hence they are reminders of forgotten faults rather than accusations or denunciations. If, however, they should be of such a nature as to injure our brother's good name, it would be contrary to Our Lord's precept to denounce a brother's fault in this manner.

Reply Obj. 5. A prelate is not to be obeyed contrary to a Divine precept, according to Acts 5. 29: We ought to obey God rather than men. Therefore when a prelate commands anyone to tell him anything that he knows to need correction, the command rightly understood supports the safeguarding of the order of fraternal correction, whether the command be addressed to all in general, or to some particular individual. If, on the other hand, a prelate were to issue a command in express opposition to this order instituted by Our Lord, both would sin, the one commanding, and the one obeying him, as disobeying Our Lord's command. Consequently he ought not to be obeyed, because a prelate is not the judge of secret things, but God alone is; hence he has no power to command anything in respect of hidden matters, except in so far as they are made known through certain signs, as by ill repute or suspicion; in which case a prelate can command just as a judge, whether secular or ecclesiastical, can bind a man under oath to tell the truth.

ARTICLE 8. Whether Before the Public Denunciation Witnesses Ought To Be Brought Forward?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It seems that before the public denunciation witnesses ought not to be brought forward.

Objection 1. For secret sins ought not to be made known to others, because by so doing a man would betray his brother's sins instead of correcting them, as Augustine says (De Verb. Dom. xvi).¹ Now by bringing forward witnesses one makes known a brother's sin to others. Therefore in the case of secret sins one ought not to bring witnesses forward before the public denunciation.

Obj. 2. Further, Man should love his neighbour as himself. Now no man brings in witnesses to prove his own secret sin. Neither therefore ought one to bring forward witnesses to prove the secret sin of our brother.

Obj. 3. Further, Witnesses are brought forward to prove something. But witnesses afford no proof in secret matters. Therefore it is useless to bring witnesses forward in such cases.

Obj. 4. Further, Augustine says in his Rule that "before bringing it to the notice of witnesses . . . it should be put before the superior"² Now to bring a matter before a superior or a prelate is to tell the Church. Therefore witnesses should not be brought forward before the public denunciation.

On the contrary, Our Lord said (Matt. 18. 16): Take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two, etc.

I answer that, The right way to go from one extreme to another is to pass through the middle space. Now Our Lord wished the beginning of fraternal correction to be hidden, when one brother corrects another between this one and himself alone, while He wished the end to be public, when such a one would be denounced to the Church. Consequently it is befitting that witnesses should be brought between the two extremes, so that at first the brother's sin be indicated to a few, who will be of use without being a hindrance, and thus his sin be amended without dishonouring him before the public.

Reply Obj. 1. Some have understood the order of fraternal correction to demand that we should first of all rebuke our brother secretly, and that if he listens, it is well; but if he listen not, and his sin be altogether hidden, they say that we should go no further in the matter, but if it has already begun to reach the notice of several by various signs, we ought to proceed further, according to Our Lord's command.³ But this is contrary to what Augustine says in his rule⁴ that we are bound to reveal a brother's sin,

"lest it cause corruption in the heart." Therefore we must say otherwise that when the secret admonition has been given once or several times, as long as there is probable hope of his amendment, we must continue to admonish him in private, but as soon as we are able to judge with any probability that the secret admonition is of no avail, we must take further steps, however secret the sin may be, and call witnesses, unless perhaps it were thought probable that this would not conduce to our brother's amendment, and that he would become worse; because on that account one ought to abstain altogether from correcting him, as stated above (A. 6).

Reply Obj. 2. A man needs no witnesses that he may amend his own sin; yet they may be necessary that we may amend a brother's sin. Hence the comparison fails.

Reply Obj. 3. There may be three reasons for bringing in witnesses. First, to show that the deed in question is a sin, as Jerome says;⁵ secondly, to prove that the deed was done, if it is repeated, as Augustine says (loc. cit.); thirdly, to prove that the man who rebuked his brother has done what he could, as Chrysostom says (Hom. in Matt. lx).⁶

Reply Obj. 4. Augustine means that the matter ought to be made known to the prelate before it is stated to the witnesses, in so far as the prelate is a private individual who is able to be of more use than others, but not that it is to be told him as to the Church, that is, as holding the position of judge.

QUESTION XXXIV

OF HATRED

(In Six Articles)

WE must now consider the vices opposed to charity: (1) hatred, which is opposed to love; (2) acedia and envy, which are opposed to the joy of charity (Q. xxxv); (3) discord and schism, which are contrary to peace (Q. xxxvii); (4) offence and scandal, which are contrary to beneficence and fraternal correction (Q. xliii).

Under the first head there are six points of inquiry: (1) Whether it is possible to hate God? (2) Whether hatred of God is the greatest of sins? (3) Whether hatred of one's neighbour is always a sin? (4) Whether it is the greatest of all sins against our neighbour? (5) Whether it is a capital sin? (6) From what capital sin does it arise?

ARTICLE 1. Whether It Is Possible for Anyone To Hate God?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that no man can hate God.

Objection 1. For Dionysius says (Div. Nom. iv)¹ that "the first good and beautiful is an object of love and dilection to all." But good is goodness and beauty itself. Therefore He is hated by none.

Obj. 2. Further, In the Apocryphal books of Esdras (3. 4., 36, 39) it is written that all things call upon truth . . . and (all men) do well like of her works. Now God is the very truth according to John 14. 6. Therefore all love God, and none can hate Him.

Obj. 3. Further, Hatred is a kind of aversion. But according to Dionysius (Div. Nom. i)² God draws all things to Himself. Therefore none can hate Him.

On the contrary, It is written (Ps. 73. 23): The pride of them that hate Thee ascendeth continually, and (John 15. 24): But now they have both seen and hated both Me and My Father.

I answer that, As shown above (Part I-II, Q. XXIX, A. 1), hatred is a movement of the appetitive power, which power is not set in motion save by something apprehended. Now God can be apprehended by man in two ways: first, in Himself, as when He is seen in His Essence; secondly, in His effects, when, that is, the invisible things of God . . . are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made (Rom. 1. 20). Now God in His Essence is goodness itself, which no man can hate—for it is of the character of good to be loved. Hence it is impossible for one who sees God in His Essence, to hate Him.

Moreover some of His effects are such that they can in no way be contrary to the human will, since to be, to live, to understand, which are effects of God, are desirable and lovable to all. Therefore again God cannot be an object of hatred if we consider Him as the Author of such effects. Some of God's effects, however, are contrary to a disordered will, such as the infliction of punishment, and the prohibition of sin by the Divine Law. Such effects are repugnant to a will debased by sin, and as regards the consideration of them God may be an object of hatred to some, in so far as they look upon Him as forbidding sin, and inflicting punishment.

Reply Obj. 1. This argument is true of those who see God's Essence, which is the very essence of goodness.

Reply Obj. 2. This argument is true in so far as God is apprehended as the cause of such effects as are naturally loved of all, among which are the works of Truth who reveals herself to men.

Reply Obj. 3. God draws all things to Himself, in so far as He is the source of being, since all things, in as much as they are, tend to be like God, Who is Being itself.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Hatred of God Is the Greatest of Sins?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that hatred of God is not the greatest of sins.

Objection 1. For the most grievous sin is the sin against the Holy Ghost, since it cannot be forgiven, according to Matt. 12. 32. Now hatred of God is not counted among the various kinds of sin against the Holy Ghost, as may be seen from what has been said above (Q. XIV, A. 2). Therefore hatred of God is not the most grievous sin.

Obj. 2. Further. Sin consists in withdrawing oneself from God. Now an unbeliever who has not even knowledge of God seems to be further away from Him than a believer, who though he hate God, nevertheless knows Him. Therefore it seems that the sin of unbelief is graver than the sin of hatred against God.

Obj. 3. Further, God is an object of hatred only by reason of those of His effects that are contrary to the will, the chief of which is punishment. But hatred of punishment is not the most grievous sin. Therefore hatred of God is not the most grievous sin.

On the contrary, "The best is opposite to the worst," according to the Philosopher.³ But hatred of God is opposed to the love of God, in which man's best consists. Therefore hatred of God is man's worst sin.

I answer that, That the defect in sin consists in its turning away from God, as stated above (Q. X, A. 3), and this turning away would not have the character of guilt, were it not voluntary. Hence the nature of guilt consists in a voluntary turning away from God.

Now this voluntary turning away from God is directly implied in the hatred of God, but in other sins, by participation and relatively. For just as the will cleaves directly to what it loves, so does it directly shun what it hates. Hence when a man hates God, his will is directly turned away from God, while in other sins, fornication for instance, a man turns away from God, not directly but indirectly, in so far, namely, as he desires an inordinate pleasure, to which turning away from God is connected. Now that which is so by itself always takes precedence of that which is so by another. Therefore hatred of God is more grievous than other sins.

Reply Obj. 1. According to Gregory (Moral. xxv. 11),¹ "it is one thing not to do good things, and another to hate the giver of good things, even as it is one thing to sin without deliberation and another to sin deliberately." This implies that to hate God, the giver of all good things, is to sin deliberately, and this is a sin against the Holy Ghost. Hence it is evident that hatred of God is chiefly a sin against the Holy Ghost, in so far as the sin against the Holy Ghost denotes a special kind of sin. And yet it is not reckoned among the kinds of sin against the Holy Ghost because it is found generally in every species of that sin.

Reply Obj. 2. Even unbelief is not sinful unless it be voluntary; and therefore the more voluntary it is, the more it is sinful. Now it becomes voluntary by the fact that a man hates the truth that is proposed to him. Therefore it is evident that unbelief derives sinfulness from hatred of God, Whose truth is the object of faith; and hence just as a cause is greater than its effect, so hatred of God is a greater sin than unbelief.

Reply Obj. 3. Not everyone who hates his punishment, hates God the author of punishments. For many hate the punishments inflicted on them, and yet they bear them patiently out of reverence for the Divine justice. Therefore Augustine says² that God commands us to bear with penal evils, not to love them. On the other hand, to break out into hatred of God when He inflicts those punishments is to hate God's very justice, and that is a most grievous sin. Hence Gregory says (Moral. xxv, loc cit.): "Even as sometimes it is more grievous to love sin than to do it, so is it more wicked to hate justice than not to have done it."

ARTICLE 3. Whether Hatred of One's Neighbour Is Always a Sin?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that hatred of one's neighbour is not always a sin.

Objection 1. For no sin is commanded or counselled by the law of God, according to Prov. 8. 8: All my words are just, there is nothing wicked nor perverse in them. Now, it is written (Luke 14. 26): If any man come to Me, and hate not his father and mother . . . he cannot be My disciple. Therefore hatred of one's neighbour is not always a sin.

Obj. 2. Further, Nothing wherein we imitate God can be a sin. But it is in imitation of God that we hate certain people; for it is written (Rom. 1. 30): Detractors, hateful to God. Therefore it is possible to hate certain people without committing a sin.

Obj. 3. Further, Nothing that is natural is a sin, for sin is a wandering away from what is according to nature, according to Damascene (De Fide Orthod. ii).³ Now it is natural to a thing to hate whatever is contrary to it, and to aim at its undoing. Therefore it seems that it is not a sin to hate one's enemy.

On the contrary, It is written (I John 2. 9): He that . . . hateth his brother, is in darkness. Now spiritual darkness is sin. Therefore there cannot be hatred of one's neighbour without sin.

I answer that, Hatred is opposed to love, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XXIX. AA. 1, 2); so that hatred of a thing is evil according as the love of that thing is good. Now love is due to our neighbour in respect of what he holds from God, that is, in respect of nature and grace, but not in respect of what he has of himself and from the devil, that is, in respect of sin and lack of justice. Consequently it is lawful to hate the sin in one's brother, and whatever pertains to the defect of Divine justice, but we cannot hate our brother's nature and grace without sin. Now it is part of our love for our brother that we hate the fault and the lack of good in him, since desire for another's good is equivalent to hatred of his evil. Consequently the hatred of one's brother, if we consider it absolutely, is always sinful.

Reply Obj. 1. By the commandment of God (Exod. 20. 12) we must honour our parents—as united to us in nature and kinship. But we must hate them in so far as they prove an obstacle to our attaining the perfection of Divine justice.

Reply Obj. 2. God hates the sin which is in the detractor, not his nature. And so we can hate detractors without committing a sin.

Reply Obj. 3. Men are not opposed to us in respect of the goods which they have received from God; therefore, in this respect, we should love them. But they are opposed to us in so far as they show hostility towards us, and this is sinful in them. In this respect we should hate them, for we should hate in them the fact that they are hostile to us.

ARTICLE 4. Whether Hatred of Our Neighbour Is the Most Grievous Sin against Our Neighbour?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that hatred of our neighbour is the most grievous sin against our neighbour.

Objection 1. For it is written (1 John 3. 15): Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer. Now murder is the most grievous of sins against our neighbour. Therefore hatred is also.

Obj. 2. Further, Worst is opposed to best. Now the best thing we give our neighbour is love, since all other things come back to love. Therefore hatred is the worst.

On the contrary, A thing is said to be evil, "because it hurts," as Augustine observes (Enchir. xii).¹ Now there are sins by which a man hurts his neighbour more than by hatred, for instance, theft, murder and adultery. Therefore hatred is not the most grievous sin.

Moreover, Chrysostom commenting on Matt. 5. 19, *He that shall break one of these least commandments, says:*² "The commandments of Moses, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not commit adultery, count for little in their reward, but they count for much if they be disobeyed. On the other hand the commandments of Christ such as, Thou shalt not be angry, Thou shalt not desire, are great in their reward, but little in the transgression." Now hatred is an internal movement like anger and concupiscence. Therefore hatred of one's brother is a less grievous sin than murder.

I answer that, Sins committed against our neighbour are evil on two counts: first by reason of the disorder in the person who sins, secondly by reason of the hurt inflicted on the person sinned against. On the first count, hatred is a more grievous sin than external actions that hurt our neighbour, because hatred is a disorder of man's will, which is the chief part of man, and in which is the root of sin, so that if a man's outward actions were to be inordinate, without any disorder in his will, they would not be sinful; for instance, if he were to kill a man through ignorance or out of zeal for justice. And if there be anything sinful in a man's outward sins against his neighbour, it is all to be traced to his inward hatred. On the other hand, as regards the hurt inflicted on his neighbour, a man's outward sins are worse than his inward hatred.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

ARTICLE 5. Whether Hatred Is a Capital Sin?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It seems that hatred is a capital sin.

Objection 1. For hatred is directly opposed to charity. Now charity is the foremost among the virtues, and the mother of all others. Therefore hatred is the chief of the capital sins, and the origin of all others.

Obj. 2. Further, Sins arise in us on account of the inclinations of our passions, according to Rom. 7. 5: The passions of sins . . . did work in our members, to bring forth fruit unto death. Now all other passions of the soul seem to arise from love and hatred, as was shown above (Part I-II, Q. XXVII, A. 4; Q. XXVIII, A. 6, reply 2). Therefore hatred should be put among the capital sins.

Obj. 3. Further, Vice is a moral evil. Now hatred regards evil more than any other passion does. Therefore it seems that hatred should be reckoned a capital sin.

On the contrary, Gregory (Moral. xxxi, 45)³ does not number hatred among the seven capital sins.

I answer that, As stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXXXIV, AA. 3, 4), a capital vice is one from which other vices arise most frequently. Now vice is contrary to man's nature, in so far as he is a rational animal; and when a thing acts contrary to its nature, that which is natural to it is corrupted little by little. Consequently it must first of all fail in that which is less in accordance with its nature, and last of all in that which is most in accordance with its nature, since what is first in construction is last in destruction. Now that which, first and foremost, is most natural to man, is the love of what is good, and especially love of the Divine good, and of his neighbour's good. Therefore hatred, which is opposed to this love, is not the first but the last thing in the downfall of virtue resulting from vice; and therefore it is not a capital vice.

Reply Obj. 1. As stated in the Physics,⁴ "the virtue of a thing consists in its being well disposed in accordance with its nature." Hence what is first and foremost in the virtues must be first and foremost in the natural order. Hence charity is put among the foremost of the virtues, and for the same reason hatred cannot be first among the vices, as stated above.

Reply Obj. 2. Hatred of the evil that is contrary to one's natural good is the first of the soul's passions, even as love of one's natural good is. But hatred of one's connatural good cannot be first, but is something last, because such hatred is a proof of an already corrupted nature, even as love of an extraneous good.

Reply Obj. 3. Evil is twofold. One is a true evil, for the reason that it is incompatible with one's natural good, and the hatred of such an evil may have priority over the other passions. There is, however, another which is not a true, but an apparent evil, which, namely, is a true and connatural good, and yet is reckoned evil on account of the corruption of nature; and the hatred of such an evil must come last. This hatred is vicious, but the former is not.

ARTICLE 6. Whether Hatred Arises From Envy?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It seems that hatred does not arise from envy.

Objection 1. For envy is sorrow for another's good. Now hatred does not arise from sorrow, for, on the contrary, we grieve for the presence of the evil we hate. Therefore hatred does not arise from envy.

Obj. 2. Further, Hatred is opposed to love. Now love of our neighbour is referred to our love of God, as stated above (Q. XXV, A. 1; Q. XXVI, A. 2). Therefore hatred of our neighbour is referred to our hatred of God. But hatred of God does not arise from envy, for we do not envy those who are very far removed from us, but rather those who seem to be near us, as the Philosopher states.¹ Therefore hatred does not arise from envy.

Obj. 3. Further, To one effect there is one cause. Now hatred is caused by anger, for Augustine says in his Rule² that "anger grows into hatred." Therefore hatred does not arise from envy.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Moral. xxxi, 45)³ that "out of envy cometh hatred."

I answer that, As stated above (A. 5), hatred of his neighbour is a man's last step in the path of sin, because it is opposed to the love which he naturally has for his neighbour. Now if a man declines from that which is natural, it is because he intends to avoid that which is naturally an object to be shunned. Now every animal naturally avoids sorrow, just as it desires pleasure, as the Philosopher states.⁴ Accordingly just as love arises from pleasure, so does hatred arise from sorrow. For just as we are moved to love whatever gives us pleasure, because for that very reason it assumes the aspect of good, so we are moved to hate whatever displeases us, in so far as for this reason it assumes the aspect of evil. Therefore, since envy is sorrow for our neighbour's good, it follows that our neighbour's good becomes hateful to us, so that out of envy hatred arises.

Reply Obj. 1. Since the appetitive power, like the apprehensive power, reflects on its own acts, it follows that there is a kind of circular movement in the actions of the appetitive power. And so according to the first forward course of the appetitive movement, love gives rise to desire, from which follows pleasure when one has obtained what one desired. And since the very fact of taking pleasure in the good one loves has the aspect of good, it follows that pleasure causes love. And in the same way sorrow causes hatred.

Reply Obj. 2. Love and hatred have different aspects, for the object of love is good, which flows from God to creatures, and so love is due to God in the first place, and to our neighbour afterwards. On the other hand, hatred is of evil, which has no place in God Himself, but only in His effects, for which reason it has been stated above (A. 1), that God is not an object of hatred, except in so far as He is considered in relation to His effects, and consequently hatred is directed to our neighbour before being directed to God. Therefore, since envy of our neighbour is the mother of hatred of our neighbour, it becomes, in consequence, the cause of hatred towards God.

Reply Obj. 3. Nothing prevents a thing arising from various causes in various respects, and accordingly hatred may arise both from anger and from envy. However it arises more directly from envy, which looks upon the very good of our neighbour as displeasing and therefore hateful, while hatred arises from anger by way of increase. For at first, through anger, we desire our neighbour's evil according to a certain measure, that is in so far as that evil has the aspect of vengeance; but afterwards, through the continuance of anger, man goes so far as absolutely to desire his neighbour's evil, which desire is part of hatred. Hence it is evident that hatred is caused by envy formally as regards the aspect of the object, but dispositively by anger.

vine good, and then its contrary is acedia,¹ or about our neighbour's good, and then its contrary is envy. Therefore we must consider (1) Acedia and (2) Envy (Q. xxxvi).

Under the first head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether acedia is a sin? (2) Whether it is a special vice? (3) Whether it is a mortal sin? (4) Whether it is a capital sin?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Acedia Is a Sin?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that acedia is not a sin.

Objection 1. For we are neither praised nor blamed for our passions, according to the Philosopher.² Now acedia is a passion, since it is a kind of sorrow, according to Damascene (De Fide Orthod. ii),³ and as we stated above (Part I-II, Q. xxxv, A. 8). Therefore acedia is not a sin.

Obj. 2. Further, No bodily failing that occurs at fixed times is a sin. But acedia is like this, for Cassian says (De Instit. Monast. x):⁴ "The monk is troubled with acedia chiefly about the sixth hour; it is like an intermittent fever, and inflicts the soul of the one it lays low with burning fires at regular and fixed intervals." Therefore acedia is not a sin.

Obj. 3. Further, That which proceeds from a good root does not seem to be a sin. Now acedia proceeds from a good root, for Cassian says⁵ that acedia arises from the fact that "we sigh at being deprived of spiritual fruit, and think that other monasteries and those which are a long way off are much better than the one we dwell in"; all of which seems to point to humility. Therefore acedia is not a sin.

Obj. 4. Further, All sin is to be avoided, according to Ecclus. 21. 2: Flee from sins as from the face of a serpent. Now Cassian says:⁶ "Experience shows that the onslaught of acedia is not to be evaded by flight but to be conquered by resistance." Therefore acedia is not a sin.

On the contrary, Whatever is forbidden in Holy Writ is a sin. Now such is acedia, for it is written (Ecclus. 6. 26): Bow down thy shoulder, and bear her, namely spiritual wisdom, and be not-grieved (acedieris) with her bands. Therefore acedia is a sin.

I answer that, Acedia, according to Damascene (loc. cit.) is "an oppressive sorrow," which, namely, so weighs upon man's mind, that he wants to do nothing (thus acid things (acida) are also cold). Hence acedia implies a certain weariness of work, as appears from a gloss⁷ on Ps. 106. 18, Their soul abhorred all manner of meat, and from the definition of some who say that acedia is a sluggishness of the mind which neglects to begin good.⁸

Now this kind of sorrow is always evil, sometimes in itself, sometimes in its effect. For sorrow is evil in itself when it is about that which is apparently evil but good in reality, even as, on the other hand, pleasure is evil if it is about that which seems to be good but is, in truth, evil. Since, then, spiritual good is a good in very truth, sorrow about spiritual good is evil in itself. And yet that sorrow also which is about a real evil is evil in its effect, if it so oppresses man as to draw him away entirely from good deeds. Hence the Apostle (II Cor. 2. 7) did not wish those who repented to be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow.

Accordingly, since acedia, as we understand it here, denotes sorrow for spiritual good, it is evil on two counts, both in itself and in point of its effect. Consequently it is a sin, for by sin we mean an evil movement of the appetite, as appears from what has been said above (Q. x, A. 2; Part I-II, Q. LXXIV, A. 3).

Reply Obj. 1. Passions are not sinful in themselves; but they are blameworthy in so far as they are applied to something evil, just as they deserve praise in so far as they are applied to something good. Therefore sorrow, in itself, calls neither for praise nor for blame; but moderate sorrow for evil calls for praise, while sorrow for good, and again immoderate sorrow for evil, calls for blame. It is in this sense that acedia is said to be a sin.

Reply Obj. 2. The passions of the sensitive appetite may either be venial sins in themselves, or incline the soul to mortal sin. And since the sensitive appetite has a bodily organ, it follows that on account of some bodily change a man becomes more apt to commit some particular sin. Hence it may happen that certain sins may become more insistent, through certain bodily changes occurring at certain fixed times. Now all bodily effects, of themselves, dispose one to sorrow; and thus it is that those who fast are harassed by acedia towards mid-day, when they begin to feel the want of food, and to be oppressed by the sun's heat.

Reply Obj. 3. It is a sign of humility if a man does not think too much of himself, through observing his own faults; but if a man contemns the good things he has received from God, this, far from being a proof of humility, shows him to be ungrateful; and from such contempt results acedia, because we sorrow for things that we consider evil and worthless. Accordingly we ought to think much of the goods of others, in such a way as not to disparage those we have received ourselves from God, because if we did they would give us sorrow.

Reply Obj. 4. Sin is always to be shunned, but the assaults of sin should be overcome sometimes by flight, sometimes by resistance; by flight when a continued thought increases the incentive to sin, as in lust, for which reason it is written (I Cor. 6. 18): Fly fornication; by resistance, when perseverance in the thought diminishes the incentive to sin, which incentive arises from some trivial consideration. This is the case with acedia, because the more we think about spiritual goods, the more pleasing they become to us, and with this acedia dies away.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Acedia Is a Special Vice?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that acedia is not a special vice.

Objection 1. For that which belongs to all vices does not constitute a special kind of vice. But every vice makes a man sorrowful about the opposite spiritual good; for the lustful man is sorrowful about the good of continence, and the glutton about the good of abstinence. Since then acedia is sorrow for 'spiritual good, as stated above (A. 1), it seems that acedia is not a special sin.

Obj. 2. Further, Acedia, through being a kind of sorrow, is opposed to joy. Now joy is not accounted one special virtue. Therefore acedia should not be considered a special vice.

Obj. 3. Further, Since spiritual good is a kind of common object, which virtue seeks, and vice shuns, it does not constitute a special virtue or vice, unless it be limited by some addition. Now nothing, it seems, except toil, can narrow it to acedia, if this is a special vice, because the reason why a man shuns spiritual goods is that they are toilsome, and so acedia is a kind of weariness. But to shun toil and seek bodily repose seem to be due to the same cause, namely, idleness (pigritia). Hence acedia would be nothing but laziness, which seems untrue, for idleness is opposed to carefulness, while acedia is opposed to joy. Therefore acedia is not a special vice.

On the contrary, Gregory (Moral. xxxi, 45)¹ distinguishes acedia from the other vices. Therefore it is a special vice.

I answer that, Since acedia is sorrow for spiritual good, if we take spiritual good in a general way, acedia will not be a special vice, because, as stated above (A. 1), every vice shuns the spiritual good of its opposite virtue. Again it cannot be said that acedia is a special vice in so far as it shuns spiritual good as toilsome, or troublesome to the body, or as a hindrance to the body's pleasure, for this again would not sever acedia from carnal vices, by which a man seeks bodily comfort and pleasure.

Therefore we must say that a certain order exists among spiritual goods; for all the spiritual goods that are in the acts of each virtue are ordered to one spiritual good, which is the Divine good, about which there is a special virtue, namely, charity. Hence it pertains to each virtue to rejoice in its own spiritual good, which consists in its own act, while it pertains specially to charity to have that spiritual joy by which one rejoices in the Divine good. In like manner the sorrow by which one is displeased at the spiritual good which is in each act of virtue, belongs, not to any special vice, but to every vice; but sorrow in the Divine good about which charity rejoices belongs to a special vice, which is called acedia. This suffices for the Replies to the Objections

ARTICLE 3. Whether Acedia Is a Mortal Sin?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that acedia is not a mortal sin.

Objection 1. For every mortal sin is contrary to a precept of the Divine Law. But acedia seems contrary to no precept, as one may see by going through the precepts of the Decalogue. Therefore acedia is not a mortal sin.

Obj. 2. Further, In the same genus, a sin of deed is no less grievous than a sin of thought. Now it is not a mortal sin to refrain in deed from some spiritual good which leads to God; otherwise it would be a mortal sin not to observe the counsels. Therefore it is not a mortal sin to refrain in thought from such spiritual works. Therefore acedia is not a mortal sin.

Obj. 3. Further, No mortal sin is to be found in a perfect man. But acedia is to be found in a perfect man; for Cassian says (De Instit. Cænob. x, 2)² that acedia is "well known to the solitary, and is a most vexatious and persistent foe to the hermit." Therefore acedia is not always a mortal sin.

On the contrary, It is written (II Cor. 7. 20): The sorrow of the world worketh death. But such is acedia; for it is not sorrow according to God, which is contrasted with sorrow of the world. Therefore it is a mortal sin.

I answer that, As stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXXXVIII, AA. 1, 2), mortal sin is so called because it destroys the spiritual life which is the effect of charity, according to which God dwells in us. Therefore any sin which by its very character is contrary to charity is a mortal sin by reason of its genus. And such is acedia, because the proper effect of charity is joy in God, as stated above (Q. XXVIII, A. 1), while acedia is sorrow about spiritual good in so far as it is a Divine good. Therefore acedia is a mortal sin in respect of its genus.

But it must be observed with regard to all sins that are mortal in respect of their genus, that they are not mortal except when they attain to their perfection. For the consummation of sin is in the consent of reason; for we are speaking now of human sins consisting in human acts, the principle of which is the reason. Therefore if the sin be a mere beginning of sin in the sensuality alone, without attaining to the consent of reason, it is a venial sin on account of the imperfection of the act. Thus in the genus of adultery, the concupiscence that goes no further than the sensuality is a venial sin, but if it reach to the consent of reason, it is a mortal sin. So too, the movement of acedia is sometimes in the sensuality alone, by reason of the opposition of the flesh to the spirit, and then it is a venial sin; but sometimes it reaches to the reason, which consents in the flight from horror and detestation of the Divine good, on account of the flesh utterly prevailing over the spirit. In this case it is clear that acedia is a mortal sin.

Reply Obj. 1. Acedia is opposed to the precept about keeping holy the Sabbath-day. For this precept, in so far as it is a moral precept, implicitly commands the mind to rest in God; and sorrow of the mind about Divine good is contrary to this.

Reply Obj. 2. Acedia is not a withdrawal of the mind from any spiritual good, but from the Divine good, to which the mind is obliged to adhere. Therefore if a man is sorry because someone forces him to do acts of virtue that he is not bound to do, this is not a sin of acedia, but rather when he is sorry to have to do something for God's sake.

Reply Obj. 3. Imperfect movements of acedia are to be found in holy men, but they do not reach to the consent of reason.

ARTICLE 4. Whether Acedia Should Be Accounted a Capital Vice?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that acedia ought not to be accounted a capital vice.

Objection 1. For a capital vice is one that moves a man to sinful acts, as stated above (Q. XXXIV, A. 5). Now acedia does not move one to action, but on the contrary withdraws one from it. Therefore it should not be accounted a capital sin.

Obj. 2. Further, A capital sin is one to which daughters are assigned. Now Gregory (Moral xxxi, 45)¹ assigns six daughters to acedia, namely "malice, spite, faint-heartedness, despair, sluggishness in regard to the commandments, wandering of the mind after unlawful things." Now these do not seem in reality to arise from acedia. For spite seems to be the same as hatred, which arises from envy, as stated above (Q. XXXIV, A. 6); malice is a genus which contains all vices, and, in like manner, a wandering of the mind after unlawful things is to be found in every vice; sluggishness about the commandments seems to be the same as acedia, while faint-heartedness and despair may arise from any sin. Therefore acedia is not rightly accounted a capital sin.

Obj. 3. Further, Isidore distinguishes the vice of acedia from the vice of sorrow, saying² that in so far as a man shirks his duty because it is distasteful and burdensome, it is sorrow, and in so far as he is inclined to undue repose, it is acedia; and of sorrow he says that it gives rise to spite, faint-heartedness, bitterness, despair; but he states that from acedia seven things arise, namely, "idleness, drowsiness, uneasiness of the mind, restlessness of the body, instability, loquacity, curiosity."³ Therefore it seems that either Gregory or Isidore has wrongly assigned acedia as a capital sin together with its daughters.

On the contrary, The same Gregory (loc. cit.) states that acedia is a capital sin, and has the daughters mentioned above.

I answer that, As stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXIV, AA. 3, 4), a capital vice is one which easily gives rise to others as being their final cause. Now just as we do many things on account of pleasure, both in order to obtain it, and through being moved to do something under the impulse of pleasure, so again we do many things on account of sorrow, either that we may avoid it, or through being exasperated into doing something under its pressure. Therefore, since acedia is a kind of sorrow, as stated above (A. 1), it is fittingly accounted a capital sin.

³ Quaest. in 1. et. Test., In Deut., xvi, on 7.1 (PL 83, 366).

Reply Obj. 1. Acedia by weighing on the mind, hinders us from doing things that cause sorrow. Nevertheless it induces the mind to do certain things, either because they are in harmony with sorrow, such as weeping, or because they are a means of avoiding sorrow.

Reply Obj. 2. Gregory fittingly assigns the daughters of acedia. For since, according to the Philosopher,¹ "no man can be a long time in company with what is painful and unpleasant," it follows that something arises from sorrow in two ways: first, that man shuns whatever causes sorrow; secondly, that he passes to other things that give him pleasure; thus those who find no joy in spiritual pleasures have recourse to pleasures of the body, according to the Philosopher.² Now in the avoidance of sorrow the order observed is that man at first flies from unpleasant things, and secondly he struggles against such things as cause sorrow. Now spiritual goods which are the object of the sorrow of acedia are both end and means. Avoidance of the end is the result of despair, while avoidance of those goods which are the means to the end, in matters of difficulty which come under the counsels, is the effect of faint-heartedness, and in matters of common justice, is the effect of sluggishness about the commandments. The struggle against spiritual goods that cause sorrow is sometimes with men who lead others to spiritual goods, this is called spite; and sometimes it extends to the spiritual goods themselves, when a man goes so far as to detest them, and this is properly called malice. In so far as a man turns from spiritual things to external objects of pleasure, the daughter of acedia is called wandering after unlawful things. From this it is clear how to reply to the objections against each of the daughters, for malice does not denote here that which is generic to all vices, but must be understood as explained. Nor is spite taken as synonymous with hatred, but for a kind of indignation, as stated above; and the same applies to the others.

Reply Obj. 3. This distinction between sorrow and acedia is also given by Cassian (De Instit. Cænob. x. 1).³ But Gregory more fittingly (loc. cit.) calls acedia a kind of sorrow, because, as stated above (A. 2), sorrow is not a distinct vice, in so far as a man shirks a distasteful and burdensome work, or sorrows on account of any other cause whatever, but only in so far as he is sorry on account of the Divine good, which sorrow belongs to the notion of acedia, since acedia seeks undue rest in so far as it spurns the Divine good. Moreover the things which Isidore lists as arising from acedia and sorrow, are reduced to those mentioned by Gregory; for bitterness which Isidore states to be the result of sorrow, is an effect of spite. Idleness and drowsiness are reduced to sluggishness about the precepts, for some are idle and omit them altogether, while others are drowsy and fulfil them with negligence. All the other five which he accounts as effects of acedia belong to the wandering of the mind after unlawful things. This tendency to wander, if it reside in the mind itself that is desirous of rushing importunately after various things is called uneasiness of the mind, but if it pertains to the knowledge, it is called curiosity; if it affect the speech it is called loquacity; and in so far as it affects a body that changes place, it is called restlessness of the body, when, namely, a man shows the unsteadiness of his mind by the disordered movements of members of his body; while if it causes the body to move from one place to another, it is called instability; or instability may denote changeableness of purpose.

QUESTION XXXVI

OF ENVY

(In Four Articles)

WE must now consider envy, and under this head there are four points of inquiry: (1) What is envy? (2) Whether it is a sin? (3) Whether it is a mortal sin? (4) Whether it is a capital sin, and which are its daughters?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Envy Is a Kind of Sorrow?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that envy is not a kind of sorrow.

Objection 1. For the object of sorrow is an evil. But the object of envy is a good, for Gregory says (Moral. v. 46)⁴ of the envious man that "self-inflicted pain wounds the mind consumed by envy, which is racked by the prosperity of another." Therefore envy is not a kind of sorrow.

Obj. 2. Further, Likeness is a cause, not of sorrow but rather of pleasure. But likeness is a cause of envy; for the Philosopher says:¹ "Men are envious of such as are like them in genus, in knowledge, in stature, in habit, or in reputation." Therefore envy is not a kind of sorrow.

Obj. 3. Further, Sorrow is caused by a defect, and therefore those who are in great defect are inclined to sorrow, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XLVII, A. 3) when we were treating of the passions. Now those "who lack little, and who love honours, and who are considered wise," are envious, according to the Philosopher.² Therefore envy is not a kind of sorrow.

Obj. 4. Further, Sorrow is opposed to pleasure. Now opposite effects do not have one and the same cause. Therefore, since the recollection of goods once possessed is a cause of pleasure, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XXXII, A. 3) it will not be a cause of sorrow. But it is a cause of envy; for the Philosopher says³ that we envy those "who have or have had things that befitted ourselves, or which we possessed at some time." Therefore envy is not a kind of sorrow.

On the contrary, Damascene (De Fide Orthodox. ii, 14)⁴ calls envy, a species of sorrow, and says that envy is sorrow "for another's good."

I answer that. The object of a man's sorrow is his own evil. Now it may happen that another's good is apprehended as one's own evil, and in this way sorrow can be about another's good. But this happens in two ways: first, when a man is sorry about another's good in so far as it threatens to be an occasion of harm to himself, as when a man grieves for his enemy's prosperity, for fear lest he may do him some harm. Such sorrow is not envy, but rather an effect of fear, as the Philosopher states.⁵

Secondly, another's good may be thought of as being one's own evil in so far as it conduces to the lessening of one's own good name or excellence. It is in this way that envy grieves for another's good; and consequently men are envious especially of those goods in which glory consists, and about which men like to be honoured and esteemed, as the Philosopher remarks.⁶

Reply Obj. 1. Nothing hinders what is good for one from being apprehended as evil for another; and in this way it is possible for sorrow to be about good, as stated above.

Reply Obj. 2. Since envy is about another's glory in so far as it diminishes the glory a man desires to have, it follows that a man is envious of those only whom he wishes to rival or surpass in glory. But this does not apply to people who are far removed from one another; for no man, unless he be out of his mind, endeavours to rival or surpass in glory those who are far above him. Thus a commoner does not envy the king, nor does the king envy a commoner whom he is far above. Therefore a man does not envy those who are far removed from him, whether in place, time, or station, but those who are near him, and whom he strives to rival or surpass. For it is against our will that these should be in greater glory than we are, and that gives rise to sorrow. On the other hand, likeness causes pleasure in so far as it is in agreement with the will.

Reply Obj. 3. A man does not strive for mastery in matters where he is very deficient; and so he does not envy one who surpasses him in such matters, unless he surpass him by little, for then it seems to him that this is not beyond him and so he makes an effort. Hence, if his effort fails through the other's glory surpassing his, he grieves. And thus it is that those who love to be honoured are more envious; and in like manner the fainthearted are envious, because all things are great to them, and whatever good may befall another, they reckon that they themselves have been bested in something great. Hence it is written (Job 5. 2): Envy slayeth the little one, and Gregory says (Moral. v)⁷ that "we can envy those only whom we think better in some respect than ourselves."

Reply Obj. 4. Recollection of past goods in so far as we have had them, causes pleasure; in so far as we have lost them, causes sorrow; and in so far as others have them, causes envy; because that, above all, seems to take away from our own glory. Hence the Philosopher says⁸ that "the old envy the young, and those who have spent much in order to get something, envy those who have got it by spending little," because they grieve that they have lost their goods, and that others have acquired goods.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Envy Is a Sin?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that envy is not a sin.

Objection 1. For Jerome says to Laeta about the education of her daughter (Ep. cvii):⁹ "Let her have companions, so that she may learn together with them, envy them, and be nettled when they are praised." But no one should be advised to commit a sin. Therefore envy is not a sin.

⁹ Rhetoric, II, 10 (1388^a22).

Obj. 2. Further, "Envy is sorrow for another's good," as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. ii, 14).¹ But this is sometimes praiseworthy, for it is written (Prov. 29 2): When the wicked shall bear rule, the people shall mourn. Therefore envy is not always a sin.

Obj. 3. Further, Envy denotes a kind of zeal. But there is a good zeal, according to Ps. 68. 10: The zeal of Thy house hath eaten me up. Therefore envy is not always a sin.

Obj. 4. Further, Punishment is divided against fault. But envy is a kind of punishment; for Gregory says (Moral. v, 46):² "When the foul sore of envy corrupts the vanquished heart, the very exterior itself shows how forcibly the mind is urged by madness. For paleness seizes the complexion, the eyes are weighed down, the spirit is inflamed, while the limbs are chilled, there is frenzy in the heart, there is gnashing with the teeth." Therefore envy is not a sin.

On the contrary, It is written (Gal 5. 26): Let us not be made desirous of vainglory, provoking one another, envying one another.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1), envy is sorrow for another's good. Now this sorrow may come about in four ways. First, when a man grieves for another's good through fear that it may cause harm either to himself, or to some other goods. This sorrow is not envy, as stated above (A. 1), and may be without sin. Hence Gregory says (Moral. xxii, 11):³ "It very often happens that without charity being lost, both the destruction of an enemy rejoices us, and again his glory, without any sin of envy, saddens us, since, when he falls, we believe that some are deservedly set up, and when he prospers, we dread lest many suffer unjustly."

Secondly, we may grieve over another's good, not because he has it, but because the good which he has we have not; and this, properly speaking is zeal, as the Philosopher says.⁴ And if this zeal be about virtuous goods, it is praiseworthy, according to I Cor. 14. 1: Be zealous for spiritual gifts, while, if it be about temporal goods, it may be either sinful or sinless.

Thirdly, one may grieve over another's good, because he who happens to have that good is unworthy of it. Such sorrow as this cannot be occasioned by virtuous goods, which make a man just, but, as the Philosopher states,⁵ is about riches, and those things which can accrue to the worthy and the unworthy; and he calls this sorrow nemesis (νέμεσις),⁶ saying that it belongs to good morals. But he says this because he considered temporal goods in themselves, in so far as they may seem great to those who look not to eternal goods; but, according to the teaching of faith, temporal goods that accrue to those who are unworthy are so disposed according to God's just ordering, either for the correction of those men, or for their condemnation, and such goods are as nothing in comparison with the goods to come, which are prepared for good men. Therefore sorrow of this kind is forbidden in Holy Writ, according to Ps. 36. 1: Be not emulous of evil doers, nor envy them that work iniquity, and elsewhere (Ps. 72. 2, 3): My steps had well nigh slipped, for I was envious of the wicked, when I saw the prosperity of sinners. (Douay,—because I had a zeal on occasion of the wicked, seeing the prosperity of sinners.)

Fourthly, we grieve over a man's good, and in so far as his good surpasses ours; this is envy properly speaking, and is always sinful, as also the Philosopher states,⁷ because to do so is to grieve over what should make us rejoice, namely, over our neighbour's good.

Reply Obj. 1. Envy there denotes the zeal with which we ought to strive to progress with those who are better than we are.

Reply Obj. 2. This argument considers sorrow for another's good in the first sense given above.

Reply Obj. 3. Envy differs from zeal, as stated above. Hence a certain zeal may be good, while envy is always evil.

Reply Obj. 4. Nothing hinders a sin from being penal because of something joined to it as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXXXVII, A. 2) when we were treating sins.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Envy Is a Mortal Sin?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that envy is not a mortal sin.

Objection 1. For since envy is a kind of sorrow, it is a passion of the sensitive appetite. Now there is no mortal sin in the sensuality, but only in the reason, as Augustine declares (De Trin. xii, 12).⁸ Therefore envy is not a mortal sin.

Obj. 2. Further, There cannot be mortal sin in infants. But envy can be in them, for Augustine says:⁹ "I myself have seen and known even a baby envious, it could not speak, yet it turned pale and looked bitterly on its foster-brother." Therefore envy is not a mortal sin.

Obj. 3. Further, Every mortal sin is contrary to some virtue. But envy is contrary, not to a virtue but to nemesis (νέμεσις), which is a passion, according to the Philosopher.¹ Therefore envy is not a mortal sin.

On the contrary, It is written (Job. 5. 2): Envy slayeth the little one. Now nothing slays spiritually, except mortal sin. Therefore envy is a mortal sin.

I answer that, Envy is a mortal sin, in respect of its genus. For the genus of a sin is taken from its object; and envy according to the aspect of its object is contrary to charity, from which the soul derives its spiritual life, according to I John 3. 14. We know that we have passed from death to life, because we love the brethren. Now the object both of charity and of envy is our neighbour's good, but by contrary movements, since charity rejoices in our neighbour's good, while envy grieves over it, as stated above (A. 1). Therefore it is evident that envy is a mortal sin in respect of its genus.

Nevertheless, as stated above (Q. xxxv. A. 3; Part I-II, Q. LXXII, A. 5, reply 1), in every kind of mortal sin we find certain imperfect movements in the sensuality, which are venial sins; such are the first movement of concupiscence, in the genus of adultery, and the first movement of anger, in the genus of murder; and so in the genus of envy we find sometimes even in perfect men certain first movements, which are venial sins.

Reply Obj. 1. The movement of envy in so far as it is a passion of the sensuality, is an imperfect thing in the genus of human acts, the principle of which is the reason, so that envy of that kind is not a mortal sin. The same applies to the envy of little children who have not the use of reason. From this the Reply to the Second Objection is manifest.

Reply Obj. 3. According to the Philosopher,² envy is contrary both to nemesis and to pity, but for different reasons. For it is directly contrary to pity, their principal objects being contrary to one another, since the envious man grieves over his neighbour's good, while the pitiful man grieves over his neighbour's evil, so that the envious have no pity, as he states in the same passage, nor is the pitiful man envious. On the other hand, envy is contrary to nemesis on the part of the man whose good grieves the envious man, for nemesis is sorrow for the good of the undeserving according to Ps. 72.

3: I was envious of the wicked, when I saw the prosperity of sinners, while the envious grieves over the good of those who are deserving of it. Hence it is clear that the former contrariety is more direct than the latter. Now pity is a virtue, and an effect proper to charity, so that envy is contrary to pity and charity.

ARTICLE 4 Whether Envy Is a Capital Vice?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that envy is not a capital vice.

Objection 1. For the capital vices are distinct from their daughters. Now envy is the daughter of vainglory; for the Philosopher says³ that "those who love honour and glory are more envious." Therefore envy is not a capital vice.

Obj. 2. Further, The capital vices seem to be less grave than the other vices which arise from them. For Gregory says (Moral. xxxi, 45):⁴ "The leading vices seem to worm their way into the deceived mind under some kind of pretext, but those which follow them provoke the soul to all kinds of outrage, and confuse the mind with their wild outcry." Now envy seems to be a most grave sin, for Gregory says (Moral. v. 46): "Though in every evil thing that is done, the venom of our old enemy is infused into the heart of man, yet in this wickedness the serpent stirs his whole bowels and discharges the bane of spite fitted to enter deep into the mind." Therefore envy is not a capital sin.

Obj. 3. Further, It seems that its daughters are unfittingly assigned by Gregory (Moral. xxxi, 45),⁵ who says that "from envy arise hatred, tale-bearing, detraction, joy at our neighbour's misfortunes, and grief for his prosperity." For joy at our neighbour's misfortunes and grief for his prosperity seem to be the same as envy, as appears from what has been said above (A. 3). Therefore these should not be assigned as daughters of envy.

On the contrary stands the authority of Gregory (Moral. xxxi, 45)⁷ who states that envy is a capital sin and assigns to it the daughters mentioned above.

I answer that, Just as acedia is grief for a Divine spiritual good, so envy is grief for our neighbour's good. Now it has been stated above (Q. xxxv, A. 4) that acedia is a capital vice for the reason that it incites man to do certain things, with the purpose either of avoiding sorrow or of satisfying its demands. Therefore envy is accounted a capital vice for the same reason.

³ Ibid., II, 10 (1387^b31).

⁵ PL 76, 622.

⁷ PL 76, 621.

Reply Obj. 1. As Gregory says (Moral. xxxi, 45),¹ "the capital vices are so closely akin to one another that one springs from the other. For the first offspring of pride is vainglory, which by corrupting the mind it occupies begets envy, since while it craves for the power of an empty name, it repines for fear lest another should acquire that power." Consequently the notion of a capital vice does not exclude its originating from another vice, but it demands that it should have some principal reason for being itself the origin of several kinds of sin. However it is perhaps because envy manifestly arises from vainglory, that it is not reckoned a capital sin, either by Isidore² or by Cassian (De Instit. Canob. v. 1).³

Reply Obj. 2. It does not follow from the passage quoted that envy is the greatest of sins, but that when the devil tempts us to envy, he is enticing us to that which has its chief place in his heart, for as stated further on in the same passage, by the envy of the devil, death came into the world.

There is, however, a kind of envy which is accounted among the most grievous sins, namely envy of another's spiritual good, which envy is a sorrow for the increase of God's grace, and not merely for our neighbour's good. Hence it is accounted a sin against the Holy Ghost, because thereby a man envies, as it were, the Holy Ghost Himself, Who is glorified in His works.

Reply Obj. 3. The number of envy's daughters may be understood for the reason that in the struggle aroused by envy there is something by way of beginning, something by way of middle, and something by way of term. The beginning is that a man strives to lower another's reputation, and this either secretly, and then we have tale-bearing, or openly, and then we have detraction.—The middle consists in the fact that when a man aims at defaming another, he is either able to do so, and then we have joy at another's misfortune, or he is unable, and then we have grief at another's prosperity.—The term is hatred itself, because just as good which delights causes love, so does sorrow cause hatred, as stated above (Q. xxxiv, A. 6).—Grief at another's prosperity is in one way the very same as envy, when, that is, a man grieves over another's prosperity, in so far as it gives the latter glory, but in another way it is a daughter of envy, in so far as the envious man sees his neighbour prosper notwithstanding his efforts to prevent it. On the other hand, joy at another's misfortune is not directly the same as envy, but is a result of it, because grief over our neighbour's good which is envy, gives rise to joy in his evil.

QUESTION XXXVII

OF THE SINS WHICH ARE CONTRARY TO PEACE (In Two Articles)

WE must now consider the sins contrary to peace, and first we shall consider discord which is in the heart; secondly contention, which is on the lips (Q. xxxviii); thirdly, those things which consist in deeds; namely schism (Q. xxxix); quarrelling (Q. xli), war (Q. xl), and sedition (Q. xlii). Under the first head there are two points of inquiry: (1) Whether discord is a sin? (2) Whether it is a daughter of vainglory?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Discord Is a Sin?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that discord is not a sin.

Objection 1. For to be in disaccord with man is to sever oneself from another's will. But this does not seem to be a sin, because God's will alone, and not our neighbour's, is the rule of our own will. Therefore discord is not a sin.

Obj. 2 Further, Whoever induces another to sin, sins also himself. But it appears not to be a sin to incite others to discord, for it is written (Acts 23, 6) that Paul, knowing that the one part were Sadducees, and the other Pharisees, cried out in the council: Men brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of Pharisees, concerning the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question And when he had so said, there arose a dissension between the Pharisees and the Sadducees. Therefore discord is not a sin

Obj. 3. Further, Sin, especially mortal sin, is not to be found in a holy man. But discord is to be found even among holy men, for it is written (Acts 15, 39): There arose a dissension between Paul and Barnabas, so that they departed one from another. Therefore discord is not a sin, and least of all a mortal sin.

On the contrary, Dissensions, that is, discords, are reckoned among the works of the flesh (Gal. 5, 20), of which it is said afterwards (verse 21) that they who do such things shall not obtain the kingdom of God. Now nothing, save mortal sin, excludes man from the kingdom of God. Therefore discord is a mortal sin.

I answer that, Discord is opposed to concord.

Now, as stated above (Q. XXIX, A. 3) concord results from charity, in so far as charity joins many hearts together in one thing, which is chiefly the Divine good, secondarily, the good of our neighbour. Therefore discord is a sin, in so far as it is opposed to this concord.

But it must be observed that this concord is destroyed by discord in two ways: first, directly, secondly, accidentally. Now, human acts and movements are said to be direct (per se) when they are according to one's intention. Therefore a man directly is in disaccord with his neighbour when he knowingly and intentionally dissents from the Divine good and his neighbour's good, to which he ought to consent. This is a mortal sin in respect of its genus, because it is contrary to charity, although the first movements of such discord are venial sins by reason of their being imperfect acts.

The accidental in human acts is that which occurs beside the intention. Hence when, several intend a good pertaining to God's honour, or our neighbour's profit, while one thinks a certain thing good, and another thinks contrariwise, the discord is in this case accidentally contrary to the Divine good or that of our neighbour. Such discord is neither sinful nor against charity, unless it be accompanied by an error about things necessary to salvation, or by undue obstinacy, since it has also been stated above (Q. XXIX, AA. 1, 3, reply 2) that the concord which is an effect of charity is union of wills, not of opinions. It follows from this that discord is sometimes the sin of one party only, for instance, when one wills a good which the other knowingly resists; while sometimes it implies sin in both parties, as when each dissents from the other's good, and loves his own.

Reply Obj. 1. One man's will considered in itself is not the rule of another man's will; but in so far as our neighbour's will adheres to God's will, it becomes in consequence, a rule regulated according to its proper measure. Therefore it is a sin to be in disaccord with such a will, because by that very fact one is in disaccord with the Divine rule.

Reply Obj. 2. Just as a man's will that adheres to God is a right rule, to disaccord with which is a sin, so too a man's will that is opposed to God is a perverse rule, to disaccord with which is good. Hence to cause a discord by which a good concord resulting from charity is destroyed, is a grave sin; hence it is written (Prov. 6. 16): Six things there are, which the Lord hateth, and the seventh His soul detesteth, which seventh is stated (verse 19) to be him that soweth discord among brethren. On the other hand, to arouse a discord by which an evil concord (that is, concord in an evil will) is destroyed, is praiseworthy. In this way Paul was to be commended for sowing discord among those who agreed together in evil, because Our Lord also said of Himself (Matt. 10. 34): I came not to send peace, but the sword.

Reply Obj. 3. The discord between Paul and Barnabas was accidental and not direct, because each intended some good, yet the one thought one thing good, while the other thought something else, which was owing to human deficiency; for that controversy was not about things necessary to salvation. Moreover all this was ordained by Divine providence on account of the good which would ensue.

ARTICLE 2 Whether Discord Is a Daughter of Vainglory?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that discord is not a daughter of vainglory.

Objection 1. For anger is a vice distinct from vainglory. Now discord is apparently the daughter of anger, according to Prov. 15. 18: A passionate man stirreth up strifes. Therefore it is not a daughter of vainglory.

Obj. 2. Further, Augustine expounding the words of John 7. 39. As yet the Spirit was not given, says (Tract. xxxii)¹ "Malice severs, charity unites." Now discord is none other than a separation of wills. Therefore discord arises from malice, that is, envy, rather than from vainglory.

Obj. 3. Further. Whatever gives rise to many evils, would seem to be a capital vice. Now such is discord, because Jerome in commenting on Matt. 12. 25. Every kingdom divided against itself shall be made desolate, says:² "Just as concord makes small things thrive, so discord brings the greatest things to ruin." Therefore discord should itself be accounted a capital vice, rather than a daughter of vainglory.

On the contrary stands the authority of Gregory (Moral. xxxi. 45).³

I answer that, Discord denotes a certain disunion of wills, in so far, namely, as one man's will holds fast to one thing, while the other man's will holds fast to something else. Now if a man's will holds fast to its own ground, this is due to the fact that he prefers what is his own to that which belongs to others, and if he do this inordinately, it is due to pride and vainglory. Therefore discord, whereby a man holds to his own way of thinking, and departs from that of others, is reckoned to be a daughter of vainglory.

Reply Obj. 1. Strife is not the same as discord, for strife consists in external deeds, and so it is fitting that it should arise from anger, which incites the mind to hurt one's neighbour; discord however consists in a divergence in the movements of wills, which arises from pride or vainglory, for the reason given above.

Reply Obj. 2. In discord we may consider that which is the term from which, that is, another's will from which we recede, and in this respect it arises from envy; and again we may consider that which is the term to which, that is, something of our own to which we cling, and in this respect it is caused by vainglory. And since in every moment the term to which is more important than the term from which (because the end is of more account than the beginning), discord is accounted a daughter of vainglory rather than of envy, though it may arise from both for different reasons, as stated.

Reply Obj. 3. The reason why concord makes small things thrive, while discord brings the greatest to ruin, is because the more united a force is, the stronger it is, while the more disunited it is the weaker it becomes (De Causis. xvii).¹ Hence it is evident that this is part of the proper effect of discord which is a disunion of wills, and in no way indicates that other vices arise from discord, as though it were a capital vice.

QUESTION XXXVIII

OF CONTENTION

(In Two Articles)

WE must now consider contention, in respect of which there are two points of inquiry: (1) Whether contention is a mortal sin? (2) Whether it is a daughter of vainglory?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Contention Is a Mortal Sin?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that contention is not a mortal sin.

Objection 1. For there is no mortal sin in spiritual men, and yet contention is to be found in them, according to Luke 22. 24: And there was also a strife amongst the disciples of Jesus, which of them should . . . be the greatest. Therefore contention is not a mortal sin.

Obj. 2. Further, No well disposed man should be pleased that his neighbour commit a mortal sin. But the Apostle says (Philip. 1. 17): Some out of contention preach Christ, and afterwards he says (verse 18): In this also I rejoice, yea, and will rejoice. Therefore contention is not a mortal sin.

Obj. 3. Further, It happens that people contend either in the courts or in disputations, without any spiteful purpose, and with a good intention, as, for example, those who contend by disputing with heretics. Hence a gloss on I Kings 14. 1. It come to pass one day, etc. says.² "Catholics do not raise contentions with heretics unless they are first challenged to dispute." Therefore contention is not a mortal sin.

Obj. 4. Further, Job seems to have contended with God, according to Job 39. 32: Shall he that contendeth with God be so easily silenced? And yet Job was not guilty of mortal sin, since the Lord said of him (ibid. 42. 7): You have not spoken the thing that is right before me, as my servant Job hath. Therefore contention is not always a mortal sin.

On the contrary, It is against the precept of the Apostle who says (II Tim. 2. 14). Contend not in words. Moreover (Gal. 5. 20) contention is included among the works of the flesh, and as stated there (verse 21) they who do such things shall not obtain the kingdom of God. Now whatever excludes a man from the kingdom of God and is against a precept, is a mortal sin. Therefore contention is a mortal sin.

I answer that, To contend is to tend against some one. Therefore just as discord denotes a contrariety of wills, so contention signifies contrariety of speech. For this reason when a man contrasts various contrary things in a speech, this is called "contentio," which Tully calls one of the rhetorical colours (Rhet. ad Heren. iv, 15),³ where he says that "it consists in developing a speech from contrary things, for instance: Adulation has a pleasant beginning, and a most bitter end."

Now contrariety of speech may be looked at in two ways: first with regard to the intention of the contentious party; secondly, with regard to the manner of contending. As to the intention, we must consider whether he contends against the truth, and then he is to be blamed, or against falsehood, and then he should be praised. As to the manner, we must consider whether his manner of contending is in keeping with the persons and the matter in dispute, for then it would be praiseworthy; hence Tully says (Rhet. ad Heren. iii, 13)¹ that "contention is a sharp speech suitable for proof and refutation"; or whether it exceeds the demands of the persons and matter in dispute, in which case it is blameworthy.

Accordingly if we take contention as denoting a disclaimer of the truth and an inordinate manner, it is a mortal sin. Thus Ambrose defines contention: "Contention is a disclaimer of the truth with clamorous confidence." If, however, contention denote a disavowal of what is false, with the proper measure of acrimony, it is praiseworthy; but if it denote a disavowal of falsehood, together with an inordinate manner, it can be a venial sin, unless perhaps the contention be conducted so inordinately as to give scandal to others. Hence the Apostle after saying (II Tim. 2. 14): Contend not in words, adds, for it is to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers.

Reply Obj. 1. The disciples of Christ did not contend together with the intention of disclaiming the truth, since each one stood up for what he thought was true. Yet there was inordinateness in their contention, because they contended about a matter which they ought not to have contended about, namely the primacy of honour; for they were not spiritual men as yet, as a gloss says on the same passage;² and for this reason Our Lord checked them.

Reply Obj. 2. Those who preached Christ out of contention were to be blamed, because, although they did not gainsay the truth of faith, but preached it, yet they did gainsay the truth by the fact that they thought they would raise affliction to the Apostle who was preaching the truth of faith. Hence the Apostle rejoiced not in their contention, but in the fruit that would result from it, namely that Christ would be made known; for evil is sometimes the occasion of good results.

Reply Obj. 3. Contention is complete and is a mortal sin when, in contending before a judge, a man gainsays the truth of justice, or in a disputation, intends to impugn the true doctrine. In this sense Catholics do not contend against heretics, but the reverse. But when, whether in court or in a disputation, it is incomplete, that is, in respect of the acrimony of speech, it is not always a mortal sin.

Reply Obj. 4. Contention here denotes an ordinary dispute. For Job had said (13. 3): I will speak to the Almighty, and I desire to rea- son with God; yet he intended not to impugn the truth, but to defend it, and in seeking the truth thus, he had no wish to be inordinate in mind or in speech.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Contention Is a Daughter of Vainglory?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that contention is not a daughter of vainglory.

Objection 1. For contention is akin to zeal, and hence it is written (I Cor. 3. 3): Whereas there is among you zeal (Douay,—envying) and contention, are you not carnal, and walk according to men? Now zeal pertains to envy. Therefore contention arises rather from envy.

Obj. 2. Further, Contention is accompanied by raising of the voice. But "the voice is raised on account of anger," as Gregory declares (Moral. xxxi, 45).³ Therefore contention too arises from anger.

Obj. 3. Further, Among other things knowledge seems to be the matter of pride and vainglory, according to I Cor. 8. 1: Knowledge puffeth up. Now contention is often due to lack of knowledge, and by knowledge we do not impugn the truth, we know it. Therefore contention is not a daughter of vainglory.

On the contrary stands the authority of Gregory (Moral. xxxi).⁴

I answer that, As stated above (Q. xxxvii, A. 2), discord is a daughter of vainglory, because each of the parties in discord clings to his own opinion, rather than acquiesce with the other. Now it is proper to pride and vainglory to seek one's own glory. And just as people are discordant when they hold to their own opinion in their hearts, so are they contentious when each defends his own opinion by words. Consequently contention is reckoned a daughter of vainglory for the same reason as discord.

Reply Obj. 1. Contention, like discord, is akin to envy in so far as a man severs himself from the one with whom he is discordant, or with whom he contends, but in so far as a contentious man holds to something, it is akin to pride and vainglory, because, namely, he clings to his own opinion, as stated above.

Reply Obj. 2. The contention of which we are speaking puts on a loud voice for the purpose of impugning the truth, so that it is not the chief part of contention. Hence it does not follow that contention arises from the same source as the raising of the voice.

Reply Obj. 3 Pride and vainglory are occasioned chiefly by goods, even those that are contrary to them, for instance, when a man is proud of his humility; for when a thing arises in this way, it does so not directly but accidentally, in which way nothing hinders one contrary from arising out of another. Hence there is no reason why the per se and direct effects of pride or vainglory, should not result from the contraries of those things which are the occasion of pride.

QUESTION XXXIX

OF SCHISM

(In Four Articles)

WE must now consider the vices contrary to peace, which belong to deeds; such as schism, strife (Q. XLI), sedition (Q. XLII), and war (Q. XL). In the first place, then, about schism, there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether schism is a special sin? (2) Whether it is graver than unbelief? (3) Of the power exercised by schismatics; (4) Of the punishment inflicted on them.

ARTICLE 1. Whether Schism Is a Special Sin?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that schism is not a special sin.

Objection 1. For schism, as Pope Pelagius I. says (Epist. ad Viator. et Pancrat.),¹ "denotes a division." But every sin causes a division, according to Isa. 59. 2: Your sins have divided between you and your God. Therefore schism is not a special sin.

Obj. 2. Further, A man is apparently a schismatic if he disobeys the Church. But every sin makes a man disobey the commandments of the Church, because sin, according to Ambrose (De Parad. viii)² is "disobedience against the heavenly commandments." Therefore every sin is a schism.

Obj. 3. Further, Heresy also divides a man from the unity of faith. If, therefore, the word schism denotes a division, it would seem not to differ, as a special sin, from the sin of unbelief.

On the contrary, Augustine (Contra Faust. xx),³ distinguishes between schism and heresy, for he says that "a schismatic is one who holds the same faith, and practises the same worship, as others, and takes pleasure in the mere disunion of the community; but a heretic is one who holds another faith from that of the Catholic Church." Therefore schism is not a general sin.

³ Chap. 3 (PL 42, 369); cf. Contra Crescon., II, 3 (PL 43, 469).

I answer that, As Isidore says (Etym. viii, 3),⁴ schism "takes its name from being a scission of minds," and scission is opposed to unity. Therefore the sin of schism is one that is directly and per se opposed to unity. For in the moral as in the physical order, the species is not constituted by that which is accidental. Now, in the moral order, the essential is that which is intended, and that which results beside the intention, is, as it were, accidental. Hence the sin of schism is, properly speaking, a special sin, for the reason that the schismatic intends to sever himself from that unity which is the effect of charity; because charity unites not only one person to another with the bond of spiritual love, but also the whole Church in unity of spirit.

Accordingly schismatics properly so called are those who, wilfully and intentionally separate themselves from the unity of the Church; for this is the chief unity, and the particular unity of several individuals among themselves is subordinate to the unity of the Church, even as the mutual adaptation of each member of a natural body is subordinate to the unity of the whole body. Now the unity of the Church consists in two things: namely, in the mutual connection or communion of the members of the Church, and again in the subordination of all the members of the Church to the one head, according to Coloss. 2. 18, 19: Puffed up by the sense of his flesh, and not holding the Head, from which the whole body, by joints and bands, being supplied with nourishment and compacted, groweth unto the increase of God. Now this Head is Christ Himself, Whose vicergerent in the Church is the Sovereign Pontiff. Therefore schismatics are those who refuse to submit to the Sovereign Pontiff, and to hold communion with those members of the Church who acknowledge his supremacy.

Reply Obj. 1. The division between man and God that results from sin is not intended by the sinner; it happens beside his intention as a result of his turning inordinately to a changeable good, and so it is not schism properly so called.

Reply Obj. 2. The essence of schism consists in rebelliously disobeying the commandments; and I say "rebelliously," since a schismatic both obstinately scorns the commandments of the Church, and refuses to submit to her judgment. But every sinner does not do this, and so every sin is a schism.

Reply Obj. 3. Heresy and schism are distinguished in respect of those things to which each is opposed per se and directly. For heresy is per se opposed to faith, while schism is per se opposed to the unity of ecclesiastical charity. Therefore just as faith and charity are different virtues, although whoever lacks faith lacks charity, so too schism and heresy are different vices, although whoever is a heretic is also a schismatic, but not conversely. This is what Jerome says in his commentary on the Epistle to Titus (3. 10):¹ "I consider the difference between schism and heresy to be that heresy holds false doctrine while schism severs a man from the Church." Nevertheless, just as the loss of charity is the road to the loss of faith, according to I Tim. 1. 6: From which things, that is, charity and the like, some going astray, are turned aside into vain babbling, so too, schism is the road to heresy. Therefore Jerome adds (ibid.) that "at the outset it is possible, in a certain respect, to find a difference between schism and heresy; yet there is no schism that does not devise some heresy for itself, that it may appear to have had a reason for separating from the Church."

ARTICLE 2. Whether Schism Is a Graver Sin Than Unbelief?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that schism is a graver sin than unbelief.

Objection 1. For the graver sin meets with a graver punishment, according to Deut. 25. 2: According to the measure of the sin shall the measure also of the stripes be. Now we find the sin of schism punished more severely than even the sin of unbelief or idolatry for we read (Exod. 32. 28), that some were slain by the swords of their fellow men on account of idolatry; but of the sin of schism we read (Num. 16. 30): If the Lord do a new thing, and the earth opening her mouth swallow them down, and all things that belong to them, and they go down alive into hell, you shall know that they have blasphemed the Lord God. Moreover the ten tribes who were guilty of schism in revolting from the rule of David were most severely punished (IV Kings 17). Therefore the sin of schism is graver than the sin of unbelief.

Obj. 2. Further, "The good of the multitude is greater and more godlike than the good of the individual," as the Philosopher states.² Now schism is opposed to the good of the multitude, namely, ecclesiastical unity, while unbelief is contrary to the particular good of one man, namely the faith of an individual. Therefore it seems that schism is a graver sin than unbelief.

Obj. 3. Further, A greater good is opposed to a greater evil, according to the Philosopher.⁴ Now schism is opposed to charity, which is a greater virtue than faith to which unbelief is opposed, as shown above (Q. XXIII, A. 6). Therefore schism is a graver sin than unbelief.

On the contrary, That which results from an addition to something else surpasses that thing either in good or in evil. Now heresy results from something being added to schism, for it adds corrupt doctrine, as Jerome declares in the passage quoted above (A. 1, reply 3). Therefore schism is a less grievous sin than unbelief.

I answer that, The gravity of a sin can be considered in two ways: first, according to the species of that sin, secondly, according to its circumstances. And since particular circumstances are infinite in number, so too they can be varied in an infinite number of ways. Therefore if one were to ask in general which of two sins is the graver, the question must be understood to refer to the gravity derived from the sin's genus. Now the genus or species of a sin is taken from its object, as shown above (Part I-II, Q. LXXII, A. 1; Q. LXXIII, A. 3). Therefore the sin which is opposed to the greater good is, in respect of its genus, more grievous, for instance a sin committed against God is graver than a sin committed against one's neighbour.

Now it is evident that unbelief is a sin committed against God Himself, according as He is in Himself the First Truth, on which faith is founded; but schism is opposed to ecclesiastical unity, which is a participated good, and a lesser good than God Himself. Therefore it is manifest that the sin of unbelief is generically more grievous than the sin of schism, although it may happen that a particular schismatic sins more grievously than a particular unbeliever, either because his contempt is greater, or because his sin is a source of greater danger or for some similar reason.

Reply Obj. 1. It had already been declared to that people by the law which they had received that there was one God, and that no other God was to be worshipped by them; and the same had been confirmed among them by many kinds of signs. Consequently there was no need for those who sinned against this faith by falling into idolatry, to be punished in an unusual manner; it was enough that they should be punished in the usual way. On the other hand, it was not so well known among them that

² Ethics, I, 2 (1294^b10).

⁴ Ibid., VIII, 10 (1110^b0).

Moses was always to be their ruler, and so it was necessary for those who rebelled against his authority to be punished in a miraculous and unusual manner.

We may also reply by saying that the sin of schism was sometimes more severely punished in that people, because they were inclined to seditions and schisms. For it is written (I Esd. 4. 15): This city since days gone by has rebelled against its kings; and seditions and wars were raised therein (Vulg.,—This city is a rebellious city, and hurtful to the kings and provinces, and . . . wars were raised therein of old.). Now sometimes a more severe punishment is inflicted for a frequently repeated sin (as stated above, Part I-II, Q. cv, A. 2, reply 9), because punishments are medicines intended to keep man away from sin, so that where there is greater proneness to sin, a more severe punishment ought to be inflicted. As regards the ten tribes, they were punished not only for the sin of schism, but also for that of idolatry, as stated in the passage quoted.

Reply Obj. 2. Just as the good of the multitude is greater than the good of a unit in that multitude, so is it less than the extrinsic good to which that multitude is directed, even as the good of a rank of soldiers in the army is less than the good of the commander-in-chief. In like manner the good of ecclesiastical unity, to which schism is opposed, is less than the good of Divine truth, to which unbelief is opposed.

Reply Obj. 3. Charity has two objects; one is its principal object and is the Divine goodness, the other is its secondary object and is our neighbour's good. Now schism and other sins against our neighbour, are opposed to charity in respect of its secondary good, which is less than the object of faith, for this is God Himself; and so these sins are less grievous than unbelief. On the other hand, hatred of God, which is opposed to charity in respect of its principal object, is not less grievous than unbelief. Nevertheless of all sins committed by man against his neighbour, the sin of schism would seem to be the greatest, because it is opposed to the spiritual good of the multitude.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Schismatics Have Any Power?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that schismatics have some power.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (Contra Donat. i, 1):¹ "Just as those who come back to the Church after being baptized, are not baptized again, so those who return after being ordained, are not ordained again." Now Order is a kind of power. Therefore schismatics have some power since they retain their Orders.

Obj. 2. Further, Augustine says (De Unico Bapt.):² "One who is separated can confer a sacrament even as he can have it." But the power of conferring a sacrament is a very great power. Therefore schismatics who are separated from the Church, have a spiritual power.

Obj. 3. Further, Pope Urban II says:³ "We command that persons consecrated by bishops who were themselves consecrated according to the Catholic rite, but have separated themselves by schism from the Roman Church, should be received mercifully and that their Orders should be acknowledged, when they return to the unity of the Church, provided they be of commendable life and knowledge." But this would not be so, unless spiritual power were retained by schismatics. Therefore schismatics have spiritual power.

On the contrary, Cyprian says in a letter (Ep. lii):⁴ which is quoted in the Decretals:⁵ "He who observes neither unity of spirit nor the concord of peace, and severs himself from the bonds of the Church, and from the fellowship of her priests, cannot have episcopal power or honour."

I answer that, Spiritual power is twofold, the one sacramental, the other a power of jurisdiction. The sacramental power is one that is conferred by some kind of consecration. Now all the consecrations of the Church are immovable so long as the consecrated thing remains, as appears even in inanimate things, since an altar, once consecrated, is not consecrated again unless it has been broken up. Consequently such a power as this remains, as to its essence, in the man who has received it by consecration, as long as he lives, even if he fall into schism or heresy; and this appears from the fact that if he come back to the Church, he is not consecrated again. Since, however, the lower power ought not to exercise its act except in so far as it is moved by the higher power, as may be seen even in natural things, it follows that such persons lose the use of their power, so that it is not lawful for them to use it. Yet if they use it, this power has its effect in sacramental acts, because in these things man acts only as God's instrument, so that sacramental effects are not precluded on account of any fault whatever in the person who confers the sacrament.

On the other hand, the power of jurisdiction is that which is conferred by a mere human appointment. Such a power as this does not stay with the recipient immovably, so that it does not remain in heretics and schismatics; and consequently they neither absolve nor excommunicate, nor grant indulgence, nor do anything of the kind, and if they do, it is invalid.

Accordingly when it is said that such persons have no spiritual power, it is to be understood as referring either to the second power, or if it be referred to the first power, not as referring to the essence of the power, but to its lawful use.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

ARTICLE 4. Whether It Is Right That Schismatics Should Be Punished With Excommunication?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that schismatics are not rightly punished with excommunication.

Objection 1. For excommunication deprives a man chiefly of a share in the sacraments. But Augustine says (Contra Donat. vi, 5)¹ that Baptism can be received from a schismatic. Therefore it seems that excommunication is not a fitting punishment for schismatics.

Obj. 2. Further, It is the duty of Christ's faithful to lead back those who have gone astray, and so it is written against certain persons (Ezech. 34, 4): That which was driven away you have not brought again, neither have you sought that which was lost. Now schismatics are more easily brought back by such as may hold communion with them. Therefore it seems that they ought not to be excommunicated.

Obj. 3. Further, A double punishment is not inflicted for one and the same sin, according to Nahum 1, 9: God will not judge the same twice (Septuagint Version.). Now some receive a temporal punishment for the sin of schism, according to xxiii, Q. v.,² where it is stated: "Both divine and earthly laws have laid down that those who are severed from the unity of the Church, and disturb her peace, must be punished by the secular power." Therefore they ought not to be punished with excommunication.

On the contrary, It is written (Num. 16, 26): Depart from the tents of these wicked men, those, namely, who had caused the schism, and touch nothing of theirs, lest you be involved in their sins.

I answer that, According to Wisd. 11, 17, By what things a man sinneth, by the same also he should be punished (Vulg.,—he is tormented). Now a schismatic, as shown above (A. 1), commits a twofold sin. first by separating himself from communion with the members of the Church, and in this respect the fitting punishment for schismatics is that they be excommunicated. Secondly, they refuse submission to the head of the Church, and therefore, since they are unwilling to be controlled by the Church's spiritual power, it is just that they should be compelled by the secular power.

Reply Obj. 1. It is not lawful to receive Baptism from a schismatic save in a case of necessity, since it is better for a man to quit this life marked with the sign of Christ, no matter from whom he may receive it, whether from a Jew or a pagan, than deprived of that mark, which is bestowed in Baptism.

Reply Obj. 2. Excommunication does not forbid the intercourse by which a person by salutary admonitions leads back to the unity of the Church those who are separated from her. Indeed this very separation brings them back somewhat, because through confusion at their separation, they are sometimes led to do penance.

Reply Obj. 3. The punishments of the present life are medicinal, and therefore when one punishment does not suffice to compel a man, another is added, just as physicians employ several bodily medicines when one has no effect. In like manner the Church, when excommunication does not sufficiently restrain certain men, employs the compulsion of the secular arm. If, however, one punishment suffices, another should not be employed.

QUESTION XL OF WAR (In Four Articles)

WE must now consider war, under which head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether some kind of war is lawful? (2) Whether it is lawful for clerics to fight? (3) Whether it is lawful for belligerents to lay ambushes? (4) Whether it is lawful to fight on holy days?

ARTICLE 1. Whether It is Always Sinful To Wage War?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that it is always sinful to wage war.

Objection 1. Because punishment is not inflicted except for sin. Now those who wage war are threatened by Our Lord with punishment, according to Matt. 26. 52: All that take the sword shall perish with the sword. Therefore all wars are unlawful.

Obj. 2. Further, Whatever is contrary to a Divine precept is a sin. But war is contrary to a Divine precept, for it is written (Matt. 5. 39): But I say to you not to resist evil; and (Rom. 12. 19): Not revenging yourselves, my dearly beloved, but give place unto wrath. Therefore war is always sinful.

Obj. 3. Further, Nothing, except sin, is contrary to an act of virtue. But war is contrary to peace. Therefore war is always a sin.

Obj. 4. Further, The exercise of a lawful thing is itself lawful, as is evident in exercises of the sciences. But warlike exercises which take place in tournaments are forbidden by the Church, since those who are slain in these trials are deprived of ecclesiastical burial. Therefore it seems that war is a sin absolutely.

On the contrary, Augustine says in a sermon on the son of the centurion:¹ "If the Christian Religion forbade war altogether, those who sought salutary advice in the Gospel would rather have been counselled to cast aside their arms, and to give up soldiering altogether. On the contrary, they were told: 'Do violence to no man; . . . and be content with your pay' (Luke 3. 14). If he commanded them to be content with their pay, he did not forbid soldiering."

I answer that, In order for a war to be just, three things are necessary. First, the authority of the sovereign by whose command the war is to be waged. For it is not the business of a private person to declare war, because he can seek for redress of his rights from the tribunal of his superior. Moreover it is not the business of a private person to summon together the people, which has to be done in wartime. And as the care of the common weal is committed to those who are in authority, it is their business to watch over the common weal of the city, kingdom or province subject to them. And just as it is lawful for them to have recourse to the material sword in defending that common weal against internal disturbances, when they punish evil-doers, according to the words of the Apostle (Rom. 13. 4): He beareth not the sword in vain: for he is God's minister, an avenger to execute wrath upon him that doth evil; so too, it is their business to have recourse to the sword of war in defending the common weal against external enemies. Hence it is said to those who are in authority (Ps. 81. 4): Rescue the poor: and deliver the needy out of the hand of the sinner; and for this reason Augustine says (Contra Faust. xxii, 75):² "The natural order conducive to peace among mortals demands that the power to declare and counsel war should be in the hands of those who hold the supreme authority."

Secondly, a just cause is required, namely that those who are attacked should be attacked because they deserve it on account of some fault. Therefore Augustine says (q. x, super Jos.):³ "A just war is usually described as one that avenges wrongs, when a nation or state has to be punished, for refusing to make amends for the wrongs inflicted by its subjects, or to restore what it has seized unjustly."

Thirdly, it is necessary that the belligerents should have a right intention, so that they intend the advancement of good, or the avoidance of evil. Hence Augustine says (De Verb. Dom.):⁴ "True religion does not look upon as sinful those wars that are waged not for motives of aggrandisement, or cruelty, but with the object of securing peace, of punishing evil-doers, and of uplifting the good." For it may happen that the war is declared by the legitimate authority, and for a just cause, and yet be rendered unlawful through a wicked intention. Hence Augustine says (Contra Faust. xxii):⁵ "The passion for inflicting harm, the cruel thirst for vengeance, an unpacific and relentless spirit, the fever of revolt, the lust of power, and such things, all these are rightly condemned in war."

Reply Obj. 1. As Augustine says (Contra Faust. xxii):⁶ "To take the sword is to arm oneself in order to take the life of anyone, without the command or permission of superior or lawful authority." On the other hand, to have recourse to the sword (as a private person) by the authority of the sovereign or judge, or (as a public person) through zeal for justice, and by the authority, so to speak, of God, is not to take the sword, but to use it as commissioned by another, and so it does not deserve punishment. And yet even those who make sinful use of the sword are not always slain with the sword, but they always perish with their own sword, because, unless they repent, they are punished eternally for their sinful use of the sword.

Reply Obj. 2. Precepts of this kind, as Augustine observes (De Serm. Dom. in Monte, i),¹ should always be borne in readiness of mind, so that we be ready to obey them, and, if necessary, to refrain from resistance or self-defence. Nevertheless it is necessary sometimes for a man to act otherwise for the common good, or for the good of those with whom he is fighting. Hence Augustine says (Ep. ad Marcellin.):² "Those whom we have to punish with a kindly severity, it is necessary to handle in many ways against their will. For when we are stripping a man of the lawlessness of sin, it is good for him to be vanquished, since nothing is more hopeless than the happiness of sinners, whence arises a guilty impunity, and an evil will, like an internal enemy."

Reply Obj. 3. Those who wage war justly aim at peace, and so they are not opposed to peace, except to the evil peace, which Our Lord came not to send upon earth (Matt. 10. 34). Hence Augustine says (Ep. ad Bonif. clxxxix):³ "We do not seek peace in order to be at war, but we go to war that we may have peace. Be peaceful, therefore, in warring, so that you may vanquish those whom you war against, and bring them to the prosperity of peace."

Reply Obj. 4. Manly exercises in warlike feats of arms are not all forbidden, but those which are inordinate and perilous, and end in slaying or plundering. In olden times warlike exercises presented no such danger, and hence they were called exercises of arms or bloodless wars, as Jerome states in an epistle (cf. Veget., —De Re Milit. i).⁴

ARTICLE 2. Whether It Is Lawful for Clerics and Bishops To Fight?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems lawful for clerics and bishops to fight.

Objection 1. For, as stated above (A. 1), wars are lawful and just in so far as they protect the poor and the entire common weal from suffering at the hands of the foe. Now this seems to be above all the duty of prelates, for Gregory says (Hom. in Ev. xiv):⁵ "The wolf comes upon the sheep, when any unjust and rapacious man oppresses those who are faithful and humble. But he who was thought to be the shepherd, and was not, leaveth the sheep, and flieth, for he fears lest the wolf hurt him, and dares not stand up against his injustice." Therefore it is lawful for prelates and clerics to fight.

Obj. 2. Further, Pope Leo IV writes (xxiii, qu. 8, can. Igitur):⁶ "As adverse tidings had frequently come from the Saracen side, some said that the Saracens would come to the port of Rome secretly and covertly; for which reason we commanded our people to gather together, and ordered them to go down to the sea-shore." Therefore it is lawful for bishops to fight.

Obj. 3. Further, It seems to be the same whether a man does a thing himself, or consents to its being done by another, according to Rom. 1. 32: They who do such things, are worthy of death, and not only they that do them, but they also that consent to them that do them. Now those, above all, seem to consent to a thing, who induce others to do it. But it is lawful for bishops and clerics to induce others to fight, for it is written (xxiii, qu. 8, can. Hortatu)⁷ that "Charles went to war with the Lombards at the instance and entreaty of Adrian, bishop of Rome." Therefore they also are allowed to fight.

Obj. 4. Further, Whatever is right and meritorious in itself is lawful for prelates and clerics. Now it is sometimes right and meritorious to make war, for it is written (xxiii, qu. 8, can. Omni timore)⁸ that "if a man die for the true faith, or to save his country, or in defence of Christians, God will give him a heavenly reward." Therefore it is lawful for bishops and clerics to fight.

On the contrary, It was said to Peter as representing bishops and clerics (Matt. 26. 52): Put up again thy sword into the scabbard (Vulg., —its place). Therefore it is not lawful for them to fight.

I answer that, Several things are requisite for the good of a human society, and a number of things are done better and quicker by a number of persons than by one, as the Philosopher observes,⁹ while certain occupations are so inconsistent with one another, that they cannot be fittingly exercised at the same time; hence those who are assigned to important duties are forbidden to occupy themselves with things of small importance. Thus according to human laws, soldiers who are assigned to warlike pursuits are forbidden to engage in commerce.

Now warlike pursuits are altogether incompatible with the duties of a bishop and a cleric for two reasons. The first reason is a general one, because, namely, warlike pursuits are full of unrest, so that they hinder the mind very much from the contemplation of Divine things, the praise of God, and prayers for the people, which belong to the duties of a cleric. Therefore just as commercial enterprises are forbidden to clerics, because they entangle the mind too much, so too are warlike pursuits, according to II Tim. 2. 4: No man being a soldier to God, entangleth himself with secular business. The second reason is a special one, because, namely, all the clerical Orders are directed to the ministry of the altar, on which the Passion of Christ is represented sacramentally, according to I Cor. 11. 26. As often as you shall eat this bread, and drink the chalice, you shall show the death of the Lord, until He come. Therefore it is unbecoming for them to slay or shed blood, and it is more fitting that they should be ready to shed their own blood for Christ, so as to imitate in deed what they portray in their ministry. For this reason it has been decreed¹ that those who shed blood, even without sin, become irregular. Now no man who has a certain duty to perform can lawfully do that which renders him unfit for that duty. Therefore it is altogether unlawful for clerics to fight, because war is directed to the shedding of blood.

Reply Obj. 1. Prelates ought to withstand not only the wolf who brings spiritual death upon the flock, but also the pillager and the oppressor who work bodily harm; not, however, by having recourse themselves to material arms, but by means of spiritual weapons, according to the saying of the Apostle (II Cor. 10. 4): The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God. Such are salutary warnings, devout prayers, and, for those who are obstinate, the sentence of excommunication.

Reply Obj. 2. Prelates and clerics may, by the authority of their superiors, take part in wars, not indeed by taking up arms themselves, but by affording spiritual help to those who fight justly, by exhorting and absolving them, and by other like spiritual helps. Thus in the Old Testament (Jos. 6. 4) the priests were commanded to sound the sacred trumpets in the battle. It was for this purpose that bishops or clerics were first allowed to go to war; and it is an abuse of this permission, if any of them take up arms themselves.

Reply Obj. 3. As stated above (Q. xxiii, A. 4, reply 2) every power, art or virtue that pertains to the end, has to dispose that which is directed to the end. Now, among the faithful, carnal wars should be considered as having for their end the Divine spiritual good to which clerics are deputed. Therefore it is the duty of clerics to dispose and counsel other men to engage in just wars. For they are forbidden to take up arms, not as though it were a sin, but because such an occupation is unbecoming their persons.

Reply Obj. 4. Although it is meritorious to wage a just war, nevertheless it is rendered unlawful for clerics, by reason of their being assigned to works more meritorious still. Thus the marriage act may be meritorious; and yet it becomes reprehensible in those who have vowed virginity, because they are bound to a yet greater good.

ARTICLE 3. Whether It Is Lawful To Lay Ambushes in War?

We proceed thus to the Thrd Article: It seems that it is unlawful to lay ambushes in war.

Objection 1 For it is written (Deut. 16. 20): Thou shalt follow justly after that which is just. But ambushes, since they are a kind of deception, seem to pertain to injustice. Therefore it is unlawful to lay ambushes even in a just war.

Obj. 2. Further, Ambushes and deception seem to be opposed to faithfulness even as lies are. But since we are bound to keep faith with all men, it is wrong to lie to anyone, as Augustine states (Contra Mend. xv).² Therefore, as "one is bound to keep faith with one's enemy," as Augustine states (Ep. ad Bonifac. clxxxix),³ it seems that it is unlawful to lay ambushes for one's enemies.

Obj. 3. Further, It is written (Matt. 7. 12): Whatsoever you would that men should do to you, do you also to them, and we ought to observe this in all our dealings with our neighbour. Now our enemy is our neighbour. Therefore, since no man wishes ambushes or deceptions to be prepared for himself, it seems that no one ought to carry on war by laying ambushes.

On the contrary, Augustine says (QQ. in Heptateuch., qu. x, super Jos.):¹ "Provided the war be just, it is no concern of justice whether it be carried on openly or by ambushes," and he proves this by the authority of the Lord, Who commanded Joshua to lay ambushes for the city of Hai (Jos. 8. 2).

I answer that, The object of laying ambushes is in order to deceive the enemy. Now a man may be deceived by another's word or deed in two ways. First, through being told something false, or through the breaking of a promise, and this is always unlawful. No one ought to deceive the enemy in this way, for there are certain rights of war and covenants, which ought to be observed even among enemies, as Ambrose states (De Offic. i. 29).²

Secondly, a man may be deceived by what we say or do, because we do not declare our purpose or meaning to him. Now we are not always bound to do this, since even in the Sacred Doctrine many things have to be concealed, especially from unbelievers, lest they deride it, according to Matt. 7. 6: Give not that which is holy, to dogs. Therefore much more ought the plan of campaign to be hidden from the enemy. For this reason among other things that a soldier has to learn is the art of concealing his purpose lest it come to the enemy's knowledge, as stated in the Book on Strategy by Frontinus.³ Concealment of this kind is what is meant by an ambush which may be lawfully employed in a just war. Nor can these ambushes be properly called deceptions, nor are they contrary to justice or to a well-ordered will. For a man would have an inordinate will if he were unwilling that others should hide from him.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

ARTICLE 4. Whether It is Lawful To Fight on Holy Days?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems unlawful to fight on holy days.

Objection 1. For holy days are instituted that we may give our time to the things of God. Hence they are included in the keeping of the Sabbath prescribed Exod. 20. 8, for Sabbath is interpreted rest. But wars are full of unrest. Therefore by no means is it lawful to fight on holy days.

Obj. 2. Further, Certain persons are reproached (Isa. 58. 3) because on fast-days they exacted what was owing to them, were guilty of strife, and of fighting with their fists. Much more, therefore, is it unlawful to fight on holy days.

Obj. 3. Further, No inordinate deed should be done to avoid temporal harm. But fighting on a holy day seems in itself to be an inordinate deed. Therefore no one should fight on a holy day even through the need of avoiding temporal harm.

On the contrary, It is written (I Machab. 2. 41): The Jews rightly determined . . . saying: Whosoever shall come up against us to fight on the Sabbath-day, we will fight against him.

I answer that, The observance of holy days is no hindrance to those things which are ordered to man's safety, even that of his body. Hence Our Lord argued with the Jews, saying (John 7. 23): Are you angry at Me because I have healed the whole man on the Sabbath-day? Hence physicians may lawfully attend to their patients on holy days. Yet much more reason is there for safeguarding the common weal (by which many are saved from being slain, and innumerable evils both temporal and spiritual prevented), than the bodily safety of an individual. Therefore, for the purpose of safeguarding the common weal of the faithful, it is lawful to carry on a war on holy days, provided there be need for doing so; because it would be to tempt God, if notwithstanding such a need, one were to choose to refrain from fighting. However, as soon as the need ceases, it is no longer lawful to fight on a holy day, for the reasons given. And this suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

QUESTION XLI

OF STRIFE

(In Two Articles)

WE must now consider strife,⁴ under which head there are two points of inquiry. (1) Whether strife is a sin? (2) Whether it is a daughter of anger?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Strife Is Always a Sin?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that strife is not always a sin.

Objection 1. For strife seems a kind of contention; hence Isidore says (Etym. x)⁵ that the word "rixosus (quarrelsome) is derived from the snarling (ricu) of a dog, because the quarrelsome man is ever ready to contradict; he delights in brawling, and provokes contention." Now contention is not always a sin. Neither, therefore, is strife.

⁵ PL 82, 392.

Obj. 2. Further, It is related (Gen. 26. 21) that the servants of Isaac digged another well, and for that they quarrelled likewise. Now it is not credible that the household of Isaac quarrelled publicly, without being reproved by him, supposing it were a sin. Therefore strife is not a sin.

Obj. 3. Further, Strife seems to be a war between individuals. But war is not always sinful. Therefore strife is not always a sin.

On the contrary, Strifes¹ are reckoned among the works of the flesh (Gal. 5. 20), and they who do such things shall not obtain the kingdom of God. Therefore strifes are not only sinful, but they are even mortal sins.

I answer that, While contention implies a contradiction of words, strife denotes a certain contradiction of deeds. Hence a gloss on Gal. 5. 20 says² that strifes are "when persons strike one another through anger." Hence strife is a kind of private war, because it takes place between private persons, being declared not by public authority, but rather by a disordered will. Therefore strife is always sinful. In fact it is a mortal sin in the man who attacks another unjustly, for it is not without mortal sin that one inflicts harm on another even if the deed be done by the hands. But in him who defends himself, it may be without sin, or it may sometimes involve a venial sin, or sometimes a mortal sin; and this depends on his purpose and on his manner of defending himself. For if his sole purpose be to withstand the injury done to him, and he defend himself with due moderation, it is no sin, and one cannot say properly that there is strife on his part. But if, on the other hand, his self-defence be inspired by vengeance and hatred, it is always a sin. It is a venial sin, if a slight movement of hatred or vengeance obtrude itself, or if he does not much exceed moderation in defending himself; but it is a mortal sin if he makes for his assailant with the fixed intention of killing him, or inflicting grievous harm on him.

Reply Obj. 1. Strife is not just the same as contention, and there are three things in the passage quoted from Isidore, which express the inordinate nature of strife. First, the quarrelsome man is always ready to fight, and this is conveyed by the words, "ever ready to contradict," that is to say, whether the other man says or does well or ill. Secondly, he delights in quarrelling itself, and so the passage proceeds,

"and delights in brawling." Thirdly, he provokes others to quarrel, and thus it goes on, "and provokes contention."

Reply Obj. 2. The sense of the text is not that the servants of Isaac quarrelled, but that the inhabitants of that country quarrelled with them. Therefore these sinned, and not the servants of Isaac, who bore the calumny (cf. Gen. 21. 20).

Reply Obj. 3. In order for a war to be just it must be declared by authority of the governing power, as stated above (Q. XL, A. 1), strife however proceeds from a private feeling of anger or hatred. For if the servants of a sovereign or judge, in virtue of their public authority, attack certain men and these defend themselves, it is not the former who are said to be guilty of strife, but those who resist the public authority. Hence it is not the assailants in this case who are guilty of strife and commit sin, but those who defend themselves beyond order.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Strife Is a Daughter of Anger?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that strife is not a daughter of anger.

Objection 1. For it is written (James 4. 1): Whence are wars and contentions? Are they not . . . from your concupiscences, which war in your members? But anger is not in the concupiscible part. Therefore strife is a daughter, not of anger, but of concupiscence.

Obj. 2. Further, It is written (Prov. 28. 25): He that boasteth and puffeth up himself, stirreth up quarrels. Now strife is apparently the same as quarrel. Therefore it seems that strife is a daughter of pride or vainglory which make a man boast and puff himself up.

Obj. 3. Further, It is written (Prov. 18. 6): The lips of a fool intermeddle with strife. Now folly differs from anger, for it is opposed, not to meekness, but to wisdom or prudence. Therefore strife is not a daughter of anger.

Obj. 4. Further, It is written (Prov. 10. 12): Hatred stirreth up strifes. But "hatred arises from envy," according to Gregory (Moral. xxxi, 45).³ Therefore strife is not a daughter of anger, but of envy.

Obj. 5. Further, It is written (Prov. 17. 19): He that studieth discords, soweth (Vulg.,—loveth) quarrels. But discord is a daughter of vainglory, as stated above (Q. xxxvii, A. 2). Therefore strife is also.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Moral. xxxi, 45)⁴ that "anger gives rise to strife"; and it

is written (Prov. 15. 18; 29. 22): A passionate man stirreth up strifes.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1), strife denotes an antagonism extending to deeds, when one man designs to harm another. Now there are two ways in which one man may intend to harm another. In one way it is as though he intended absolutely the other's hurt, which in this case is the outcome of hatred, for the intention of hatred is directed to the hurt of one's enemy either openly or secretly. In another way a man intends to hurt another who knows and withstands his intention. This is what we mean by strife, and it belongs properly to anger which is the desire of vengeance, for the angry man is not content to hurt secretly the object of his anger, he even wishes him to feel the hurt and know that what he suffers is in revenge for what he has done, as may be seen from what has been said above about the passion of anger (Part I-II, Q. XLVI, A. 6, Reply 2). Therefore, properly speaking, strife arises from anger.

Reply Obj. 1. As stated above (Part I-II, Q. XXV, AA 1, 2), all the irascible passions arise from those of the concupiscible part, so that whatever is the immediate outcome of anger, arises also from concupiscence as from its first root.

Reply Obj. 2. Boasting and puffing up of self which are the result of anger or vainglory, are not the direct but the occasional cause of quarrels or strife, because, when a man resents another being preferred to him, his anger is aroused, and then his anger results in quarrel and strife.

Reply Obj. 3. Anger, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XLVIII, A. 3) hinders the judgment of the reason, so that it bears a likeness to folly. Hence they have a common effect, since it is due to a defect in the reason that a man designs to hurt another inordinately.

Reply Obj. 4. Although strife sometimes arises from hatred, it is not the proper effect of hate, because when one man hates another it is beside his intention to hurt him in a quarrelsome and open manner, since sometimes he seeks to hurt him secretly. When, however, he sees himself prevailing, he endeavours to harm him with strife and quarrel. But to hurt a man in a quarrel is the proper effect of anger, for the reason given above.

Reply Obj. 5. Strifes give rise to hatred and discord in the hearts of those who are guilty of strife, and so he that "studies," that is intends to sow discord among others, causes them to quarrel among themselves. Even so any sin may command the act of another sin, by directing it to its own end. This does not, however, prove that strife is the daughter of vainglory properly and directly.

QUESTION XLII OF SEDITION (In Two Articles)

WE must now consider sedition, under which head there are two points of inquiry. (1) Whether it is a special sin? (2) Whether it is a mortal sin?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Sedition Is a Special Sin Distinct from Other Sins?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that sedition is not a special sin distinct from other sins.

Objection 1. For, according to Isidore (Etym. x),¹ "a seditious man is one who sows dissent among minds, and begets discord." Now, by provoking the commission of a sin, a man sins by no other kind of sin than that which he provoked. Therefore it seems that sedition is not a special sin distinct from discord.

Obj. 2 Further, Sedition denotes a kind of division. Now schism takes its name from scission, as stated above (Q. XXXIX, A. 1). Therefore it seems that the sin of sedition is not distinct from that of schism.

Obj. 3. Further, Every special sin that is distinct from other sins, is either a capital vice, or arises from some capital vice. Now sedition is reckoned neither among the capital vices, nor among those vices which arise from them, as appears from Moral. xxxi,² where both kinds of vice are enumerated. Therefore sedition is not a special sin, distinct from other sins.

On the contrary, Seditions are mentioned as distinct from other sins (II Cor. 12. 20).

I answer that, Sedition is a special sin, having something in common with war and strife, and differing somewhat from them. It has something in common with them, in so far as it implies a certain antagonism, and it differs from them in two points. First, because war and strife denote actual aggression on either side, while sedition may be said to denote either actual aggression, or the preparation for such aggression. Hence a gloss on II Cor. 12. 20 says³ that "seditions are tumults tending to fight," when, that is, a number of people make preparations with the intention of fighting. Secondly, they differ in that war is, properly speaking, carried on against external foes, being as it were between one people and another, while strife is between one individual and another, or between few people on one side and few on the other, while sedition, in its proper sense, is between the mutually dissentient parts of one people, as when one part of the state rises in tumult against another part. Therefore, since sedition is opposed to a special kind of good, namely the unity and peace of a people, it is a special kind of sin.

Reply Obj. 1. A seditious man is one who incites others to sedition, and since sedition denotes a kind of discord, it follows that a seditious man is one who creates discord, not of any kind, but between the parts of a multitude. And the sin of sedition is not only in him who sows discord, but also in those who dissent from one another inordinately.

Reply Obj. 2. Sedition differs from schism in two respects. First, because schism is opposed to the spiritual unity of the multitude, namely ecclesiastical unity, while sedition is contrary to the temporal or secular unity of the multitude, for instance of a city or kingdom. Secondly, schism does not imply any preparation for a bodily fight as sedition does, but only a spiritual dissent.

Reply Obj. 3. Sedition, like schism, is contained under discord, since each is a kind of discord, not between individuals, but between the parts of a multitude.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Sedition Is Always a Mortal Sin?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that sedition is not always a mortal sin.

Objection 1. For sedition denotes "a tumult tending to fight," according to the gloss quoted above (A. 1). But fighting is not always a mortal sin; indeed it is sometimes just and lawful, as stated above (Q. XL, A. 1; Q. XLI, A. 1). Much more, therefore, can sedition be without a mortal sin.

Obj. 2. Further, Sedition is a kind of discord, as stated above (A. 1, reply 3). Now discord can be without mortal sin, and sometimes without any sin at all. Therefore sedition can be also.

Obj. 3. Further, It is praiseworthy to deliver a multitude from a tyrannical rule. Yet this cannot easily be done without some dissension in the multitude, if one part of the multitude seeks to retain the tyrant, while the rest strive to dethrone him. Therefore there can be sedition without mortal sin.

On the contrary, The Apostle forbids seditions together with other things that are mortal sins (II Cor. 12. 20).

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1), sedition is contrary to the unity of the multitude, that is, the people of a city or kingdom. Now Augustine says¹ that wise men understand the word people to designate "not any crowd of persons, but the assembly of those who are united together in fellowship recognized by law and for the common good." Therefore it is evident that the unity to which sedition is opposed is the unity of law and common good; hence it follows manifestly that sedition is opposed to justice and the common good. Therefore by reason of its genus it is a mortal sin, and its gravity will be all the greater according as the common good which it assails surpasses the private good which is assailed by strife.

Accordingly the sin of sedition is first and chiefly in its authors, who sin most grievously; and secondly it is in those who are led by them to disturb the common good. Those, however, who defend the common good, and withstand the seditious party, are not themselves seditious, even as neither is a man to be called quarrelsome because he defends himself, as stated above (Q. XLI, A. 1).

Reply Obj. 1. It is lawful to fight, provided it be for the common good, as stated above (Q. XL, A. 1). But sedition runs counter to the common good of the multitude, so that it is always a mortal sin.

Reply Obj. 2. Discord from what is not evidently good may be without sin, but discord from what is evidently good cannot be without sin; and sedition is discord of this kind, for it is contrary to the unity of the multitude, which is a manifest good.

Reply Obj. 3. A tyrannical government is not just, because it is directed, not to the common good, but to the private good of the ruler, as the Philosopher states.² Consequently there is no sedition in disturbing a government of this kind, unless indeed the tyrant's rule be disturbed so inordinately that his subjects suffer greater harm from the consequent disturbance than from the tyrant's government. Indeed it is the tyrant rather that is guilty of sedition, since he encourages discord and sedition among his subjects, that he may lord over them more securely; for this is tyranny, since it is ordered to the private good of the ruler and to the injury of the multitude.

QUESTION XLIII

OF SCANDAL

(In Eight Articles)

IT remains for us to consider the vices which are opposed to beneficence, among which some come under the head of injustice, those, namely, whereby one harms one's neighbour unjustly. But scandal seems to be specially opposed to charity. Accordingly we must here consider scandal, under which head there are eight points of inquiry: (1) What is scandal? (2) Whether scandal is a sin? (3) Whether it is a special sin? (4) Whether it is a mortal sin? (5) Whether the perfect can be scandalized? (6) Whether they can give scandal? (7) Whether spiritual goods are to be given up on account of scandal? (8) Whether temporal things are to be given up on account of scandal?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Scandal Is Fittingly Defined As Being Something Less Rightly Said or Done That Occasions Spiritual Downfall?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that scandal is unfittingly defined as "something less rightly said or done that occasions spiritual downfall"

Objection 1. For scandal is a sin as we shall state further on (A. 2). Now, according to Augustine (Contra Faust. xxii, 27),¹ "a sin is a word, deed, or desire contrary to the law of God" Therefore the definition given above is insufficient, since it omits thought or desire.

Obj. 2. Further, Since among virtuous or right acts one is more virtuous or more right than another, that one alone which has perfect rectitude would not seem to be a less right one. If, therefore, scandal is something less rightly said or done, it follows that every virtuous act except the best of all, is a scandal.

Obj. 3. Further, An occasion is an accidental cause. But nothing accidental should enter a definition, because it does not specify the thing defined. Therefore it is unfitting, in defining scandal, to say that it is an occasion.

Obj. 4. Further, Whatever a man does may be the occasion of another's spiritual downfall, because accidental causes are indeterminate. Consequently, if scandal is something that occasions another's spiritual downfall, any deed or word can be a scandal. And this seems unreasonable.

Obj. 5. Further, A man occasions his neighbour's spiritual downfall when he offends or weakens him. Now scandal is divided against offence and weakness, for the Apostle says (Rom. 14. 21): It is good not to eat flesh, and not to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother is offended, or scandalized, or weakened. Therefore the above definition of scandal is unfitting.

On the contrary, Jerome in expounding Matt. 15. 12, Dost thou know that the Pharisees, when they heard this word, etc., says:² "When we read 'Whosoever shall scandalize,' the sense is 'Whosoever shall, by deed or word, occasion another's downfall.'"

I answer that, As Jerome observes (ibid) "the Greek σκάνδαλον may be rendered offence, downfall, or a stumbling against something." For when a body, while moving along a path, meets with an obstacle, it may happen to stumble against it, and be disposed to fall down; such an obstacle is a σκάνδαλον. In like manner, while going along the spiritual way, a man may be disposed to a spiritual downfall by another's word or deed, in so far, that is, as one man by his injunction, inducement or example, moves another to sin; and this is scandal properly so called. Now nothing by its very nature disposes a man to spiritual downfall except that which has some lack of rectitude, since what is perfectly right secures man against a fall, instead of conducing to his downfall. Scandal is, therefore, fittingly defined as "something less rightly done or said, that occasions another's spiritual downfall"

Reply Obj. 1. The thought or desire of evil lies hidden in the heart, and therefore it does not suggest itself to another man as an obstacle conducing to his spiritual downfall; hence it cannot come under the head of scandal.

Reply Obj. 2. A thing is said to be less right, not because something else surpasses it in rectitude, but because it has some lack of rectitude, either through being evil in itself, such as sin, or through having an appearance of evil. Thus, for instance, if a man were to sit at meat in the idol's temple (I Cor. 8. 10), though this is not sinful in itself, provided it be done with no evil intention, yet, since it has a certain appearance of evil, and a semblance of worshipping the idol, it might occasion another man's spiritual downfall. Hence the Apostle says (I Thessal. 5. 22): From all appearance of evil refrain yourselves. Scandal is therefore fittingly described as something done "less rightly," so as to comprise both whatever is sinful in itself, and all that has an appearance of evil.

Reply Obj. 3. As stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXXV, AA. 2, 3; Q. LXXX, A. 1), nothing can be a sufficient cause of a man's spiritual downfall, which is sin, save his own will. Therefore another man's words or deeds can only be an imperfect cause, conducing somewhat to that downfall. For this reason scandal is said to afford not a cause, but an occasion, which is an imperfect, and not always an accidental cause. Nor is there any reason why certain definitions should not make mention of things that are accidental, since what is accidental to one may be proper to something else; thus the accidental cause is mentioned in the definition of chance.¹

Reply Obj. 4. Another's word or deed may be the cause of another's sin in two ways, directly and accidentally. Directly, when a man either intends, by his evil word or deed, to lead another man into sin, or, if he does not so intend, when his deed is of such a character as to lead another into sin; for instance, when a man publicly commits a sin or does something that has an appearance of sin. In this case he that does such an act does, properly speaking, afford an occasion of another's spiritual downfall, and so his act is called "active scandal"—One man's word or deed is the accidental cause of another's sin, when he neither intends to lead him into sin, nor does what is of a nature to lead him into sin, and yet this other one, through being ill-disposed, is led into sin, for instance, into envy of another's good, and then he who does this righteous act, does not, so far as he is concerned, afford an occasion of the other's downfall, but it is this other one who takes the occasion according to Rom. 7. 8: Sin taking occasion by the commandment wrought in me all manner of concupiscence. Therefore this is passive, without active scandal, since he that acts rightly does not, for his own part, afford the occasion of the other's downfall. Sometimes therefore it happens that there is active scandal in the one together with passive scandal in the other, as when one commits a sin being induced to it by another; sometimes there is active without passive scandal, for instance when one, by word or deed, provokes another to sin, and the latter does not consent; and sometimes there is passive without active scandal, as we have already said.

Reply Obj. 5. Weakness denotes proneness to scandal; while offence signifies resentment against the person who commits a sin, which resentment may be sometimes without spiritual downfall; and scandal is the stumbling that results in downfall.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Scandal Is a Sin?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that scandal is not a sin.

Objection 1. For sins do not occur from necessity, since all sin is voluntary, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. LXXIV, A. 1; Q. LXXX, A. 1). Now it is written (Matt. 18. 7): It must needs be that scandals come. Therefore scandal is not a sin.

Obj. 2. Further, No sin arises from a sense of dutifulness, because a good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit (Matt. 7. 18). But scandal may come from a sense of dutifulness, for Our Lord said to Peter (Matt. 16. 23): Thou art a scandal unto Me, in reference to which words Jerome says² that "the Apostle's error was due to his sense of dutifulness, and such is never inspired by the devil." Therefore scandal is not always a sin.

Obj. 3. Further, Scandal denotes a stumbling. But he that stumbles does not always fall. Therefore scandal, which is a spiritual fall, can be without sin.

On the contrary, Scandal is "something less rightly said or done"³ Now anything that lacks rectitude is a sin. Therefore scandal is always with sin.

I answer that, As already stated (A. 1, reply 4), scandal is of two kinds, passive scandal in the person scandalized, and active scandal in the person who gives scandal, and so occasions a downfall. Accordingly passive scandal is always a sin in the person scandalized; for he is not scandalized except in so far as he succumbs to a spiritual downfall, and that is a sin.

Yet there can be passive scandal without sin on the part of the person whose action has occasioned the scandal, as for instance, when a person is scandalized at another's good deed. In like manner active scandal is always a sin in the person who gives scandal, since either what he does is a sin, or if it only have the appearance of sin, it should always be left undone out of that love for our neighbour which binds each one to be solicitous for his neighbour's salvation, so that if he persists in doing it he acts against charity. Yet there can be active scandal without sin on the part of the person scandalized, as stated above (A. 1, reply 4).

Reply Obj. 1. These words, It must needs be that scandals come, are to be understood to convey not the absolute, but the conditional necessity of scandal; in which sense it is necessary that whatever God foresees or foretells must happen, provided it be taken together with such foreknowledge, as explained in the First Part (Q. XIV, A. 13, reply 3; Q. XXIII, A. 6, reply 2).

³ Aristotle, Physics, II, 5 (197^a5).

Or we may say that the necessity of scandals occurring is a necessity of end, because they are useful in order that they . . . who are re-proved may be made manifest (I Cor. 11. 19).

Or scandals must occur because of the condition of man who fails to shield himself from sin. Thus a physician on seeing a man partaking of unsuitable food might say that such a man must injure his health, which is to be understood on the condition that he does not change his diet. In like manner it must be that scandals come so long as men fail to change their evil mode of living.

Reply Obj. 2. In that passage scandal is taken in the wide sense for any kind of hindrance. For Peter wished to hinder Our Lord's Passion out of a sense of dutifulness towards Christ.

Reply Obj. 3. No man stumbles spiritually, without being kept back somewhat from advancing in God's way, and that is at least a venial sin.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Scandal Is a Special Sin?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that scandal is not a special sin.

Objection 1. For scandal is "something said or done less rightly."¹ But this applies to every kind of sin. Therefore every sin is a scandal, and consequently, scandal is not a special sin.

Obj. 2. Further, Every special kind of sin, or every special kind of injustice, may be found separately from other kinds, as stated in the Ethics.² But scandal is not to be found separately from other sins. Therefore it is not a special kind of sin.

Obj. 3. Further, Every special sin is constituted by something which specifies the moral act. But the notion of scandal consists in its being something done in the presence of others, and the fact of a sin being committed openly, though it is an aggravating circumstance, does not seem to constitute the species of a sin. Therefore scandal is not a special sin.

On the contrary, A special virtue has a special sin opposed to it. But scandal is opposed to a special virtue, namely charity. For it is written (Rom. 14. 15): If, because of thy meat, thy brother be grieved, thou walkest not now according to charity. Therefore scandal is a special sin.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1, reply 4; A. 2), scandal is twofold, active and passive. Passive scandal cannot be a special sin, because through another's word or deed a man may fall into any kind of sin; and the fact that a man takes occasion to sin from another's word or deed does not constitute a special kind of sin, because it does not imply a special deformity in opposition to a special virtue.

On the other hand, active scandal may be understood in two ways, directly and accidentally. The scandal is accidental when it is beside the agent's intention, as when a man does not intend, by his inordinate deed or word, to occasion another's spiritual downfall, but merely to satisfy his own will. In such a case even active scandal is not a special sin, because a species is not constituted by that which is accidental.

Active scandal is direct when a man intends, by his inordinate word or deed, to draw another into sin, and then it becomes a special kind of sin on account of the intention of a special kind of end, because moral actions take their species from their end, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. I, A. 3; Q. XVIII, A. 6). Hence, just as theft and murder are special kinds of sin, on account of their denoting the intention of doing a special injury to one's neighbour, so too, scandal is a special kind of sin, because thereby a man intends a special harm to his neighbour, and it is directly opposed to fraternal correction, by which a man intends the removal of a special kind of harm.

Reply Obj. 1. Any sin may be the matter of active scandal, but it may derive the formal aspect of a special sin from the end intended, as stated above.

Reply Obj. 2. Active scandal can be found separate from other sins, as when a man scandalizes his neighbour by a deed which is not a sin in itself, but has an appearance of evil.

Reply Obj. 3. Scandal does not derive the species of a special sin from the circumstance in question, but from the intention of the end, as stated above.

ARTICLE 4. Whether Scandal Is a Mortal Sin?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that scandal is a mortal sin.

Objection 1. For every sin that is contrary to charity is a mortal sin, as stated above (Q. XXXV, A. 3; Part I-II, Q. LXXXVIII, A. 2). But scandal is contrary to charity, as stated above

² Aristotle, v, 2 (1130^a19).

(AA. 2, 3): Therefore scandal is a mortal sin.

Obj. 2. Further, No sin except mortal sin deserves the punishment of eternal damnation. But scandal deserves the punishment of eternal damnation, according to Matt. 18. 6: He that shall scandalize one of these little ones, that believe in Me, it were better for him that a millstone should be hanged about his neck, and that he should be drowned in the depth of the sea. For, as Jerome says on this passage,¹ "it is much better to receive a brief punishment for a fault, than to await everlasting torments." Therefore scandal is a mortal sin.

Obj. 3. Further, Every sin committed against God is a mortal sin, because mortal sin alone turns man away from God. Now scandal is a sin against God, for the Apostle says (I Cor. 8. 12): When you wound the weak conscience of the brethren, (Vulg.,—When you sin thus against the brethren and wound their weak conscience.) you sin against Christ. Therefore scandal is always a mortal sin.

On the contrary, It may be a venial sin to lead a person into venial sin, and yet this would be to give scandal. Therefore scandal may be a venial sin.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1), scandal denotes a stumbling by which a person is disposed to a spiritual downfall. Consequently passive scandal may sometimes be a venial sin, when it consists in a stumbling and nothing more, for instance, when a person is disturbed by a movement of venial sin occasioned by another's inordinate word or deed. But sometimes it is a mortal sin, when the stumbling results in a downfall, for instance when a person goes so far as to commit a mortal sin through another's inordinate word or deed.

Active scandal, if it be accidental, may sometimes be a venial sin; for instance, when, through a slight indiscretion, a person either commits a venial sin, or does something that is not a sin in itself, but has some appearance of evil. On the other hand, it is sometimes a mortal sin, either because a person commits a mortal sin, or because he has such contempt for his neighbour's spiritual welfare that he declines, for the sake of procuring it, to forego doing what he wishes to do. But in the case of active direct scandal, as when a person intends to lead another into sin, if he intends to lead him into mortal sin, his own sin will be mortal; and in like manner if he intends by committing a mortal sin himself to lead another into venial sin. But if he intends, by committing a venial sin, to lead another into venial sin, there will be a venial sin of scandal.

And this suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

ARTICLE 5. Whether Passive Scandal May Happen Even to the Perfect?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It seems that passive scandal may happen even to the perfect.

Objection 1. For Christ was supremely perfect; and yet He said to Peter (Matt. 16. 23): Thou art a scandal to Me. Much more therefore can other perfect men suffer scandal.

Obj. 2. Further, Scandal denotes an obstacle which is brought into a person's spiritual life. Now even perfect men can be hindered in their progress along the spiritual life, according to I Thess. 2. 18: We would have come to you. I Paul indeed, once and again; but Satan hath hindered us. Therefore even perfect men can suffer scandal.

Obj. 3. Further, Even perfect men are liable to venial sins, according to I John 1. 8: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves. Now passive scandal is not always a mortal sin, but is sometimes venial, as stated above (A. 4). Therefore passive scandal may be found in perfect men.

On the contrary, Jerome, in commenting on Matt. 18. 6, He that shall scandalize one of these little ones, says:² "Observe that it is the little one that is scandalized, for the elders do not take scandal."

I answer that, Passive scandal implies that the mind of the person who takes scandal is unsettled in its adherence to good. Now no man can be unsettled who adheres firmly to something immovable. The elders, that is, the perfect, adhere to God alone, Whose goodness is unchangeable, for though they adhere to their superiors, they do so only in so far as these adhere to Christ, according to I Cor. 4. 16: Be ye followers of me, as I also am of Christ. Therefore, however much others may appear to them to conduct themselves ill in word and deed, they themselves do not stray from their righteousness, according to Ps. 124. 1: They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Sion: he shall not be moved for ever that dwelleth in Jerusalem. Therefore scandal is not found in those who adhere to God perfectly by love, according to Ps. 118. 165: Much peace have they that love Thy law, and to them there is no stumbling-block (scandalum).

Reply Obj. 1. As stated above (A. 2, reply 2), in this passage, scandal is used in a broad sense to denote any kind of hindrance. Hence Our Lord said to Peter: Thou art a scandal to Me, because he was endeavouring to weaken Our Lord's purpose of undergoing His Passion.

Reply Obj. 2. Perfect men may be hindered in the performance of external actions. But they are not hindered by the words or deeds of others from tending to God in the internal acts of the will, according to Rom. 8. 38, 39: Neither death, nor life . . . shall be able to separate us from the love of God.

Reply Obj. 3. Perfect men sometimes fall into venial sins through the weakness of the flesh; but they are not scandalized (taking scandal in its true sense), by the words or deeds of others, although there can be an approach to scandal in them, according to Ps. 72. 2: My feet were almost moved.

ARTICLE 6. Whether Active Scandal Can Be Found in the Perfect?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It seems that active scandal can be found in the perfect.

Objection 1. For passion is the effect of action. Now some are scandalized passively by the words or deeds of the perfect, according to Matt. 14. 12: Dost thou know that the Pharisees, when they heard this word, were scandalized? Therefore active scandal can be found in the perfect.

Obj. 2. Further, Peter, after receiving the Holy Ghost, was in the state of the perfect. Yet afterwards he scandalized the gentiles, for it is written (Gal. 2. 14): When I saw that they walked not uprightly unto the truth of the Gospel, I said to Cephas, that is, Peter, before them all: If thou being a Jew, livest after the manner of the gentiles, and not as the Jews do, how dost thou compel the gentiles to live as do the Jews? Therefore active scandal can be in the perfect.

Obj. 3. Further, Active scandal is sometimes a venial sin. But venial sins may be in perfect men. Therefore active scandal may be in perfect men.

On the contrary, Active scandal is more opposed to perfection than passive scandal. But passive scandal cannot be in the perfect. Much less, therefore, can active scandal be in them.

I answer that, Active scandal, properly so called, occurs when a man says or does a thing which in itself is of a nature to occasion another's downfall, and that is only when what he says or does is inordinate. Now it belongs to the perfect to order all their actions according to the rule of reason, as stated in I Cor. 14. 40: Let all things be done decently and according to order; and they are careful to do this especially in those matters in which not only would they do wrong, but would also be to others an occasion of wrong-doing. And if indeed they fail in this moderation in such words or deeds as come to the knowledge of others, this has its origin in human weakness because of which they fall short of perfection. Yet they do not fall short so far as to stray far from the order of reason, but only a little and in some slight matter, and this is not so grave that anyone can reasonably take from it an occasion for committing sin.

Reply Obj. 1. Passive scandal is always due to some active scandal; yet this active scandal is not always in another, but in the very person who is scandalized, because, that is, he scandalizes himself.

Reply Obj. 2. In the opinion of Augustine¹ and of Paul also, Peter sinned and was to be blamed in withdrawing from the gentiles in order to avoid the scandal of the Jews, because he did this somewhat incautiously, so that the gentiles who had been converted to the faith were scandalized. Nevertheless Peter's action was not so grave a sin as to give others sufficient ground for scandal. Hence they were guilty of passive scandal, while there was no active scandal in Peter.

Reply Obj. 3. The venial sins of the perfect consist chiefly in sudden movements, which being hidden cannot give scandal. If, however, they commit any venial sins even in their external words or deeds, these are so slight as to be insufficient in themselves to give scandal.

ARTICLE 7. Whether Spiritual Goods Should Be Given Up on Account of Scandal?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It seems that spiritual goods ought to be given up on account of scandal.

Objection 1. For Augustine (Contra Ep. Parmen. iii, 2)² teaches that punishment for sin should cease when the peril of schism is feared. But punishment of sins is a spiritual good, since it is an act of justice. Therefore a spiritual good is to be given up on account of scandal.

Obj. 2. Further, The Sacred Doctrine is a most spiritual thing. Yet one ought to desist from it on account of scandal, according to

Matt. 7. 6: Give not that which is holy, to dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine lest . . . turning upon you, they tear you. Therefore a spiritual good should be given up on account of scandal.

Obj. 3. Further, Since fraternal correction is an act of charity, it is a spiritual good. Yet sometimes it is omitted out of charity, in order to avoid giving scandal to others, as Augustine observes.¹ Therefore a spiritual good should be given up on account of scandal.

Obj. 4. Further, Jerome says² that in order to avoid scandal we should give up whatever it is possible to omit without prejudice to the threefold truth, that is, the truth of life, of justice and of doctrine. Now the observance of the counsels, and the bestowal of alms may often be omitted without prejudice to this threefold truth; otherwise whoever omitted them would always be guilty of sin, and yet such things are the greatest of spiritual works. Therefore spiritual works should be omitted on account of scandal.

Obj. 5. Further, The avoidance of any sin is a spiritual good, since any sin brings spiritual harm to the sinner. Now it seems that one ought sometimes to commit a venial sin in order to avoid scandalizing one's neighbour, for instance when by sinning venially one would prevent someone else from committing a mortal sin; for one is bound to hinder the damnation of one's neighbour as much as one can without prejudice to one's own salvation, which is not precluded by a venial sin. Therefore one ought to give up a spiritual good in order to avoid scandal.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Hom. Super Ezech. vii):³ "If people are scandalized at the truth, it is better to allow the birth of scandal, than to abandon the truth." Now spiritual goods belong, above all others, to the truth. Therefore spiritual goods are not to be given up on account of scandal.

I answer that, Although scandal is twofold, active and passive, the present question does not apply to active scandal, for since active scandal is something said or done less rightly, nothing ought to be done that implies active scandal.

The question does, however, apply to passive scandal, and accordingly we have to see what ought to be given up in order to avoid scandal.

Now a distinction must be made in spiritual goods. For some of them are necessary for salvation, and cannot be omitted without mortal sin, and it is evident that no man ought to commit a mortal sin in order to prevent another from sinning, because according to the order of charity a man ought to love his own spiritual welfare more than another's. Therefore one ought not to give up that which is necessary for salvation, in order to avoid giving scandal.

Again a distinction seems necessary among spiritual things which are not necessary for salvation, because the scandal which arises from such things sometimes proceeds from malice; for instance when a man wishes to hinder those spiritual goods by stirring up scandal. This is the scandal of the Pharisees, who were scandalized at Our Lord's teaching, and Our Lord teaches (Matt. 15, 14) that we ought to treat suchlike scandal with contempt.

Sometimes scandal proceeds from weakness or ignorance, and such is the scandal of little ones. In order to avoid this kind of scandal, spiritual goods ought to be either concealed, or sometimes even deferred (if this can be done without incurring immediate danger), until the matter being explained the scandal cease. If, however, the scandal continue after the matter has been explained, it would seem to be due to malice, and then it would no longer be right to omit that spiritual good in order to avoid suchlike scandal.

Reply Obj. 1. In the infliction of punishment it is not the punishment itself that is the end in view but its medicinal properties in checking sin; therefore punishment partakes of the nature of justice, in so far as it checks sin. But if it is evident that the infliction of punishment will result in more numerous and more grievous sins being committed, the infliction of punishment will no longer be a part of justice. It is in this sense that Augustine is speaking, when, that is, the excommunication of a few threatens to bring about the danger of a schism, for in that case it would not pertain to the truth of justice to pronounce excommunication.

Reply Obj. 2. With regard to a man's doctrine two points must be considered, namely, the truth which is taught, and the act of teaching. The first of these is necessary for salvation, that, namely, he whose duty it is to teach should not teach what is contrary to the truth, and that he should teach the truth according to the requirements of times and persons; therefore on no account ought he to suppress the truth and teach error in order to avoid any scandal that might ensue.—But the act itself of teaching is one of the spiritual almsdeeds, as stated above (Q. XXXII, A. 2), and so the same is to be said of it as of the other works of mercy, of which we shall speak further on (Reply 4).

Reply Obj. 3. As stated above (Q. XXXIII, A. 1), fraternal correction aims at the correction of a brother, and therefore it is to be counted among spiritual goods in so far as this end can be obtained, which is not the case if the brother be scandalized through being corrected. And so, if the correction be omitted in order to avoid scandal, no spiritual good is given up.

Reply Obj. 4. The truth of life, of doctrine, and of justice comprises not only whatever is necessary for salvation, but also whatever is a means of obtaining salvation more perfectly, according to I Cor. 12. 31. Be zealous for the better gifts. Therefore neither the counsels nor even the works of mercy are to be altogether omitted in order to avoid scandal; but sometimes they should be concealed or deferred, on account of the scandal of the little ones, as stated above. Sometimes, however, the observance of the counsels and the fulfilment of the works of mercy are necessary for salvation. This may be seen in the case of those who have vowed to keep the counsels, and of those whose duty it is to relieve the wants of others, either in temporal matters (as by feeding the hungry), or in spiritual matters (as by instructing the ignorant), whether such duties arise from their being enjoined as in the case of prelates, or from the need on the part of the person in want; and then the same applies to these things as to others that are necessary for salvation.

Reply Obj. 5. Some have said that one ought to commit a venial sin in order to avoid scandal.¹ But this implies a contradiction, since if it ought to be done, it is no longer evil or sinful, for a sin cannot be a matter of choice. It may happen however that, on account of some circumstance, something is not a venial sin, though it would be were it not for that circumstance; thus an idle word is a venial sin, when it is uttered uselessly, yet if it be uttered for a reasonable cause, it is neither idle nor sinful. And though venial sin does not deprive a man of grace which is his means of salvation, yet, in so far as it disposes him to mortal sin, it tends to the loss of salvation.

ARTICLE 8. Whether Temporal Goods Should Be Given Up on Account of Scandal?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It would seem that temporal goods should be given up on account of scandal.

Objection 1. For we ought to love our neighbour's spiritual welfare which is hindered by scandal more than any temporal goods whatever. But we give up what we love less for the sake of what we love more. Therefore we should give up temporal goods in order to avoid scandalizing our neighbour.

Obj. 2. Further, According to Jerome's rule,² whatever can be given up without prejudice to the threefold truth should be given up in order to avoid scandal. Now temporal goods can be given up without prejudice to the threefold truth. Therefore they should be given up in order to avoid scandal.

Obj. 3. Further, No temporal good is more necessary than food. But we ought to give up taking food on account of scandal, according to Rom. 14. 15: Destroy not him with thy meat for whom Christ died. Much more therefore should all other temporal goods be given up on account of scandal.

Obj. 4. Further, The most fitting way of safeguarding and recovering temporal goods is the court of justice. But it is unlawful to have recourse to justice, especially if scandal ensues, for it is written (Matt. 5. 40): If a man will contend with thee in judgment, and take away thy coat, let go thy cloak also unto him; and (I Cor. 6. 7): Already indeed there is plainly a fault among you, that you have lawsuits one with another. Why do you not rather take wrong? why do you not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded? Therefore it seems that we ought to forego temporal goods on account of scandal.

Obj. 5. Further, We ought, it seems, to give up least of all those temporal goods which are connected with spiritual goods, and yet we ought to give them up on account of scandal. For the Apostle while sowing spiritual things did not accept a temporal stipend lest he should give any hindrance to the Gospel of Christ as we read I Cor. 9. 12. For a like reason the Church does not demand tithes in certain countries, in order to avoid scandal. Much more, therefore, ought we to give up other temporal goods in order to avoid scandal.

On the contrary, Blessed Thomas of Canter-

bury demanded the restitution of Church property, notwithstanding that the king took scandal from his doing so.¹

I answer that, A distinction must be made in temporal goods, for either they are ours, or they are committed to us to take care of them for someone else; thus the goods of the Church are committed to prelates, and the goods of the community are entrusted to all such persons as have authority over the common weal. In this latter case the care of such things (as of things held in deposit) devolves of necessity on those persons to whom they are entrusted, and therefore, even as other things that are necessary for salvation, they are not to be given up on account of scandal. On the other hand, as regards those temporalities of which we have the dominion, sometimes, on account of scandal, we are bound to give them up, and sometimes we are not so bound, whether we abandon them by giving them up, if we have them in our possession, or by omitting to claim them, if they are in the possession of others. For if the scandal arise from this through the ignorance or weakness of others (in which case, as stated above, A. 7, it is scandal of the little ones) we must either give up such temporalities altogether, or the scandal must be abated by some other means, namely, by some kind of admonition. Hence Augustine says (De Serm. Dom. in Monte, i, 20):² "Thou shouldst give so as to injure neither thyself nor another, as much as thou canst lend, and if thou refusest what is asked, thou must yet be just to him, indeed thou wilt give him something better than he asks, if thou reprove him that asks unjustly." Sometimes, however, scandal arises from malice. This is scandal of the Pharisees, and we ought not to give up temporal goods for the sake of those who stir up scandals of this kind, for this would both be harmful to the common good, since it would give wicked men an opportunity of plunder, and would be injurious to the plunderers themselves, who would remain in sin as long as they were in possession of another's property. Hence Gregory says (Moral. xxxi, 13):³ "Sometimes we ought to suffer those who rob us of our temporalities, while sometimes we should resist them, as far as equity allows, in the hope not only that we may safeguard our property, but also lest those who take what is not theirs may lose themselves."

This suffices for the Reply to the First Objection.

Reply Obj. 2. If it were permissible for wicked men to rob other people of their property, this would tend to the detriment of the truth of life and justice. Therefore we are not always bound to give up our temporal goods in order to avoid scandal.

Reply Obj. 3. The Apostle had no intention of counselling total abstinence from food on account of scandal, because our welfare requires that we should take food, but he intended to counsel abstinence from a particular kind of food, in order to avoid scandal, according to I Cor. 8. 13: I will never eat flesh, lest I should scandalize my brother.

Reply Obj. 4. According to Augustine (De Serm. Dom. in Monte, i, 19)⁴ this precept of Our Lord is to be understood of "the preparedness of the mind," namely, that man should be prepared, if it be expedient, to suffer being harmed or defrauded, rather than go to law. But sometimes it is not expedient, as stated above (reply 2). The same applies to the saying of the Apostle.

Reply Obj. 5. The scandal which the Apostle avoided arose from an error of the gentiles who were not used to this payment. Hence he was obliged to give it up for the time being, so that they might be taught first of all that such a payment was a duty. For a like reason the Church refrains from demanding tithes in those countries where it is not customary to pay them.

QUESTION XLIV

OF THE PRECEPTS OF CHARITY

(In Eight Articles)

WE must now consider the Precepts of Charity, under which head there are eight points of inquiry: (1) Whether precepts should be given about charity? (2) Whether there should be one or two? (3) Whether two suffice? (4) Whether it is fittingly prescribed that we should love God, with thy whole heart? (5) Whether it is fittingly added: With thy whole mind, etc.? (6) Whether it is possible to fulfil this precept in this life? (7) Of the precept: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself: (8) Whether the order of charity is included in the precept?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Any Precept Should Be Given about Charity?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that no precept should be given about charity.

Objection 1. For charity imposes the manner on all acts of virtue, since it is the form of the virtues as stated above (Q. XXIII, A. 8), while the precepts are about the virtues themselves. Now, according to the common saying, the manner is not included in the precept. Therefore no precepts should be given about charity.

Obj. 2. Further, Charity, which is poured forth in our hearts by the Holy Ghost (Rom. 5. 5), makes us free, since where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty (II Cor. 3. 17). Now the obligation that arises from a precept is opposed to liberty, since it imposes a necessity. Therefore no precept should be given about Charity.

Obj. 3. Further, Charity is the foremost among all the virtues, to which the precepts are ordered, as shown above (Part I-II, Q. C, A. 9, reply 2). If, therefore, any precepts were given about charity, they should have a place among the chief precepts which are those of the decalogue. But they have no place there. Therefore no precepts should be given about charity.

On the contrary, Whatever God requires of us is included in a precept. Now God requires that man should love Him, according to Deut. 10. 12. Therefore precepts had to be given about the love of charity, which is the love of God.

I answer that, As stated above (Part I-II, Q. XCIX, AA. 1, 5; Q. C, A. 5, reply 1), a precept implies the notion of something due. Hence a thing is a matter of precept in so far as it is something due. Now a thing is due in two ways: for its own sake, and for the sake of something else. In every affair, it is the end that is due for its own sake, because it has the character of a good for its own sake, while that which is directed to the end is due for the sake of something else; thus for a physician, it is due for its own sake that he should heal, while it is due for the sake of something else that he should give a medicine in order to heal. Now the end of the spiritual life is that man be united to God, and this union is effected by charity, while all things pertaining to the spiritual life are ordered to this union, as to their end. Hence the Apostle says (I Tim. 1, 5): The end of the commandment is charity from a pure heart, and a good conscience, and an unfeigned faith. For all the virtues, about whose acts the precepts are given, are directed either to the freeing of the heart from the whirl of the passions—such as the virtues that regulate the passions—or at least to the possession of a good conscience—such as the virtues that regulate operations—or to the having of a right faith—such as those which pertain to the worship of God; and these three things are required of man that he may love God. For an impure heart is withdrawn from loving God on account of the passion that inclines it to earthly things; an evil conscience gives man a horror for God's justice, through fear of His punishments; and an untrue faith draws man's affections to an untrue representation of God, and separates him from the divinity and from the truth of God. Now in every genus that which is for its own sake takes precedence of that which is for the sake of another, therefore the greatest precept is that of charity, as stated in Matt. 22. 39.

Reply Obj. 1. As stated above (Part I-II, Q. C, A. 10) when we were treating of the commandments, the mode of love does not come under those precepts which are about the other acts of virtue; for instance, this precept, Honour thy father and thy mother does not prescribe that this should be done out of charity. The act of love does, however, fall under special precepts.

Reply Obj. 2. The obligation of a precept is not opposed to liberty except in one whose mind is turned away from that which is prescribed, as may be seen in those who keep the precepts through fear alone. But the precept of love cannot be fulfilled save of one's own will, and therefore it is not opposed to charity.

Reply Obj. 3. All the precepts of the decalogue are directed to the love of God and of our neighbour, and therefore the precepts of charity had not to be enumerated among the precepts of the decalogue, since they are included in all of them.

ARTICLE 2 Whether There Should Have Been Given Two Precepts of Charity?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that there should not have been given two precepts of charity.

Objection 1. For the precepts of the Law are directed to virtue, as stated above (A. 1. obj. 3). Now charity is one virtue, as shown above (Q. : XIII, A. 5). Therefore only one precept of charity should have been given.

Obj. 2. Further, As Augustine says,¹ charity loves none but God in our neighbour. Now we are sufficiently directed to love God by the precept, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God. Therefore there was no need to add the precept about loving our neighbour.

Obj. 3. Further, Different sins are opposed to different precepts. But it is not a sin to put aside the love of our neighbour, provided we do not put aside the love of God; indeed, it is written (Luke 14. 26): If any man come to Me, and hate not his father, and mother, . . . he cannot be My disciple. Therefore the precept of the love of God is not distinct from the precept of the love of our neighbour.

Obj. 4. Further, The Apostle says (Rom 13. 8): He that loveth his neighbour hath fulfilled the Law. But a law is not fulfilled unless all its precepts be observed. Therefore all the precepts are included in the love of our neighbour, and consequently the one precept of the love of our neighbour suffices. Therefore there should not be two precepts of charity.

On the contrary, It is written (I John 4. 21): This commandment we have from God, that he who loveth God, love also his brother.

I answer that, As stated above (Part I-II, Q. XCI, A. 3; Q. C, A. 1) when we were treating of the commandments, the precepts are to the Law what propositions are to speculative sciences, for in these latter, the conclusions are contained virtually in the first principles. Hence whoever knows the principles as to their entire virtual content has no need to have the conclusions put separately before him. Since, however, some who know the principles are unable to consider all that is virtually contained in them, it is necessary, for their sake, that in the sciences conclusions should be deduced from their principles. Now in practical matters in which the precepts of the Law direct us, the end has the character of principle, as stated above (Q. XXIII, A. 7, reply 2; Q. XXVI, A. 1, reply 1), and the love of God is the end to which the love of our neighbour is directed. Therefore we had to receive precepts not only of the love of God but also of the love of our neighbour, on account of those who are less intelligent, who do not easily understand that one of these precepts is included in the other.

Reply Obj. 1. Although charity is one virtue, yet it has two acts, one of which is directed to the other as to its end. Now precepts are given about acts of virtue, and so there had to be several precepts of charity.

Reply Obj. 2. God is loved in our neighbour, as the end is loved in that which is directed to the end; and yet there was need for an explicit precept about both, for the reason given above.

Reply Obj. 3. The means derive their goodness from their relation to the end, and accordingly turning from the means derives its malice from the same source and from no other.

Reply Obj. 4. Love of our neighbour includes love of God, as the end is included in the means, and vice versa. And yet each precept had to be given explicitly, for the reason given above.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Two Precepts of Charity Suffice?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that two precepts of charity do not suffice.

Objection 1 For precepts are given about acts of virtue. Now acts are distinguished by their objects. Since, then, man is bound to love four things out of charity, namely, God, himself, his neighbour and his own body, as shown above (Q. XXV, A. 12), it seems that there ought to be four precepts of charity, so that two are not sufficient.

Obj. 2. Further, Love is not the only act of charity, but also joy, peace and beneficence. But precepts should be given about the acts of the virtues. Therefore two precepts of charity do not suffice.

Obj. 3. Further, Virtue consists not only in doing good but also in avoiding evil. Now we are led by the positive precepts to do good, and by the negative precepts to avoid evil. Therefore there ought to have been not only positive, but also negative precepts about charity: and so two precepts of charity are not sufficient.

On the contrary, Our Lord said (Matt 22 40): On these two commandments dependeth the whole Law and the prophets.

I answer that, Charity, as stated above (Q. XXIII, A. 1), is a kind of friendship. Now friendship is between one person and another, and so Gregory says (Hom. in Ev. xvii):¹ "Charity is not possible between less than two," and it has been explained how one may love oneself out of charity (Q. XXV, A. 4). Now since good is the object of dilection and love, and since good is either an end or a means, it is fitting that there should be two precepts of charity, one by which we are induced to love God as our end, and another by which we are led to love our neighbour for God's sake, as for the sake of our end.

Reply Obj. 1. As Augustine says,² "though four things are to be loved out of charity, there was no need of a precept as regards the second and fourth, that is, love of oneself and of one's body. For however much a man may stray from the truth, the love of himself and of his own body always remains in him." And yet the mode of this love had to be prescribed to man, namely, that he should love himself and his own body in an ordered manner, and this is done by his loving God and his neighbour.

Reply Obj. 2. As stated above (Q. xxviii, AA. 1, 4; Q. xxix, A. 3), the other acts of charity result from the act of love as effects from their cause. Hence the precepts of love virtually include the precepts about the other acts. And yet we find that, for the sake of the laggards, special precepts were given about each act:—about joy (Philip. 4. 4): Rejoice in the Lord always; about peace (Heb. 12. 14): Follow peace with all men; about beneficence (Gal. 6. 10): Whilst we have time, let us work good to all men; and Holy Writ contains precepts about each of the parts of beneficence, as may be seen by anyone who considers the matter carefully.

Reply Obj. 3. To do good is more than to avoid evil, and therefore the positive precepts virtually include the negative precepts. Nevertheless we find explicit precepts against the vices contrary to charity, for, against hatred it is written (Levit. 19. 17): Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart; against acedia (Eccclus. 6. 26): Be not grieved with her bands; against envy (Gal. 5. 26): Let us not be made desirous of vainglory, provoking one another, envying one another; against discord (I Cor. 1. 10): That you all speak the same thing, and that there be no schisms among you; and against scandal (Rom. 14. 13): That you put not a stumbling-block or a scandal in your brother's way.

ARTICLE 4. Whether It Is Fittingly Commanded That Man Should Love God With His Whole Heart?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that it is unfittingly commanded that man should love God with his whole heart.

Objection 1. For the mode of a virtuous act is not a matter of precept, as shown above (Part I-II, Q. C, A. 9). Now the words with thy whole heart signify the mode of the love of God. Therefore it is unfittingly commanded that man should love God with his whole heart.

Obj. 2. Further, "A thing is whole and perfect when it lacks nothing."¹ If therefore it is a matter of precept that God be loved with the whole heart, whoever does something not pertaining to the love of God acts counter to the precept, and consequently sins mortally. Now a venial sin does not pertain to the love of God. Therefore a venial sin is a mortal sin, which is absurd.

Obj. 3. Further, To love God with one's own heart belongs to perfection, since according to the Philosopher,² "to be whole is to be perfect." But that which belongs to perfection is not a matter of precept, but a matter of counsel. Therefore we ought not to be commanded to love God with our whole heart.

On the contrary, It is written (Deut. 6. 5): Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart.

I answer that, Since precepts are given about acts of virtue, an act is a matter of precept according as it is an act of virtue. Now it is requisite for an act of virtue that not only should it fall on its own matter, but also that it should be clothed with its due circumstances, by which it is proportioned to that matter. But God is to be loved as the last end, to which all things are to be referred. Therefore some kind of totality had to be designated in connection with the precept of the love of God.

Reply Obj. 1. The commandment that prescribes an act of virtue does not prescribe the mode which that virtue derives from another and higher virtue, but it does prescribe the mode which belongs to its own proper virtue, and this mode is signified in the words with thy whole heart.

Reply Obj. 2. To love God with one's whole heart happens in two ways. First, actually, so that a man's whole heart is always actually directed to God, and this is the perfection of heaven. Secondly, in the sense that a man's whole heart is habitually directed to God, so that it consents to nothing contrary to the love of God, and this is the perfection of the way. Venial sin is not contrary to this latter perfection, because it does not destroy the habit of charity, since it does not tend to a contrary object but merely hinders the use of charity.

Reply Obj. 3. That perfection of charity to which the counsels are directed is between the two perfections mentioned in the preceding reply: and it consists in man renouncing, as much as possible, temporal things, even such as are lawful, because they occupy the mind and hinder the actual movement of the heart towards God.

ARTICLE 5. Whether to the Words, "Thou Shalt Love the Lord Thy God With Thy Whole Heart," It Was Fitting To Add "and With Thy Whole Soul, and With Thy Whole Strength"?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that it was unfitting to the words, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with thy whole heart, to add, and with thy whole soul, and with thy whole strength (Deut. 6. 5).

Objection 1. For heart does not mean here a part of the body, since to love God is not a bodily action, and therefore heart is to be taken here in a spiritual sense. Now the heart understood spiritually is either the soul itself or part of the soul. Therefore it is superfluous to mention both heart and soul.

Obj. 2. Further, A man's strength whether spiritual or corporal depends on the heart. Therefore after the words, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart, it was unnecessary to add, with all thy strength.

Obj. 3. Further, Matt. 22. 37 we read: With all thy mind, which words do not occur here. Therefore it seems that this precept is unfittingly worded in Deut. 6.

On the contrary stands the authority of Scripture.

I answer that, This precept is differently worded in various places. For, as we said in the first objection, in Deut. 6. three points are mentioned, with thy whole heart, and with thy whole soul, and with thy whole strength. In Matt. 22. we find two of these mentioned, namely with thy whole heart and with thy whole soul, while with thy whole strength is omitted, but with thy whole mind is added. Yet in Mark 12 we find all four, namely with thy whole heart, and with thy whole soul, and with thy whole mind, and with thy whole force which is the same as strength. Moreover, these four are indicated in Luke 10., where in place of strength or force we read with all thy might.¹

Accordingly these four have to be explained, since the fact that one of them is omitted here or there is due to one implying another. We must therefore observe that love is an act of the will which is here denoted by the heart, because just as the bodily heart is the principle of all the movements of the body, so too the will, especially as regards the intention of the last end which is the object of charity, is the principle of all spiritual movements. Now there are three principles of action that are moved by the will, namely, the intellect which is signified by "the mind," the lower appetitive power, signified by "the soul"; and the exterior executive power signified by "strength," "force" or "might". Accordingly we are commanded to direct our whole intention to God, and this is signified by the words with thy whole heart; to submit our intellect to God, and this is expressed in the words with thy whole mind; to regulate our appetite according to God, in the words with thy whole soul; and to obey God in our external actions, and this is to love God with our whole strength, force or might.

Chrysostom, on the other hand, takes heart and soul in the contrary sense;² and Augustine³ refers heart to the thought, soul to the manner of life, and mind to the intellect. Again some explain with thy whole heart as denoting the intellect, with thy whole soul as signifying the will, with thy mind as pointing to the memory.⁴ And again, according to Gregory of Nyssa (De Hom. Opif. viii),⁵ "heart" signifies the vegetative soul, "soul" the sensitive soul, and "mind" the intellectual soul, because our nourishment, sensation, and understanding ought all to be referred by us to God.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

ARTICLE 6. Whether It Is Possible in This Life To Fulfil This Precept of the Love of God?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that in this life it is possible to fulfil this precept of the love of God.

Objection 1. For according to Jerome⁶ "accursed is he who says that God has commanded anything impossible." But God gave this commandment, as is clear from Deut. 6. 5. Therefore it is possible to fulfil this precept in this life.

Obj. 2. Further, Whoever does not fulfil a precept sins mortally, since according to Ambrose (De Parad. viii)⁷ sin is nothing else than "a transgression of the Divine Law, and disobedience of the heavenly commandments." If therefore this precept cannot be fulfilled by wayfarers, it follows that in this life no man can be without mortal sin, and this is against the saying of the Apostle (I Cor. 1. 8): (Who also) will confirm you unto the end without crime, and (I Tim. 3. 10): Let them minister, having no crime.

Obj. 3. Further, Precepts are given in order to direct man in the way of salvation, according to Ps. 18. 9: The commandment of the Lord is lightsome, enlightening the eyes. Now it is useless to direct anyone to what is impossible. Therefore it is not impossible to fulfil this precept in this life.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Perfect. Justit. viii):¹ "In the fulness of heavenly charity this precept will be fulfilled: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, etc. For as long as any carnal concupiscence remains that can be restrained by continence, man cannot love God with all his heart."

I answer that, A precept can be fulfilled in two ways perfectly, and imperfectly. A precept is fulfilled perfectly when the end intended by the author of the precept is reached; yet it is fulfilled, imperfectly however, when although the end intended by its author is not reached, nevertheless the order to that end is not departed from. Thus if the commander of an army order his soldiers to fight, his command will be perfectly obeyed by those who fight and conquer the foe, which is the commander's intention; yet it is fulfilled, although imperfectly, by those who fight without gaining the victory, provided they do nothing contrary to military discipline. Now God intends by this precept that man should be wholly united to Him, and this will be realized in heaven, when God will be all in all, according to I Cor. 15. 28. Hence this precept will be observed fully and perfectly in heaven; yet it is fulfilled, though imperfectly, on the way. Nevertheless on the way the more one man fulfils it more perfectly than another, the more he approaches by some kind of likeness to the perfection of heaven.

Reply Obj. 1. This argument proves that the precept can be fulfilled after a fashion on the way, but not perfectly.

Reply Obj. 2. Even as the soldier who fights legitimately without conquering is not blamed nor deserves to be punished for this, so too he that does not fulfil this precept on the way, but does nothing against the love of God, does not sin mortally.

Reply Obj. 3. As Augustine says (De Perfect. Justit. viii):² "why should not this perfection be prescribed to man, although no man attains it in this life? For one cannot run straight unless one knows where to run. And how would one know this if no precept pointed it out."

ARTICLE 7. Whether the Precept of the Love of Our Neighbour Is Fittingly Expressed?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It seems that the precept of the love of our neighbour is unfittingly expressed.

Objection 1. For the love of charity extends to all men, even to our enemies, as may be seen in Matt. 5. 44. But the word "neighbour" denotes a kind of nearness which does not seem to exist towards all men. Therefore it seems that this precept is unfittingly expressed.

Obj. 2. Further, According to the Philosopher³ the origin of our friendly relations with others lies in our relation to ourselves," from which it seems to follow that love of self is the principle of one's love for one's neighbour. Now the principle is greater than that which results from it. Therefore man ought not to love his neighbour as himself.

Obj. 3. Further, Man loves himself, but not his neighbour, naturally. Therefore it is unfitting that he should be commanded to love his neighbour as himself.

On the contrary, It is written (Matt. 22. 39): The second commandment is like to this: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

I answer that, This precept is fittingly expressed, for it indicates both the reason for loving and the mode of love.

The reason for loving is indicated in the word "neighbour," because the reason why we ought to love others out of charity is because they are near to us, both as to the natural image of God, and as to the capacity for glory. Nor does it matter whether we say neighbour, or brother according to I John 4. 21, or friend, according to Levit. 19. 18, because all these words express the same affinity.

The mode of love is indicated in the words "as thyself." This does not mean that a man must love his neighbour equally as himself, but in like manner as himself, and this in three ways. First, as regards the end, namely, that he should love his neighbour for God's sake, even as he loves himself for God's sake, so that his love for his neighbour may be a holy love. Secondly, as regards the rule of love, namely, that a man should not give way to his neighbour in evil, but only in good things, even as he ought to gratify his own will in good things alone, so that his love for his neighbour may be a just love. Thirdly, as regards the reason for loving, namely, that a man should love his neighbour not for his own profit or pleasure, but in the sense of wishing his neighbour well, even as he wishes himself well, so that his love for his neighbour may be a true love, for when a man loves his neighbour for his own profit or pleasure, he does not love his neighbour truly, but loves himself.

³ Ethics, IX, 4 (1166^a1); IX, 8 (1168^b5).

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

ARTICLE 8. Whether the Order of Charity Is Included in the Precept?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It seems that the order of charity is not included in the precept.

Objection 1. For whoever transgresses a precept does a wrong. But if man loves some one as much as he ought, and loves any other man more, he wrongs no man. Therefore he does not transgress the precept. Therefore the order of charity is not included in the precept.

Obj. 2. Further, Whatever is a matter of precept is sufficiently delivered to us in Holy Writ. Now the order of charity which was given above (q. xxvi) is nowhere indicated in Holy Writ. Therefore it is not included in the precept.

Obj. 3. Further, Order implies some kind of distinction. But the love of our neighbour is prescribed without any distinction, in the words, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Therefore the order of charity is not included in the precept.

On the contrary, Whatever God works in us by His grace, He teaches us first of all by the precepts of His Law, according to Jerem. 31. 33: I will give My Law in their heart (Vulg.,—in their bowels, and I will write it in their heart). Now God causes in us the order of charity, according to Cant. 2. 4: He set in order charity in me. Therefore the order of charity comes under the precept of the Law.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 4, reply 1), the mode which is essential to an act of virtue comes under the precept which prescribes that virtuous act. Now the order of charity is essential to the virtue, since it is based on the proportion of love to the thing loved, as shown above (q. xxvi, A. 4, reply 1; AA. 7, 9). It is therefore evident that the order of charity must come under the precept.

Reply Obj. 1. A man gratifies more the person he loves more, so that if he loved less one whom he ought to love more, he would wish to gratify more one whom he ought to gratify less, and so he would do an injustice to the one he ought to love more.

Reply Obj. 2. The order of those four things we have to love out of charity is expressed in Holy Writ. For when we are commanded to love God with our whole heart, we are given to understand that we must love Him above all things. When we are commanded to love our neighbour as ourselves, the love of self is set before love of our neighbour. In like manner where we are commanded (I John 3. 16) to lay down our souls, that is, the life of our bodies, for the brethren, we are given to understand that a man ought to love his neighbour more than his own body; and again when we are commanded (Gal. 6. 10) to work good . . . especially to those who are of the household of the faith, and when a man is blamed (I Tim. 5. 8) if he have not care of his own, and especially of those of his house, it means that we ought to love most those of our neighbours who are more virtuous or more closely united to us.

Reply Obj. 3. It follows from the very words, Thou shalt love thy neighbour that those who are nearer to us are to be loved more.

QUESTION XLV

OF THE GIFT OF WISDOM

(In Six Articles)

WE must now consider the gift of wisdom which corresponds to charity; and first, wisdom itself, secondly, the opposite vice (q. xlv.). Under the first head there are six points of inquiry: (1) Whether wisdom should be numbered among the gifts of the Holy Ghost? (2) What is its subject? (3) Whether wisdom is only speculative or also practical? (4) Whether the wisdom that is a gift is compatible with mortal sin? (5) Whether it is in all those who have sanctifying grace? (6) Which beatitude corresponds to it?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Wisdom Should Be Counted Among the Gifts of the Holy Ghost?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that wisdom ought not to be counted among the gifts of the Holy Ghost.

Objection 1. For the gifts are more perfect than the virtues, as stated above (Part I-II, q. lxxviii, A. 8). Now virtue is directed to the good alone, and so Augustine says (De Lib. Arb. ii, 19)¹ that "no man makes bad use of the virtues." Much more therefore are the gifts of the Holy Ghost directed to the good alone. But wisdom is directed to evil also, for it is written (James 3. 15) that a certain wisdom is earthly, sensual, devilish. Therefore wisdom should not be counted among the gifts of the Holy Ghost.

Obj. 2. Further, According to Augustine (De Trin. xiv, 11.)² "wisdom is the knowledge of Divine things." Now that knowledge of Divine things which man can acquire by his natural endowments belongs to the wisdom which is an intellectual virtue, while the supernatural knowledge of Divine things belongs to faith which is a theological virtue, as explained above (Q. I, A. 1; Q. IV, A. 5; Part I-II, Q. LXII, A. 2). Therefore wisdom should be called a virtue rather than a gift.

Obj. 3. Further, It is written (Job. 28. 28): Behold the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom, and to depart from evil, that is understanding. And in this passage according to the rendering of the Septuagint which Augustine follows (De Trin. xii, 14; xiv, 1)¹ we read: Behold piety, that is wisdom. Now both fear and piety are gifts of the Holy Ghost. Therefore wisdom should not be numbered among the gifts of the Holy Ghost as though it were distinct from the others.

On the contrary, Is is written (Isa. 11. 2): The Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon Him; the spirit of wisdom and of understanding.

I answer that, According to the Philosopher,² it pertains to wisdom to consider the highest cause. By means of that cause we are able to form a most certain judgment about other causes, and according to it all things should be set in order. Now the highest cause may be understood in two ways, either absolutely or in some genus. Accordingly he that knows the highest cause in any genus, and by its means is able to judge and set in order all the things that belong to that genus, is said to be wise in that genus, for instance in medicine or architecture, according to I Cor. 3. 10: As a wise architect, I have laid a foundation. On the other hand, he who knows the cause that is the highest absolutely, which is God, is said to be wise absolutely, because he is able to judge and set in order all things according to Divine rules.

Now man obtains this judgment through the Holy Ghost, according to I Cor. 2. 15: The spiritual man judgeth all things, because as stated in the same chapter (verse 10), the Spirit searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God. Therefore it is evident that wisdom is a gift of the Holy Ghost.

Reply Obj. 1. A thing is said to be good in two ways: first in the sense that it is good truly and perfect absolutely, secondly, by a kind of likeness, being perfect in wickedness; thus we speak of a good or a perfect thief, as the Philosopher observes.³ And just as with regard to those things which are truly good, we find a highest cause, namely the sovereign good which is the last end, by knowing which man is said to be truly wise, so too in evil things something is to be found to which all others are to be referred as to a last end, by knowing which man is said to be wise for the doing of evil, according to Jerem. 4. 22: They are wise to do evils, but to do good they have no knowledge. Now whoever turns away from his due end must fix on some undue end, since every agent acts for an end. Hence, if he fixes his end in external earthly things, his wisdom is called earthly, if in the goods of the body, it is called sensual wisdom, if in some excellence, it is called devilish wisdom, because it imitates the devil's pride, of which it is written (Job. 41. 25): He is king over all the children of pride.

Reply Obj. 2. The wisdom which is called a gift of the Holy Ghost differs from that which is an acquired intellectual virtue, for the latter is attained by human effort, while the former is descending from above (James 3. 15.). In like manner it differs from faith, since faith assents to the Divine truth in itself, while it belongs to the gift of wisdom to judge according to the Divine truth. Hence the gift of wisdom presupposes faith, because "a man judges well what he knows."⁴

Reply Obj. 3. Just as piety, which pertains to the worship of God, is a manifestation of faith, in so far as we make profession of faith by worshipping God, so too, piety manifests wisdom. For this reason piety is stated to be wisdom, and so is fear, for the same reason, because if a man fear and worship God, this shows that he has a right judgment about Divine things.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Wisdom Is in the Intellect As in a Subject?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that wisdom is not in the intellect as in a subject.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (Ep. CXL)⁵ that "wisdom is the charity of God." Now charity is in the will as its subject, and not in the intellect, as stated above (Q. XXIV, A. 1). Therefore wisdom is not in the intellect as its subject.

Obj. 2. Further, It is written (Ecclus. 6. 23): The wisdom of doctrine is according to her name, for wisdom (sapientia) may be described as "sweet-tasting science" (sapida scientia), and this seems to pertain to the affections, to which it pertains to taste spiritual pleasure or sweetness. Therefore wisdom is in the affections rather than in the intellect.

Obj. 3. Further, The intellectual power is sufficiently perfected by the gift of understanding. Now it is superfluous to require two things where one suffices for the purpose. Therefore wisdom is not in the intellect.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Moral. ii, 49)¹ that wisdom is contrary to folly. But folly is in the intellect. Therefore wisdom is also.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1, Q. viii, A. 6), wisdom denotes a certain rectitude of judgment according to the Eternal Law. Now rectitude of judgment is twofold: first, on account of perfect use of reason, secondly, on account of a certain connaturality with the matter about which one has to judge in a given instance. Thus, about matters of chastity, a man after inquiring with his reason forms a right judgment if he has learnt the science of morals, while he who has the habit of chastity judges rightly of such matters by a kind of connaturality.

Accordingly it pertains to the wisdom that is an intellectual virtue to pronounce right judgment about Divine things after reason has made its inquiry, but it pertains to wisdom as a gift of the Holy Ghost to judge rightly about them on account of a certain connaturality with them; thus Dionysius says (Div. Nom. ii)² that Hierotheus is perfect in Divine things, for he not only learns, but also suffers Divine things." Now this sympathy or connaturality for Divine things is the result of charity, which unites us to God, according to I Cor. 6. 17: He who is joined to the Lord, is one spirit. Consequently wisdom which is a gift, has its cause in the will, which cause is charity, but it has its essence in the intellect, whose act is to judge rightly, as stated above (Part I, Q. LXXIX, A. 3).

Reply Obj. 1. Augustine is speaking of wisdom as to its cause, from which also wisdom (sapientia) takes its name, in so far as it denotes a certain sweetness (saporem).

Hence the Reply to the Second Objection is evident, that is if this be the true meaning of the text quoted. For, apparently this is not the case, because such an exposition of the text would only fit the Latin word for wisdom, while it does not apply to the Greek, and perhaps not in other languages. Hence it would seem that in the text quoted wisdom stands for the renown of doctrine, for which it is praised by all.

Reply Obj. 3. The intellect exercises a twofold act, perception and judgment. The gift of understanding regards the former; the gift of wisdom regards the latter according to the Divine ideas, the gift of knowledge, according to human ideas.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Wisdom Is Merely Speculative, or Practical Also?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that wisdom is not practical but merely speculative.

Objection 1. For the gift of wisdom is more excellent than the wisdom which is an intellectual virtue. But wisdom as an intellectual virtue is merely speculative. Much more therefore is wisdom, as a gift, speculative and not practical.

Obj. 2. Further, The practical intellect is about matters of operation which are contingent. But wisdom is about Divine things which are eternal and necessary. Therefore wisdom cannot be practical.

Obj. 3. Further, Gregory says (Moral. vi, 37)³ that "in contemplation we seek the Beginning which is God, but in action we labour under a mighty bundle of wants." Now wisdom pertains to the vision of Divine things, in which there is no toiling under a load, since according to Wis. 8. 16, her conversation hath no bitterness, nor her company any tediousness. Therefore wisdom is merely contemplative, and not practical or active.

On the contrary, It is written (Coloss. 4. 5): Walk with wisdom towards them that are without. Now this pertains to action. Therefore wisdom is not merely speculative, but also practical.

I answer that, As Augustine says (De Trin. xii, 14),⁴ the higher part of the reason is the province of wisdom, while the lower part is the domain of knowledge. Now the higher reason according to the same authority (ibid. 7)⁵ is "intent on the consideration and consultation of the heavenly (that is, Divine) types" It considers them in so far as it contemplates Divine things in themselves, and it consults them in so far as it judges of human acts by Divine things, directing human acts according to Divine rules. Accordingly wisdom as a gift is not merely speculative but also practical.

Reply Obj. 1. The higher a virtue is the greater the number of things to which it extends, as stated in De Causis.⁶ Therefore from the very fact that wisdom as a gift is more excellent than wisdom as an intellectual virtue, since it attains to God more intimately by a kind of union of the soul with Him, it is able to direct us not only in contemplation but also in action.

Reply Obj. 2. Divine things are indeed necessary and eternal in themselves, yet they are the rules of the contingent things which are the subject-matter of human actions.

Reply Obj. 3. A thing is considered in itself before being compared with something else. Therefore to wisdom belongs first of all contemplation of Divine things which is the vision of the Beginning, and afterwards the direction of human act according to the Divine rules. Nor from the direction of wisdom does there result any bitterness or toil in human acts, but rather the result of wisdom is to make the bitter sweet, and labour a rest.

ARTICLE 4. Whether Wisdom Can Be Without Grace and With Mortal Sin?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that wisdom can be without grace and with mortal sin.

Objection 1. For saints glory chiefly in such things as are incompatible with mortal sin, according to II Cor. 1. 12: Our glory is this, the testimony of our conscience. Now one ought not to glory in one's wisdom, according to Jerem. 9. 23: Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom. Therefore wisdom can be without grace and with mortal sin.

Obj. 2. Further, wisdom denotes knowledge of Divine things, as stated above (AA 1. 3). Now one in mortal sin may have knowledge of the Divine truth, according to Rom. 1. 18: (Those men that) detain the truth of God in injustice. Therefore wisdom is compatible with mortal sin.

Obj. 3. Further, Augustine says (De Trin. xv. 18)¹ while speaking of charity: "Nothing surpasses this gift of God; it is this alone that divides the children of the eternal kingdom from the children of eternal perdition." But wisdom is distinct from charity. Therefore it does not divide the children of the kingdom from the children of perdition. Therefore it is compatible with mortal sin.

On the contrary, It is written (Wisd. 1. 4): Wisdom will not enter into a malicious soul, nor dwell in a body subject to sins.

I answer that, The wisdom which is a gift of the Holy Ghost, as stated above (AA 2. 3), enables us to judge rightly of Divine things, or of other things according to Divine rules, by reason of a certain connaturalness or union with Divine things, which is the effect of charity, as stated above (A. 2). Hence the wisdom of which we are speaking presupposes charity. Now charity is incompatible with mortal sin, as shown above (Q. xxiv, A. 12). Therefore it follows that the wisdom of which we are speaking cannot be together with mortal sin.

Reply Obj. 1. These words are to be understood as referring to worldly wisdom, or to wisdom in Divine things acquired through human reasons. In such wisdom the saints do not glory, according to Prov. 30. 2: The wisdom of men is not with Me: But they do glory in Divine wisdom according to I Cor. 1. 30: (Who) of God is made unto us wisdom.

Reply Obj. 2. This argument considers not the wisdom of which we speak but that which is acquired by the study and searching of reason, and is compatible with mortal sin.

Reply Obj. 3. Although wisdom is distinct from charity it presupposes it, and for that very reason divides the children of perdition from the children of the kingdom.

ARTICLE 5. Whether Wisdom Is in All Who Have Grace?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that wisdom is not in all who have grace.

Objection 1. For it is greater to have wisdom than to hear wisdom. Now it is only for the perfect to hear wisdom, according to I Cor. 2. 6: We speak wisdom among the perfect. Since then not all who have grace are perfect, it seems that much less all who have grace have wisdom.

Obj. 2. Further, "The wise man sets things in order," as the Philosopher states;² and it is written (James 3. 17) that the wise man judges without dissimulation (Vulg.,—The wisdom that is from above . . . is . . . without judging, without dissimulation). Now it is not for all that have grace to judge, or put others in order, but only for those in authority. Therefore wisdom is not in all that have grace.

Obj. 3. Further, "Wisdom is a remedy against folly," as Gregory says (Moral. ii, 49).³ Now many that have grace are naturally foolish, for instance madmen who are baptized or those who without being guilty of mortal sin have become insane. Therefore wisdom is not in all that have grace.

On the contrary, Whoever is without mortal sin is beloved of God, since he has charity, by which he loves God, and God loves them that love Him (Prov. 8. 17). Now it is written (Wis. 7. 28) that God loveth none but him that dwell eth with wisdom. Therefore wisdom is in all those who have charity and are without mortal sin.

² Metaphysics, 1, 2 (982^a18).

³ PL 75, 592.

I answer that, The wisdom of which we are speaking, as stated above (AA. 1, 3), denotes a certain rectitude of judgment in the contemplation and consultation of Divine things, and as to both of these men obtain various degrees of wisdom through union with Divine things. For the measure of right judgment attained by some, whether in the contemplation of Divine things or in directing human affairs according to Divine rules, is no more than suffices for their salvation. This measure is wanting to none who is without mortal sin through having sanctifying grace, since if nature does not fail in necessary things, much less does grace fail. Therefore it is written (I John 2. 27): (His) unction teacheth you of all things.

Some, however, receive a higher degree of the gift of wisdom, both as to the contemplation of Divine things (by both knowing more exalted mysteries and being able to impart this knowledge to others) and as to the direction of human affairs according to Divine rules (by being able to direct not only themselves but also others according to those rules). This degree of wisdom is not common to all that have sanctifying grace, but belongs rather to the gratuitous graces, which the Holy Ghost dispenses as He wills, according to I Cor. 12. 8: To one indeed by the Spirit is given the word of wisdom, etc.

Reply Obj. 1. The Apostle speaks there of wisdom as extending to the hidden mysteries of Divine things, as indeed he says himself (ibid. 7): We speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, a wisdom which is hidden.

Reply Obj. 2. Although it belongs to those alone who are in authority to direct and judge other men, yet it pertains to every man to direct and judge his own actions, as Dionysius declares (Ep. ad Demophil.).¹

Reply Obj. 3. Baptized idiots, like little children, have the habit of wisdom, which is a gift of the Holy Ghost, but they do not have the act, on account of the bodily impediment which hinders the use of reason in them.

ARTICLE 6. Whether the Seventh Beatitude Corresponds to the Gift of Wisdom?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It seems that the seventh beatitude does not correspond to the gift of wisdom.

Objection 1. For the seventh beatitude is:

Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God. Now both these things belong immediately to charity, since of peace it is written (Ps. 118. 165): Much peace have they that love Thy law, and, as the Apostle says (Rom. 5. 5), the charity of God is poured forth in our hearts by the Holy Ghost Who is given to us, and Who is the Spirit of adoption of sons, whereby we cry: Abba (Father) (ibid. 8, 15). Therefore the seventh beatitude ought to be ascribed to charity rather than to wisdom.

Obj. 2. Further, A thing is declared by its proximate effect rather than by its remote effect. Now the proximate effect of wisdom seems to be charity, according to Wisd. 7. 27: Through nations she conveyeth herself into holy souls, she maketh the friends of God and prophets, while peace and the adoption of sons seem to be remote effects, since they result from charity, as stated above (Q. XXIX, A. 3). Therefore the beatitude corresponding to wisdom should be determined according to the love of charity rather than according to peace.

Obj. 3. Further. It is written (James 3. 17) The wisdom, that is from above, first indeed is chaste, then peaceable, modest, easy to be persuaded, consenting to the good, full of mercy and good fruits, judging without dissimulation (Vulg.,—without judging, without dissimulation.). Therefore the beatitude corresponding to wisdom should not refer to peace rather than to the other effects of heavenly wisdom.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Serm Dom. in Monte, i, 4)² that "wisdom is becoming to peacemakers, in whom there is no movement of rebellion, but only obedience to reason."

I answer that, The seventh beatitude is fittingly ascribed to the gift of wisdom, both as to the merit and as to the reward. The merit is denoted in the words, Blessed are the peacemakers. Now a peacemaker is one who makes peace, either in himself, or in others, and in both cases this is the result of setting in due order those things in which peace is established; for "peace is the tranquillity of order," according to Augustine.³ Now "it pertains to wisdom to set things in order," as the Philosopher declares;⁴ therefore to be peaceful is fittingly ascribed to wisdom. The reward is expressed in the words, they shall be called the children of God. Now men are called the children of God in so far as they participate in the likeness of the only begotten and natural Son of God, according to Rom. 8. 29, Whom He foreknew . . . to be made conformable to the image of His Son, Who is Wisdom Begotten. Hence by participating in the gift of wisdom, man attains to the sonship of God.

³ City of God, XIX, 13 (PL 41, 640).

⁴ Metaphysics, I, 2 (982^a18).

Reply Obj. 1. It belongs to charity to be at peace, but it belongs to wisdom to make peace by setting things in order. Likewise the Holy Ghost is called the "Spirit of adoption" in so far as we receive from Him the likeness of the natural Son, Who is the Begotten Wisdom.

Reply Obj. 2. These words refer to the Un-created Wisdom, which in the first place unites itself to us by the gift of charity, and consequently reveals to us the mysteries, the knowledge of which is infused wisdom. Hence, the infused wisdom which is a gift is not the cause but the effect of charity.

Reply Obj. 3. As stated above (A. 3) it belongs to wisdom, as a gift not only to contemplate Divine things, but also to regulate human acts. Now the first thing to be effected in this direction of human acts is the removal of evils opposed to wisdom; therefore fear is said to be the beginning of wisdom (Ps. 110. 10), because it makes us shun evil, while the last thing is like an end, by which all things are reduced to their right order; and it is this that constitutes peace. Hence James said with reason that the wisdom that is from above (and this is the gift of the Holy Ghost) first indeed is chaste, because it avoids the corruption of sin, and then peaceable, wherein lies the ultimate effect of wisdom, for which reason peace is numbered among the beatitudes. As to the things that follow, they declare in becoming order the means by which wisdom leads to peace. For when a man, by modesty, avoids the corruption of sin, the first thing he has to do is, as far as he can, to be moderate in all things, and in this respect wisdom is said to be "modest." Secondly, in those matters in which he is not sufficient by himself, he should be guided by the advice of others, and as to this we are told further that wisdom is "easy to be persuaded." These two are conditions required that man may be at peace with himself. But in order that man may be at peace with others it is furthermore required, first that he should not be opposed to their good; this is what is meant by "consenting to the good." Secondly, that he should bring to his neighbour's deficiencies, sympathy in his heart, and succour in his actions, and this is denoted by the words "full of mercy and good fruits." Thirdly, he should strive in all charity to correct the sins of others, and this is indicated by the words "judging without dissimulation," lest he should purpose to sate his hatred under cover of correction.

QUESTION XLVI

OF FOLLY, WHICH IS OPPOSED TO WISDOM

(In Three Articles)

WE must now consider folly, which is opposed to wisdom; and under this head there are three points of inquiry: (1) Whether folly is contrary to wisdom? (2) Whether folly is a sin? (3) To which capital sin is it reducible?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Folly Is Contrary to Wisdom?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that folly is not contrary to wisdom.

Objection 1. For it seems that unwisdom is directly opposed to wisdom. But folly does not seem to be the same as unwisdom, for the latter is apparently about Divine things alone, while folly is about both Divine and human things. Therefore folly is not contrary to wisdom.

Obj. 2. Further, One contrary is not the way to arrive at the other. But folly is the way to arrive at wisdom, for it is written (I Cor. 3. 18): If any man among you seem to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise. Therefore folly is not opposed to wisdom.

Obj. 3. Further, One contrary is not the cause of the other. But wisdom is the cause of folly; for it is written (Jerem. 10. 14): Every man is become a fool for knowledge, and wisdom is a kind of knowledge. Moreover it is written (Isa. 47. 10): Thy wisdom and thy knowledge, this hath deceived thee. Now to be deceived pertains to folly. Therefore folly is not contrary to wisdom.

Obj. 4. Further, Isidore says (Etym. x, under the letter S)¹ that "a fool is one whom shame does not incite to sorrow, and who is unconcerned when he is injured." But this pertains to spiritual wisdom, according to Gregory (Moral. x, 29).² Therefore folly is not opposed to wisdom.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Moral. ii. 49)³ that "the gift of wisdom is given as a remedy against folly."

I answer that, Folly (Stultitia) seems to take its name from "stupor"; and so Isidore says (loc. cit.): "A fool is one who through dulness (stuporem) remains unmoved." And folly differs from fatuity, according to the same authority (ibid.),¹ in that folly implies apathy in the heart and dulness in the senses while fatuity denotes entire privation of the spiritual sense. Therefore folly is fittingly opposed to wisdom.

² PL 75, 947.

For sapiens (wise) as Isidore says (ibid.) "is so named from sapor (savour), because just as the taste is quick to distinguish between savours of meats, so is a wise man in discerning things and causes." Therefore it is manifest that folly is opposed to wisdom as its contrary, while fatuity is opposed to it is a pure negation, for the fatuous man lacks the sense of judgment; the fool has the sense, though dulled, and the wise man has the sense acute and penetrating.

Reply Obj. 1. According to Isidore (ibid.) unwisdom is contrary to wisdom because it lacks the savour of discretion and sense, so that unwisdom seems to be the same as folly. Yet a man would appear to be a fool chiefly through some deficiency in the verdict of that judgment which is according to the highest cause, for if a man fails in judgment about some trivial matter, he is not for that reason called a fool.

Reply Obj. 2. Just as there is an evil wisdom, as stated above (Q. XLV, A. 1, reply 1), which is called worldly wisdom, because it takes for the highest cause and last end some worldly good, so too there is a good folly opposed to this evil wisdom, by which man despises worldly things; and it is of this folly that the Apostle speaks.

Reply Obj. 3. It is the wisdom of the world that deceives and makes us foolish in God's sight, as is evident from the Apostle's words (I Cor. 3. 19).

Reply Obj. 4. To be unconcerned when one is injured is sometimes due to the fact that one has no taste for worldly things, but only for heavenly things. Hence this belongs not to worldly but to Divine wisdom, as Gregory declares (ibid.). Sometimes however it is the result of a man's being stupid absolutely about everything, as may be seen in idiots, who do not discern what is injurious to them, and this belongs to folly absolutely.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Folly Is a Sin?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that folly is not a sin.

Objection 1. For no sin arises in us from nature. But some are fools naturally. Therefore folly is not a sin.

¹ Cf. also Etym., x, under the letter F (PL 82, 377).

Obj. 2. Further, "Every sin is voluntary," according to Augustine (De Vera Relig. xiv).² But folly is not voluntary. Therefore it is not a sin.

Obj. 3. Further, Every sin is contrary to a Divine precept. But folly is not contrary to any precept. Therefore folly is not a sin.

On the contrary, It is written (Prov. 1. 32): The prosperity of fools shall destroy them. But no man is destroyed save for sin. Therefore folly is a sin.

I answer that, Folly, as stated above (A. 1), denotes dulness of sense in judging, and chiefly as regards the highest cause, which is the last end and the sovereign good. Now a man may in this respect contract dulness in judgment in two ways. First, from a natural indisposition, as in the case of idiots, and such folly is no sin. Secondly, by plunging his sense into earthly things, by which his sense is rendered incapable of perceiving Divine things, according to I Cor. 2. 14. The sensual man perceiveth not these things that are of the Spirit of God, even as sweet things have no savour for a man whose taste is infected with an evil humour; and such folly is a sin.

This suffices for the Reply to the First Objection.

Reply Obj. 2. Though no man wishes to be a fool, yet he wishes those things of which folly is a consequence, namely to withdraw his sense from spiritual things and to plunge it into earthly things. The same thing happens in regard to other sins; for the lustful man desires pleasure, without which there is no sin, although he does not desire sin absolutely, for he would wish to enjoy the pleasure without sin.

Reply Obj. 3. Folly is opposed to the precepts about the contemplation of truth, of which we have spoken above (Q. XVI) when we were treating of knowledge and understanding.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Folly Is a Daughter of Lust?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that folly is not a daughter of lust.

Objection 1. For Gregory (Moral. xxxi, 45)³ enumerates the daughters of lust, among which however he makes no mention of folly. Therefore folly does not proceed from lust.

Obj. 2. Further, The Apostle says (I Cor. 3. 19): The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. Now, according to Gregory (Moral. x, 20)⁴ "the wisdom of this world consists in covering the heart with crafty devices"; and this pertains to duplicity. Therefore folly is a daughter of duplicity rather than of lust.

³ PL 76, 621.

⁴ PL 75, 947.

Obj. 3. Further, Anger especially is the cause of fury and madness in some persons, and this pertains to folly. Therefore folly arises from anger rather than from lust.

On the contrary, It is written (Prov. 7. 22): Immediately he followeth her, that is, the harlot . . . not knowing that he is drawn like a fool to bonds.

I answer that, As already stated (A. 2), folly, in so far as it is a sin, is caused by the spiritual sense being dulled, so as to be incapable of judging spiritual things. Now man's sense is plunged into earthly things chiefly by lust, which is about the greatest pleasures; and these absorb the mind more than any others. Therefore the folly which is a sin arises chiefly from lust.

Reply Obj. 1. It is part of folly that a man should have a distaste for God and His gifts. Hence Gregory mentions two daughters of lust, pertaining to folly, namely, "hatred of God and despair of the life to come"; thus he divides folly into two parts as it were.

Reply Obj. 2. These words of the Apostle are to be understood, not causally but essentially, because, namely, worldly wisdom itself is folly with God. Hence it does not follow that whatever belongs to worldly wisdom is a cause of this folly.

Reply Obj. 3. Anger by reason of its keenness, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XLVIII, A. 2), produces a great change in the nature of the body, and therefore it conduces very much to the folly which results from a bodily impediment. On the other hand the folly which is caused by a spiritual impediment, namely by the mind being plunged into earthly things, arises chiefly from lust, as stated above.

TREATISE ON ACTIVE AND CONTEMPLATIVE LIFE

QUESTION CLXXIX OF THE DIVISION OF LIFE INTO ACTIVE AND CONTEMPLATIVE (In Two Articles)

WE must next consider active and contemplative life. This consideration will be fourfold: (1) Of the division of life into active and contemplative; (2) Of the contemplative life (q. CLXXX); (3) Of the active life (q. CLXXXI); (4) Of the comparison between the active and the contemplative life (q. CLXXXII).

Under the first head there are two points of inquiry: (1) Whether life is fittingly divided into active and contemplative? (2) Whether this is an adequate division?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Life Is Fittingly Divided into Active and Contemplative?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that life is not fittingly divided into active and contemplative.

Objection 1. For the soul is the principle of life by its essence; for the Philosopher says¹ that "in living things to live is to be." Now the soul is the principle of action and contemplation by its powers. Therefore it would seem that life is not fittingly divided into active and contemplative.

Obj. 2. Further, The division of that which comes afterwards is unfittingly applied to that which comes first. Now active and contemplative, or speculative and practical, are differences of the intellect,² while "to live" comes before "to understand," since "to live" comes first to living things through the vegetative soul, as the Philosopher states.³ Therefore life is unfittingly divided into active and contemplative.

Obj. 3. Further, The word "life" implies movement, according to Dionysius (Div. Nom. iv);⁴ but contemplation consists rather in rest, according to Wisd. 8. 16: When I enter into my house, I shall repose myself with her. Therefore it would seem that life is unfittingly divided into active and contemplative.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Hom. ii, super Ezech.):⁵ "There is a twofold life wherein Almighty God instructs us by His holy word, the active life and the contemplative."

I answer that, Properly speaking, those things are said to live whose movement or operation is from within themselves. Now that which is proper to a thing and to which it is most inclined, is that which is most becoming to it from itself; and so every living thing gives proof of its life by that operation which is most proper to it, and to which it is most inclined. Thus the life of plants is said to consist in nourishment and generation; the life of animals in sensation and movement; and the life of men in their understanding and acting according to reason. Therefore also in men the life of every man would seem to be that in which he delights most, and on which he is most intent, and that in which especially they wish to pass their time with their friends, as stated in the Ethics.⁶ Accordingly since certain men are especially intent on the contemplation of truth, while others are especially intent on external actions, it follows that man's life is fittingly divided into active and contemplative.

Reply Obj. 1. Each thing's proper form that makes it actually to be is the principle of operation proper to that thing. Hence to live is, in living things, to be, because living things through having being from their form, act in such and such a way.

Reply Obj. 2. Life in general is not divided into active and contemplative, but the life of man, who derives his species from having an intellect, and therefore the same division applies to intellect and human life.

Reply Obj. 3. It is true that contemplation enjoys rest from external movements. Nevertheless to contemplate is itself a movement of the intellect, in so far as every operation is described as a movement; in which sense the Phi-philosopher says¹ that sensation and understanding are movements of a kind, in so far as the act of a perfect thing is a movement. In this way Dionysius (Div. Nom. iv)² ascribes three movements to the soul in contemplation, namely straight, circular, and oblique.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Life Is Adequately Divided into Active and Contemplative?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that life is not adequately divided into active and contemplative.

Objection 1. For the Philosopher says³ that "there are three most excellent kinds of life," the life of pleasure, the civil which would seem to be the same as the active, and the contemplative life. Therefore the division of life into active and contemplative would seem to be inadequate.

Obj. 2. Further, Augustine mentions⁴ three kinds of life, namely the life of "leisure" which pertains to the contemplative, the "busy" life which pertains to the active, and a third "composed of both." Therefore it would seem that life is inadequately divided into active and contemplative.

Obj. 3. Further, Man's life is diversified according to the different actions in which men are occupied. Now there are more than two occupations of human actions. Therefore it would seem that life should be divided into more kinds than the active and the contemplative.

On the contrary, These two lives are signified by the two wives of Jacob (Gen. 19): the active by Lia, and the contemplative by Rachel; and by the two hostesses of our Lord: the contemplative life by Mary, and the active life by Martha (Luke 10. 38), as Gregory declares (Moral vi, 37).⁵ Now this signification would not be fitting if there were more than two lives. Therefore life is adequately divided into active and contemplative.

I answer that, As stated in the foregoing Article (reply 2), this division applies to the human life as derived from the intellect. Now the intellect is divided into active and contemplative, since the end of intellectual knowledge is either the knowledge itself of truth, which pertains to the contemplative intellect, or some external action, which pertains to the practical or active intellect. Therefore life too is adequately divided into active and contemplative.

Reply Obj. 1. The life of pleasure places its end in pleasures of the body, which are common to us and dumb animals; therefore as the Philosopher says,⁶ it is the life of a beast. Hence it is not included in this division of the life of a man into active and contemplative.

Reply Obj. 2. A mean is a combination of extremes, and therefore it is virtually contained in them, as tepid in hot and cold, and pale in white and black. In like manner active and contemplative comprise that which is composed of both. Nevertheless as in every mixture one of the absolutes predominates, so too, in the mean state of life sometimes the contemplative, sometimes the active element, abounds.

Reply Obj. 3. All the occupations of human actions, if directed to the requirements of the present life in accord with right reason, belong to the active life which provides for the necessities of the present life by means of well-ordered activity. If, on the other hand, they minister to any concupiscence whatever, they belong to the life of pleasure, which is not comprised under the active life. Those human occupations that are directed to the consideration of truth belong to the contemplative life.

QUESTION CLXXX OF THE CONTEMPLATIVE LIFE
(In Eight Articles)

WE must now consider the contemplative life, under which head there are eight points of inquiry: (1) Whether the contemplative life pertains to the intellect only, or also to the affections? (2) Whether the moral virtues pertain to the contemplative life? (3) Whether the contemplative life consists in one action or in several? (4) Whether the consideration of any truth whatever pertains to the contemplative life? (5) Whether the contemplative life of man in this state can arise to the vision of God? (6) Of the movements of contemplation assigned by Dionysius (Div. Nom. iv). (7) Of the pleasure of contemplation. (8) Of the duration of contemplation.

ARTICLE 1. Whether the Contemplative Life Has Nothing To Do With the Affections, and Pertains Wholly to the Intellect?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that the contemplative life has nothing to do with the affections and pertains wholly to the intellect.

Objection 1. For the Philosopher says⁷ that

⁶ Loc. cit. ⁷ Metaphysics, II, 1 (993^b20).

³ Ethics, I, 5 (1095^b17).

⁴ City of God, XIX, 2, 3, 19 (PL 41, 624; 627; 647).

⁵ PL 75, 764.

"the end of contemplation is truth." Now truth pertains wholly to the intellect. Therefore it would seem that the contemplative life wholly regards the intellect.

Obj. 2. Further, Gregory says (Moral. vi, 37)¹ that "Rachel, which is interpreted 'vision of the principle,' signifies the contemplative life." Now the vision of a principle belongs properly to the intellect. Therefore the contemplative life belongs properly to the intellect.

Obj. 3. Further, Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.)² that it pertains to the contemplative life "to rest from external action." Now the affective or appetitive power inclines to external actions. Therefore it would seem that the contemplative life has nothing to do with the appetitive power.

On the contrary, Gregory says (ibid.) that "the contemplative life is to cling with our whole mind to the love of God and our neighbour, and to desire nothing beside our Creator." Now desire and love pertain to the affective or appetitive power, as stated above (Part I-II, q. xxv, a. 2). Therefore the contemplative life has also something to do with the affective or appetitive power.

I answer that, As stated above (q. clxxv, a. 1) the contemplative life is said of those who are chiefly intent on the contemplation of truth. Now intention is an act of the will, as stated above (Part I-II, q. xii, a. 1), because intention is of the end which is the object of the will. Consequently the contemplative life, as regards the essence of the action, pertains to the intellect, but as regards what moves to the exercise of that action it belongs to the will, which moves all the other powers, even the intellect, to their actions, as stated above (Part I-II, q. ix, a. 1).

Now the appetitive power moves one to observe things either with the senses or with the intellect, sometimes for love of the thing seen because, as it is written (Matt. 6. 21), where thy treasure is, there is thy heart also, sometimes for love of the very knowledge that one acquires by observation. Hence Gregory makes the contemplative life to consist in "the love of God," in so far as through loving God we are aflame to gaze on His beauty. And since everyone delights when he obtains what he loves, it follows that the contemplative life terminates in delight, which is seated in the affective power, the result being that love also becomes more intense.

Reply Obj. 1. From the very fact that truth is the end of contemplation, it has the aspect of an appetible good, both lovable and delightful, and in this respect it pertains to the appetitive power.

Reply Obj. 2. We are urged to the vision of the first principle, namely God, by the love for it; hence Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.)³ that "the contemplative life tramples on all cares and longs to see the face of its Creator."

Reply Obj. 3. The appetitive power moves not only the bodily members to perform external actions, but also the intellect to practise the act of contemplation, as stated in the Article.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the Moral Virtues Pertain to the Contemplative Life?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that the moral virtues pertain to the contemplative life.

Objection 1. For Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.)⁴ that "the contemplative life is to cling to the love of God and our neighbour with the whole mind." Now all the moral virtues, whose acts are prescribed by the precepts of the Law, are reducible to the love of God and of our neighbour, for love . . . is the fulfilling of the Law (Rom. 13. 10). Therefore it would seem that the moral virtues belong to the contemplative life.

Obj. 2. Further, The contemplative life is chiefly directed to the contemplation of God; for Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.)⁵ that "the mind tramples on all cares and longs to gaze on the face of its Creator." Now no one can accomplish this without cleanness of heart, which is a result of moral virtue. For it is written (Matt. 5. 8): Blessed are the clean of heart, for they shall see God; and (Heb. 12. 14): Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see God. Therefore it would seem that the moral virtues pertain to the contemplative life.

Obj. 3. Further, Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.)⁶ that "the contemplative life gives beauty to the soul," and so it is signified by Rachel, of whom it is said (Gen. 29. 17) that she was of a beautiful countenance. Now the beauty of the soul consists in the moral virtues, especially temperance, as Ambrose says (De Offic. i, 43).⁷ Therefore it seems that the moral virtues pertain to the contemplative life.

On the contrary, The moral virtues are directed to external actions. Now Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.)⁸ that it belongs to the contemplative life "to rest from external action." Therefore the moral virtues do not pertain to the contemplative life.

I answer that, A thing may belong to the contemplative life in two ways, essentially or as a predisposition. The moral virtues do not belong to the contemplative life essentially, because the end of the contemplative life is the consideration of truth. And as the Philosopher states,¹ "knowledge," which pertains to the consideration of truth, "has little influence on the moral virtues"; hence he declares² that the moral virtues pertain to active but not to contemplative happiness.

On the other hand, the moral virtues belong to the contemplative life as a predisposition. For the act of contemplation, in which the contemplative life essentially consists is hindered both by the impetuosity of the passions which withdraw the soul's intention from intelligible to sensible things, and by outward disturbances. Now the moral virtues curb the impetuosity of the passions, and quell the disturbance of outward occupations. Hence moral virtues belong dispositively to the contemplative life.

Reply Obj. 1. As stated in the foregoing Article, the contemplative life has its moving cause on the part of the affections, and in this respect the love of God and our neighbour is requisite to the contemplative life. Now moving causes do not enter into the essence of a thing, but dispose and perfect it. Therefore it does not follow that the moral virtues belong essentially to the contemplative life.

Reply Obj. 2. Holiness, that is, cleanness of heart, is caused by the virtues that are concerned with the passions which hinder the purity of the reason; and peace is caused by justice which is about operations, according to Isa. 32. 17, The work of justice shall be peace, since he who refrains from wronging others lessens the occasions of quarrels and disturbances. Hence the moral virtues dispose one to the contemplative life by causing peace and cleanness of heart.

Reply Obj. 3. Beauty, as stated above (Q. CXLV, A. 2), consists in a certain clarity and due proportion. Now each of these has its roots in the reason, because both the light that makes beauty seen, and the establishing of due proportion among things belong to reason. Hence since the contemplative life consists in an act of the reason, there is beauty in it per se and essentially; therefore it is written (Wis. 8. 2) of the contemplation of wisdom: I became a lover of her beauty. On the other hand, beauty is in the moral virtues by participation, in so far that is as they share the order of reason; and above all is it in temperance, which restrains the concupiscences which especially darken the light of reason. Hence it is that the virtue of chastity most of all makes man apt for contemplation, since sexual pleasures most of all weigh the mind down to sensible objects, as Augustine says (Soliloq. i, 10).³

ARTICLE 3. Whether There Are Various Actions Pertaining to the Contemplative Life?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that there are various actions pertaining to the contemplative life.

Objection 1. For Richard of S. Victor⁴ distinguishes between contemplation, meditation, and cogitation. Yet all these apparently pertain to the contemplative life. Therefore it would seem that there are various actions pertaining to the contemplative life.

Obj. 2. Further, The Apostle says (II Cor. 3. 18): But we . . . beholding (speculantes) the glory of the Lord with open face, are transformed into the same clarity. (Vulg.,—into the same image from glory to glory.) Now this belongs to the contemplative life. Therefore in addition to the three mentioned above, vision (speculatio) belongs to the contemplative life.

Obj. 3. Further, Bernard says (De Consid. v, 14)⁵ that "the first and greatest contemplation is admiration of the Majesty." Now according to Damascene (De Fide Orthod. ii, 15)⁶ admiration is a kind of fear. Therefore it would seem that several acts are requisite for the contemplative life.

Obj. 4. Further, Prayer, reading, and meditation, are said to belong to the contemplative life.⁷ Again, hearing belongs to the contemplative life, since it is stated that Mary (by whom the contemplative life is signified) sitting . . . at the Lord's feet, heard His word (Luke 10. 39). Therefore it would seem that several acts are requisite for the contemplative life.

On the contrary, Life signifies here the operation on which a man is chiefly intent. Therefore if there are several operations of the contemplative life, there will be, not one, but several contemplative lives.

I answer that, We are now speaking of the contemplative life as it pertains to man. Now according to Dionysius (Div. Nom. vii)¹ between man and angel there is this difference, that an angel has an insight of the truth by simple apprehension, while as man arrives at the insight of a simple truth by a process from several things. Accordingly, then, the contemplative life has one act in which it is finally completed, namely the contemplation of truth, and from this act it derives its unity. Yet it has many acts by which it arrives at this final act. Some of these pertain to the reception of principles, from which it proceeds to the contemplation of truth; others are concerned with deducing from the principles, the truth the knowledge of which is sought; and the last and crowning act is the contemplation itself of the truth.

Reply Obj. 1. According to Richard of S. Victor (loc. cit.) cogitation would seem to pertain to the consideration (inspectio) of the many things from which a person intends to gather one simple truth. Hence cogitation may comprise not only the perceptions of the senses in the knowing of certain effects, but also the data of the imagination, and again the discourse of reason about the various signs or of anything that conduces to the truth in view, although, according to Augustine, (De Trin. xiv, 7),² cogitation may signify any actual operation of the intellect. Meditation would seem to be the process of reason from certain principles that lead to the contemplation of some truth; and consideration has the same meaning, according to Bernard (De Consid. ii, 2),³ although, according to the Philosopher,⁴ every operation of the intellect may be called consideration. But contemplation regards the simple act of gazing (intuitio) on the truth; hence Richard says again⁵ that "contemplation is the soul's clear and free dwelling (contuitus) upon the object of its gaze; meditation is the survey (intuitio) of the mind while occupied in searching for the truth; and cogitation is the mind's glance which is prone to wander."

Reply Obj. 2. According to a gloss of Augustine on his passage (De Trin. xv, 8),⁶ "beholding (speculatio) denotes seeing in a mirror (speculo), not from a watch-tower (specula)."⁷ Now to see a thing in a mirror is to see a cause in its effect in which its likeness is reflected. Hence "beholding" would seem to be reducible to meditation.

Reply Obj. 3. Admiration is a kind of fear resulting from the apprehension of a thing that surpasses our power. Hence it results from the contemplation of the sublime truth. For it was stated above (A. 1) that contemplation terminates in the affections.

Reply Obj. 4. Man reaches the knowledge of truth in two ways. First, by means of things received from another. In this way, as regards the things he receives from God, he needs prayer, according to Wisd. 7, I called upon God, and the spirit of wisdom came upon me, while as regards the things he receives from man, he needs hearing, in so far as he receives from the spoken word, and reading, in so far as he receives from the tradition of Holy Writ. Secondly, he needs to apply himself by his personal study, and thus he requires meditation.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the Contemplative Life Consists in the Contemplation of God Alone, or Also in the Consideration of Any Truth Whatever?

We proceed thus to the fourth Article: It seems that the contemplative life consists not only in the contemplation of God, but also in the consideration of any truth.

Objection 1. For it is written (Ps. 138, 14): Wonderful are Thy works, and my soul knoweth right well. Now the knowledge of God's works is effected by any contemplation of the truth. Therefore it would seem that it pertains to the contemplative life to contemplate not only the divine truth, but also any other.

Obj. 2. Further, Bernard says (De Consid. v, 14)⁷ that "contemplation consists in admiration first of God's majesty, secondly of His judgments, thirdly of His benefits, fourthly of His promises." Now of these four the first alone regards the divine truth, and the other three pertain to His effects. Therefore the contemplative life consists not only in the contemplation of the divine truth, but also in the consideration of truth regarding the divine effects.

Obj. 3. Further, Richard of S. Victor (De Contempl. i, 6)⁸ distinguishes six species of contemplation. The first belongs to "the imagination alone," and consists in thinking of corporeal things. The second is in "the imagination guided by reason," and consists in considering the order and disposition of sensible objects. The third is in the "reason based on the imagination"; when, that is, from the consideration of the visible we rise to the invisible. The fourth is "in the reason and according to reason," when the mind is intent on things invisible of which the imagination has no knowledge. The fifth is "above the reason," when by divine revelation we know things that cannot be comprehended by the human reason. The sixth is "above reason and against reason"; when, that is, by the divine enlightening we know things that seem contrary to human reason, such as the doctrine of the mystery of the Trinity. Now only the last of these would seem to pertain to the divine truth. Therefore the contemplation of truth regards not only the divine truth, but also that which is considered in creatures.

⁸ PL 196, 70.

Obj. 4. Further, In the contemplative life the contemplation of truth is sought as being the perfection of man. Now any truth is a perfection of the human intellect. Therefore the contemplative life consists in the contemplation of any truth.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Moral. vi, 37)¹ that "in contemplation we seek the principle, which is God."

I answer that, As stated above (A 2), a thing may belong to the contemplative life in two ways: principally, and secondarily or as a pre-disposition. That which belongs principally to the contemplative life is the contemplation of the divine truth, because this contemplation is the end of the whole human life. Hence Augustine says (De Trin. i, 8)² that "the contemplation of God is promised us as being the goal of all our actions and the everlasting perfection of our joys." This contemplation will be perfect in the life to come, when we shall see God face to face, and it will make us perfectly happy. But now the contemplation of the divine truth is open to us imperfectly, namely through a glass and in a dark manner (I Cor. 13. 12). Hence it bestows on us a certain beginning of happiness, which starts now and will be continued in the life to come; hence the Philosopher³ places man's ultimate happiness in the contemplation of the supreme intelligible object.

Since, However, God's effects show us the way to the contemplation of God Himself, according to Rom. 1. 20, The invisible things of God . . . are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, it follows that the contemplation of the divine effects also belongs in a secondary way to the contemplative life, according, that is, as man is guided in this way to the knowledge of God. Hence Augustine says (De Vera Relig. xxix)⁴ that "in the study of creatures we must not exercise an empty and futile curiosity, but should make them the stepping-stone to things unperishable and everlasting."

Accordingly it is clear from what has been said (AA. 2, 3) that four things pertain, in a certain order, to the contemplative life: first, the moral virtues; secondly, other acts apart from contemplation; thirdly, contemplation of the divine effects; fourthly, the complement of all, which is the contemplation of the divine truth itself.

Reply Obj. 1. David sought the knowledge of God's works so that he might be led by them to God; hence he says elsewhere (Ps. 142. 5, 6): I meditated on all Thy works: I meditated upon the works of Thy hands: I stretched forth my hands to Thee.

Reply Obj. 2. By considering the divine judgments man is guided to the consideration of the divine justice; and by considering the divine benefits and promises, man is led to the knowledge of God's mercy or goodness, as by effects already manifested or yet to be vouchsafed.

Reply Obj. 3. These six denote the steps by which we ascend by means of creatures to the contemplation of God. For the first step consists in the perception of sensible things themselves; the second step consists in going forward from sensible to intelligible things; the third step is to judge of sensible things according to intelligible things; the fourth is the absolute consideration of the intelligible things to which one has attained by means of sensibles; the fifth is the contemplation of those intelligible things that are unattainable by means of sensibles, but which the reason is able to grasp; the sixth step is the consideration of such intelligible things as the reason can neither discover nor grasp, which pertain to the sublime contemplation of divine truth, in which contemplation is ultimately perfected.

Reply Obj. 4. The ultimate perfection of the intellect is the divine truth; and other truths perfect the intellect in relation to the divine truth.

ARTICLE 5. Whether in the Present State of Life the Contemplative Life Can Reach to the Vision of the Divine Essence?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It seems that in the present state of life the contemplative life can reach to the vision of the Divine essence.

Objection 1. For, as stated in Gen. 32. 30, Jacob said: I have seen God face to face, and my soul has been saved. Now the vision of God's face is the vision of the Divine essence. There-

² PL 42, 831.

³ Ethics, x, 7 (1177^a-17).

⁴ PL 34, 145.

fore it would seem that in the present life one may come, by means of contemplation, to see God in His essence.

Obj. 2. Further, Gregory says (Moral. vi, 37)¹ that contemplative men "withdraw within themselves in order to explore spiritual things, nor do they ever carry with them the shadows of things corporeal, or if these follow them they prudently drive them away; but being desirous of seeing the boundless light, they suppress all the images by which they tend to circumscribe themselves, and through longing to reach what is above them, they overcome that which they are." Now man is not hindered from seeing the Divine essence, which is the boundless light, save by the necessity of turning to corporeal phantasms. Therefore it would seem that the contemplation of the present life can extend to the vision of the boundless light in its essence.

Obj. 3. Further, Gregory says (Dial. ii, 35):² "All creatures are small to the soul that sees its Creator; therefore when the man of God, (the blessed Benedict, namely), saw a fiery globe in the tower and angels returning to heaven, without doubt he could only see such things by the light of God." Now the blessed Benedict was still in this life. Therefore the contemplation of the present life can extend to the vision of the essence of God.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.):³ "As long as we live in this mortal flesh, no one reaches such a height of contemplation as to fix the eyes of his mind on the ray itself of boundless light."

I answer that, As Augustine says (Gen. ad Lit. xii, 27),⁴ "no one seeing God lives this mortal life wherein the bodily senses have their play; and unless in some way he depart this life, whether by going altogether out of his body, or by withdrawing from his carnal senses, he is not caught up into that vision." This has been carefully discussed above (Q. CLXXV, AA. 4, 5), where we spoke of rapture, and in the First Part (Q. XII, A. 11), where we treated of the vision of God.

Accordingly we must state that one may be in this life in two ways. First, with regard to act, that is to say by actually making use of the bodily senses, and thus contemplation in the present life can in no way attain to the vision of God's essence. Secondly, one may be in this life potentially and not with regard to act, that is to say, when the soul is united to the mortal body as its form, yet so as to make use neither of the bodily senses, nor even of the imagination, as happens in rapture; and in this way the contemplation of the present life can attain to the vision of the Divine essence. Consequently the highest degree of contemplation in the present life is that which Paul had in rapture, in which he was in a middle state between the present life and the life to come.

Reply Obj. 1. As Dionysius says in a letter to the monk Caius,⁵ "if anyone seeing God, understood what he saw, he saw not God Himself, but something belonging to God." And Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.):⁶ "By no means is God seen now in His glory; but the soul sees something of lower degree, and therefore advances along the straight road and afterwards attains to the glory of vision." Accordingly the words of Jacob, I saw God face to face do not imply that he saw God's essence, but that he saw some shape, imaginary of course, in which God spoke to him; or, "since we know a man by his face, by the face of God he signified his knowledge of Him," according to a gloss of Gregory on the same passage (Moral. xxiv, 6).⁷

Reply Obj. 2. In the present state of life human contemplation is impossible without phantasms, because it is connatural to man to see the intelligible species in the phantasms, as the Philosopher states.⁸ Yet the knowledge of our intellect does not rest in the phantasms themselves, but contemplates in them the purity of the intelligible truth; and this not only in natural knowledge, but also in that which we obtain by revelation. For Dionysius says (Cal. Hier. ii)⁹ that "the Divine glory shows us the angelic hierarchies under certain symbolic figures, and by its power we are brought back to the single ray of light," that is, to the simple knowledge of the intelligible truth. It is in this sense that we must understand the statement of Gregory that "contemplatives do not carry along with them the shadows of things corporeal," since their contemplation is not fixed on them but on the consideration of the intelligible truth.

Reply Obj. 3. By these words Gregory does not imply that the blessed Benedict in that vision saw God in His essence, but he wishes to show that because "all creatures are small to him that see God," it follows that all things can easily be seen through the enlightenment of the Divine light. Therefore he adds (ibid.): "For however little he may see of the Creator's light, all created things become petty to him."

ARTICLE 6. Whether the Operation of Contemplation Is Fittingly Divided Into a Threefold Movement, Circular, Straight, and Oblique?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It seems that the operation of contemplation is unfittingly divided into a threefold movement, circular, straight, and oblique (Div. Nom. iv).¹

Objection 1. For contemplation pertains exclusively to rest, according to Wisd. 8. 16, When I go into my house, I shall repose myself with her. Now movement is opposed to rest. Therefore the operations of the contemplative life should not be described as movements.

Obj. 2. Further, The action of the contemplative life pertains to the intellect, according to which man is like the angels. Now Dionysius describes these movements as being different in the angels from what they are in the soul. For he says (loc. cit.) that the circular movement in the angel is "according to his enlightenment by the beautiful and the good." On the other hand, he assigns the circular movement of the soul to several things: The first of which is "the withdrawal of the soul into itself from externals"; the second is "a certain concentration of its powers," by which it is rendered free of error and of outward occupation; and the third is "union with those things that are above it." Again, he describes differently their respective straight movements. For he says that the straight movement of the angel is "that by which he proceeds to the care of those things that are beneath him." On the other hand, he describes the straight movement of the soul as being twofold: first, "its progress towards things that are near it"; secondly, "its uplifting from external things to simple contemplation." Further, he assigns a different oblique movement to each. For he assigns the oblique movement of the angels to the fact that "while providing for those who have less they remain unchanged in relation to God"; but he assigns the oblique movement of the soul to the fact that "the soul is enlightened in Divine knowledge by reasoning and discoursing." Therefore it would seem that the operations of contemplation are unfittingly assigned according to the ways mentioned above.

Obj. 3. Further, Richard of S. Victor (De Contempl. i, 5)² mentions many other different movements in likeness to the birds of the air.

For some of these rise at one time to a great height, at another swoop down to earth, and they do so repeatedly; others fly now to the right, now to the left again and again; others go forwards or lag behind many times; others fly in a circle now more now less extended; and others remain suspended almost immovably in one place. Therefore it would seem that there are only three movements of contemplation.

On the contrary, stands the authority of Dionysius (loc. cit.).

I answer that, As stated above (Q. CLXXIX, A. 1, reply 3), the operation of the intellect, in which contemplation essentially consists, is called a movement in so far as movement is the act of a perfect thing, according to the Philosopher.³ Since, however, it is through sensible things that we come to the knowledge of intelligible things, and since sensible operations do not take place without movement, the result is that even intelligible operations are described as movements, and are differentiated in likeness to various movements. Now of bodily movements, local movements are the most perfect and come first, as proved in the Physics;⁴ therefore the foremost among intelligible operations are described by being likened to them. These movements are of three kinds; for there is the circular movement, by which a thing moves uniformly round one point as centre, another is the straight movement, by which a thing goes from one point to another; the third is oblique, being composed as it were of both the others. Consequently, in intelligible operations, that which is absolutely uniform is compared to circular movement; the intelligible operation by which one proceeds from one point to another is compared to the straight movement; while the intelligible operation which unites something of uniformity with progress to various points is compared to the oblique movement.

Reply Obj. 1. External bodily movements are opposed to the rest of contemplation, which consists in rest from outward occupations; but the movements of intellectual operations belong to the rest of contemplation.

Reply Obj. 2. Man is like the angels in intellect generically, but the intellectual power is much higher in the angel than in man. Consequently these movements must be ascribed to men and angels in different ways, according as they are differently related to uniformity. For the angelic intellect has uniform knowledge in two respects. First, because it does not require intelligible truth from the variety of composite things; secondly, because it understands the truth of intelligible things not discursively, but by simple intuition. On the other hand, the intellect of the soul acquires intelligible truth from sensible things, and understands it by a certain discourse of the reason.

³ Soul, III, 7 (431^a4).

Therefore Dionysius assigns the circular movement of the angels to the fact that their intuition of God is uniform and unceasing, having neither beginning nor end; even as a circular movement having neither beginning nor end is uniformly around the one same centre. But on the part of the soul, before it can arrive at this uniformity, its twofold lack of uniformity needs to be removed. First, that which arises from the variety of external things, and this is removed by the soul withdrawing from externals, and so the first thing he mentions regarding the circular movement of the soul is "the soul's withdrawal into itself from external objects." Secondly, another lack of uniformity requires to be removed from the soul, and this is owing to the discourse of reason. This is done by directing all the soul's operations to the simple contemplation of the intelligible truth, and this is indicated by his saying in the second place that "the soul's intellectual powers must be uniformly concentrated," in other words that discourse must be laid aside and the soul's gaze fixed on the contemplation of the one simple truth. In this operation of the soul there is no error, even as there is clearly no error in the understanding of first principles which we know by simple intuition. Afterwards, these two things being presupposed, he mentions thirdly the uniformity which is like that of the angels, for then all things being laid aside, the soul continues in the contemplation of God alone. This he expresses by saying: "Then being thus made uniform, by being brought to unity (that is, conformity) and with its powers united, it is conducted to the good and the beautiful."

The straight movement of the angel cannot apply to his proceeding from one thing to another by considering them, but only to the order of his providence, namely to the fact that the higher angel enlightens the lower angels through the angels that are intermediate. He indicates this when he says: "The angel's movement takes a straight line when he proceeds to the care of things subject to him, taking in his course whatever things are direct," that is, in keeping with the dispositions of the direct order. The straight movement in the soul he ascribes however to the soul's proceeding from exterior sensibles to the knowledge of intelligible objects.

The oblique movement in the angels he describes as being composed of the straight and circular movements, in so far as their care for those beneath them is in accordance with their contemplation of God. The oblique movement in the soul he also declares to be partly straight and partly circular, in so far as in reasoning it makes use of the light received from God.

Reply Obj. 3. These varieties of movement that are taken from the distinction between above and below, right and left, forwards and backwards, and from varying circles, are all comprised under either straight and oblique movement, because they all denote the discourse of reason. For if the reason pass from the genus to the species, or from the part to the whole, it will be, as he explains, from above to below; if from one opposite to another, it will be from right to left; if from the cause to the effect, it will be backwards and forwards; if it be about accidents that surround a thing, near at hand or far remote, the movement will be circular. The discourse of reason from sensible to intelligible objects, if it be according to the order of natural reason, belongs to the straight movement; but if be according to the Divine enlightenment, it will belong to the oblique movement as explained above (reply 2). That alone which he describes as immobility belongs to the circular movement.

Hence it is evident that Dionysius describes the movement of contemplation with much greater fullness and depth.

ARTICLE 7. Whether There Is Delight in Contemplation?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It seems that there is no delight in contemplation.

Objection 1. For delight belongs to the appetitive power; but contemplation resides chiefly in the intellect. Therefore it would seem that there is no delight in contemplation.

Obj. 2. Further, All strife and struggle is a hindrance to delight. Now there is strife and struggle in contemplation. For Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.)¹ that "when the soul strives to contemplate God, it is in a state of struggle; at one time it almost overcomes, because by understanding and feeling it tastes something of the unbounded light, and at another time it almost succumbs, because even while tasting it fails." Therefore there is no delight in contemplation.

Obj. 3. Further, Delight is the result of a perfect operation, as stated in the Ethics.² Now the contemplation of wayfarers is imperfect, according to I Cor. 13. 12, We see now through a glass in a dark manner. Therefore it seems that there is no delight in the contemplative life.

² Aristotle, x, 4 (1174^b23).

Obj. 4. Further, A lesion of the body is an obstacle to delight. Now contemplation causes a lesion of the body; thus it is stated (Gen. 32.) that after Jacob had said (verse 30) I have seen God face to face, he halted on his foot, . . . because he touched the sinew of his thigh and it shrank. Therefore it seems that there is no delight in contemplation.

On the contrary, It is written of the contemplation of wisdom (Wisd. 8. 16): Her conversation hath no bitterness, nor her company any tediousness, but joy and gladness; and Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.)¹ that "the contemplative life is sweetness exceedingly lovable."

I answer that, There may be delight in any particular contemplation in two ways. First by reason of the operation itself, because each individual delights in the operation which befits him according to his own nature or habit. Now contemplation of the truth befits a man according to his nature as a rational animal, the result being that all men naturally desire to know, so that consequently they delight in the knowledge of truth. And more delightful still does this become to one who has the habit of wisdom and science, the result of which is that he contemplates without difficulty. Secondly, contemplation may be delightful on the part of its object, in so far as one contemplates that which one loves; even as bodily vision gives pleasure not only because to see is pleasurable in itself, but because one sees a person whom one loves. Since, then, the contemplative life consists chiefly in the contemplation of God, to which charity moves us, as stated above (AA. 1, 2, reply 1), it follows that there is delight in the contemplative life, not only by reason of the contemplation itself, but also by reason of the Divine love.

In both respects the delight surpasses all human delight, both because spiritual delight is greater than carnal pleasure, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. xxxi, A. 5), when we were treating of the passions, and because the love itself by which God is loved out of charity surpasses all love. Hence it is written (Ps. 33. 9): O taste and see that the Lord is sweet.

Reply Obj. 1. Although the contemplative life consists essentially in an act of the intellect, it has its beginning in the appetite, since it is through charity that one is urged to the contemplation of God. And since the end corresponds to the beginning, it follows that the term also and the end of the contemplative life has its being in the affections, since one delights in seeing the object loved, and the very delight in the object seen arouses a yet greater love. Hence Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.)² that "when we see one whom we love, we are so aflame as to love him more." And this is the ultimate perfection of the contemplative life, namely that the Divine truth be not only seen but also loved.

Reply Obj. 2. Strife or struggle arising from the opposition of an external thing hinders delight in that thing. For a man delights not in a thing against which he strives. But in that for which he strives he delights yet more when he has obtained it, other things being equal. Therefore Augustine says³ that "the more peril there was in the battle, the greater the joy in the triumph." But there is no strife or struggle in contemplation from the truth which we contemplate being contrary to us, though there is on the part of our defective understanding and our corruptible body which drags us down to lower things, according to Wisd. 9. 15, The corruptible body is a load upon the soul, and the earthly habitation presseth down the mind that museth upon many things. Hence it is that when man attains to the contemplation of truth, he loves it yet more, while he hates the more his own deficiency and the weight of his corruptible body, so as to say with the Apostle (Rom. 7. 24): Unhappy man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? Therefore Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.):⁴ "When God is once known by desire and understanding, He withers all carnal pleasure in us."

Reply Obj. 3. The contemplation of God in this life is imperfect in comparison with the contemplation in heaven; and in like manner the delight of the wayfarer's contemplation is imperfect as compared with the delight of contemplation in heaven, of which it is written (Ps. 35. 9): Thou shalt make them drink of the torrent of Thy pleasure. Yet, though the contemplation of Divine things which is to be had by wayfarers is imperfect, it is more delightful than all other contemplation however perfect, on account of the excellence of that which is contemplated. Hence the Philosopher says:⁵ "It happens that these substances, excellent beyond compare, and divine, are less accessible to our knowledge, and though we grasp them but feebly, nevertheless from their excellence that knowledge gives us more delight than any of those things that are round about us"; and Gregory says in the same sense (loc. cit.): "The contemplative life is sweetness exceedingly lovable; for it carries the soul away above itself, it opens heaven and discovers the spiritual world to the eyes of the mind."

Reply Obj. 4. After contemplation Jacob halted with one foot, "because we need to grow weak in the love of the world before we wax strong in the love of God," as Gregory says (loc. cit.). Therefore, as he goes on to say, "when we have known the sweetness of God, we have one foot sound while the other halts; since every one who halts on one foot leans only on that foot which is sound."

ARTICLE 8. Whether the Contemplative Life Is Continuous?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It seems that the contemplative life is not continuous.

Objection 1. For the contemplative life consists essentially in things pertaining to the intellect. Now all the intellectual perfections of this life will be made void, according to I Cor. 13. 8, Whether prophecies shall be made void, or tongues shall cease, or knowledge shall be destroyed. Therefore the contemplative life is made void.

Obj. 2. Further, A man tastes the sweetness of contemplation by snatches and for a short time only. Hence Augustine says,¹ "Thou admittest me to a most unwonted affection in my inmost soul, to a strange sweetness, . . . yet through my grievous weight I sink down again." Again, Gregory commenting on the words of Job 4. 15, When a spirit passed before me, says:² "The mind does not remain long at rest in the sweetness of inward contemplation, for it is recalled to itself and beaten back by the very immensity of the light." Therefore the contemplative life is not continuous.

Obj. 3. Further, That which is not connatural to man cannot be continuous. Now "the contemplative life," according to the Philosopher,³ "is better than the life which is according to man." Therefore it seems that the contemplative life is not continuous.

On the contrary, Our Lord said (Luke 10. 42): Mary hath chosen the best part, which shall not be taken away from her, since as Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.),⁴ "the contemplative life begins here so as it may be perfected in our heavenly home."

I answer that, A thing may be described as continuous in two ways: first, in regard to its nature; secondly, in regard to us. It is evident that in regard to itself contemplative life is continuous for two reasons: first, because it is about incorruptible and unchangeable things; secondly, because it has no contrary, for "there is nothing contrary to the pleasure of contemplation," as stated in the Topics.⁵ But even in our regard contemplative life is continuous,—both because it belongs to us in respect of the activity of the incorruptible part of the soul, namely the intellect, so that it can endure after this life,—and because in the works of the contemplative life we do not work with our bodies, so that we are the more able to persevere in this kind of work, as the Philosopher observes.⁶

Reply Obj. 1. The manner of contemplation is not the same here as in heaven; yet the contemplative life is said to remain by reason of charity, in which it has both its beginning and its end. Gregory speaks in this sense (Hom. ii in Ezech.):⁷ "The contemplative life begins here, so as to be perfected in our heavenly home, because the fire of love which begins to burn here is aflame with a yet greater love when we see Him Whom we love."

Reply Obj. 2. No action can last long at its highest pitch. Now the highest point of contemplation is to reach the uniformity of Divine contemplation, according to Dionysius (Div. Nom. iv)⁸ and as we have stated above (A. 6, reply 2). Hence although contemplation cannot last long in this respect, it can be of long duration as regards the other contemplative acts.

Reply Obj. 3. The Philosopher declares the contemplative life to be above man because it befits us "so far as there is in us something divine," namely the intellect, which is incorruptible and impassible in itself, so that its act can endure longer.

QUESTION CLXXXI

OF THE ACTIVE LIFE

(In Four Articles)

WE must now consider the active life, under which head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether all the works of the moral virtues pertain to the active life? (2) Whether prudence pertains to the active life? (3) Whether teaching pertains to the active life? (4) Of the duration of the active life.

ARTICLE 1. Whether All the Acts of the Moral Virtues Pertain to the Active Life?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that the acts of the moral virtues do not all pertain to the active life.

Objection 1. For the active life seems to regard only our relations with other persons. Hence Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.)¹ that "the active life is to give bread to the hungry," and after mentioning many things that regard our relations with other people he adds finally, "and to give to each and every one whatever he needs." Now we are not directed in our relations to others by all the acts of moral virtues, but only by those of justice and its parts, as stated above (Q. LVIII, AA. 2, 8; Part I-II, Q. LX, AA. 2, 3). Therefore the acts of the moral virtues do not all pertain to the active life.

Obj. 2. Further, Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.):² "Lia who was bleary-eyed but fruitful signifies the active... which being occupied with works, sees less, and yet since it urges one's neighbour both by word and example to its imitation it begets a numerous offspring of good deeds." Now this would seem to belong to charity, by which we love our neighbour, rather than to the moral virtues. Therefore it seems that the acts of moral virtue do not pertain to the active life.

Obj. 3. Further, As stated above (Q. CLXXX, A. 2), the moral virtues dispose one to the contemplative life. Now disposition and perfection belong to the same thing. Therefore it would seem that the moral virtues do not pertain to the active life.

On the contrary, Isidore says (De Summo Bono, iii, 15):³ "In the active life all vices must first of all be extirpated by the practice of good works, in order that in the contemplative life the mind's eye being purified one may advance to the contemplation of the Divine light." Now all vices are not extirpated save by the acts of the moral virtues. Therefore the acts of the moral virtues pertain to the active life.

I answer that, As stated above (Q. CLXXIX, A. 1) the active and the contemplative life differ according to the different occupations of men intent on different ends. One of these occupations is the consideration of the truth; and this is the end of the contemplative life, while the other is external work to which the active life is directed. Now it is evident that the moral virtues are chiefly directed not to the contemplation of truth but to operation. Hence the Philosopher says⁴ that "for virtue knowledge is of little or no avail." And so it is clear that the moral virtues belong essentially to the active life; for which reason the Philosopher⁵ subordinates the moral virtues to the happiness of the active life.

Reply Obj. 1. The chief of the moral virtues is justice by which one man is directed in his relations towards another, as the Philosopher proves.⁶ Hence the active life is described with reference to our relations with other people, because it consists in these things, not exclusively, but principally.

Reply Obj. 2. It is possible by the acts of all the moral virtues for one to direct one's neighbour to good by example, and this is what Gregory here ascribes to the active life.

Reply Obj. 3. Even as the virtue that is directed to the end of another virtue passes, in a certain way, into the species of the latter virtue, so again when a man makes use of things pertaining to the active life merely as dispositions to contemplation, such things are comprised under the contemplative life. On the other hand, when we practise the works of the moral virtues as being good in themselves, and not as dispositions to the contemplative life, the moral virtues belong to the active life.

It may also be replied, however, that the active life is a disposition to the contemplative life.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Prudence Pertains to the Active Life?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that prudence does not pertain to the active life.

Objection 1. For just as the contemplative life pertains to the cognitive power, so the active life pertains to the appetitive power. Now prudence belongs not to the appetitive but to the cognitive power. Therefore prudence does not belong to the active life.

Obj. 2. Further, Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.)⁷ that "the active life being occupied with work, sees less," and therefore it is signified by Lia who was bleary-eyed. But prudence requires clear eyes, so that one may judge rightly of what has to be done. Therefore it seems that prudence does not pertain to the active life.

Obj. 3. Further, Prudence stands between the moral and the intellectual virtues. Now just as the moral virtues belong to the active life, as stated in the foregoing Article, so do the intellectual virtues pertain to the contemplative life. Therefore it would seem that prudence pertains neither to the active nor to the contemplative life, but to an intermediate kind of life, of which Augustine make mention.¹

On the contrary, The Philosopher says² that prudence pertains to active happiness, to which the moral virtues belong.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1, Reply 3; Part I-II, Q. XVIII, A. 6), if one thing be directed to another as its end, it is drawn, especially in moral matters, to the species of the thing to which it is directed; for instance "he who commits adultery that he may steal, is a thief rather than an adulterer," according to the Philosopher.³ Now it is evident that the knowledge of prudence is directed to the works of the moral virtues as its end, since it is "right reason about things to be done,"⁴ so that the ends of the moral virtues are the principles of prudence, as the Philosopher says in the same book.⁵ Accordingly, just as it was stated above (A. 1, Reply 3) that the moral virtues in one who directs them to the quiet of contemplation belong to the contemplative life, so the knowledge of prudence, which is of itself directed to the works of the moral virtues, belongs directly to the active life, provided we take prudence in its proper sense as the Philosopher speaks of it.

If however we take it in a more general sense, as comprising any kind of human knowledge, then prudence, as regards a certain part of it, belongs to the contemplative life. In this sense Tully (De Offic. i)⁶ says that "the man who is able most clearly and quickly to grasp the truth and to unfold his reasons, is usually considered to be most prudent and wise."

Reply Obj. 1. Moral works take their species from their end, as stated above (Part I-II, Q. XVIII, AA. 4, 6), and therefore the knowledge pertaining to the contemplative life is that which has its end in the very knowledge of truth; but the knowledge of prudence, through having its end in an act of the appetitive power, belongs to the active life.

Reply Obj. 2. Being occupied with external things makes a man see less in intelligible things, which are separated from sensible objects with which the works of the active life are concerned. Nevertheless the external occupation of the active life enables a man to see more clearly in judging of what is to be done, which belongs to prudence, both on account of experience, and on account of the mind's attention, since "when the mind is attentive it takes on all its force," as Sallust observes (Conjur. Catil.).⁷

Reply Obj. 3. Prudence is said to be intermediate between the intellectual and the moral virtues because it resides in the same subject as the intellectual virtues, but accords wholly with the moral virtues as to matter. But this third kind of life is intermediate between the active and the contemplative life as regards the things about which it is occupied, because it is occupied sometimes with the contemplation of the truth, sometimes with external things.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Teaching Is a Work of the Active or of the Contemplative Life?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that teaching is a work not of the active but of the contemplative life.

Objection 1. For Gregory says (Hom. v in Ezech.)⁸ that "the perfect who have been able to contemplate heavenly goods proclaim them to their brethren, whose souls they inflame with love for their hidden beauty." But this pertains to teaching. Therefore teaching is a work of the contemplative life.

Obj. 2. Further, Act and habit would seem to be brought back to the same kind of life. Now teaching is an act of wisdom, for the Philosopher says that "to be able to teach is an indication of knowledge."⁹ Therefore since wisdom or knowledge pertain to the contemplative life, it would seem that teaching also belongs to the contemplative life.

Obj. 3. Further, Prayer, no less than contemplation, is an act of the contemplative life. Now even the prayer by which one prays for another belongs to the contemplative life. Therefore it would seem that it belongs also to the contemplative life to acquaint another, by teaching him, of the truth we have meditated.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.):¹⁰ "The active life is to give bread to the hungry, to teach the ignorant the words of wisdom."

I answer that, The act of teaching has a twofold object. For teaching is conveyed by speech, and speech is the audible sign of the interior concept. Accordingly one object of teaching is the matter or object of the interior concept; and as to this object teaching belongs sometimes to the active, sometimes to the contemplative life. It belongs to the active life when a man conceives a truth inwardly so as to be directed by it in his outward action; but it belongs to the contemplative life when a man conceives inwardly an intelligible truth in whose consideration and love he delights. Hence Augustine says:¹ "Let them choose for themselves the better part," namely the contemplative life; "let them be busy with the word, long for the sweetness of teaching, occupy themselves with the knowledge that saves," thus stating clearly that teaching belongs to the contemplative life.

The other object of teaching is on the part of the speech heard, and thus the object of teaching is the hearer. As to this object all teaching belongs to the active life to which external actions pertain.

Reply Obj. 1. The authority quoted speaks expressly of doctrine as to its matter, in so far as it is concerned with the consideration and love of truth.

Reply Obj. 2. Habit and act have a common object. Hence this argument clearly considers the matter of the interior concept. For it pertains to the man having wisdom and knowledge to be able to teach in so far as he is able to express his interior concept in words, so as to bring another man to understand the truth.

Reply Obj. 3. He who prays for another does nothing towards the man for whom he prays, but only towards God Who is the intelligible truth; but he who teaches another does something in his regard by external action. Hence the comparison fails.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the Active Life Remains After This Life?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that the active life remains after this life.

Objection 1. For the acts of the moral virtues belong to the active life, as stated above (A. 1). But the moral virtues endure after this life according to Augustine (De Trin. xiv, 9).² Therefore seemingly the active life remains after this life.

Obj. 2. Further, Teaching others belongs to the active life, as stated in the foregoing Article. But in the life to come when we shall be like the angels, teaching will be possible, even as apparently it is in the angels of whom one enlightens, cleanses, and perfects another, which refers to the receiving of knowledge, according to Dionysius (Cal. Hier. vii).³ Therefore it would seem that the active life remains after this life.

Obj. 3. Further, The more lasting a thing is in itself, the more it seems to be able to endure after this life. But the active life seems to be more lasting in itself; for Gregory says (Hom. v in Ezech.)⁴ that "we can remain fixed in the active life, whereas we are in no way able to maintain an attentive mind in the contemplative life." Therefore the active life is much more able than the contemplative to endure after this life.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.):⁵ "The active life ends with this world, but the contemplative life begins here, to be perfected in our heavenly home."

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1), the active life has its end in external actions; and if these are referred to the quiet of contemplation, for that very reason they belong to the contemplative life. But in the future life of the blessed the occupation of external actions will cease, and if there be any external actions at all, these will be referred to contemplation as their end. For, as Augustine says at the end of the City of God,⁶ "there we shall rest and we shall see, we shall see and love, we shall love and praise." And he had said before⁷ that there God "will be seen without end, loved without wearying, praised without tiring: such will be the occupation of all, the common love, the universal activity."

Reply Obj. 1. As stated above (Q. CXXXVI. A. 1, reply 1), the moral virtues will remain not as to those actions which are about the means, but as to the actions which are about the end. Such acts are those that conduce to the quiet of contemplation, which in the words quoted above Augustine denotes by "rest," and this rest excludes not only outward disturbance but also the inward disturbance of the passions.

Reply Obj. 2. The contemplative life, as stated above (Q. CLXXX. A. 4), consists chiefly in the contemplation of God, and as to this, one angel does not teach another, since according to Matt. 18. 10, the little one's angels, who belong to the lower order, always see the face of the Father; and so, in the life to come, no man will teach another of God, but we shall all see Him as He is (I John 3. 2). This is in keeping with the saying of Jeremias (31. 34): They shall teach no more every man his neighbour, . . .

saying: Know the Lord: for all shall know me, from the least of them even to the greatest.

But as regards things pertaining to the dispensation of the mysteries of God, one angel teaches another by cleansing, enlightening, and perfecting him; and thus they have something of the active life so long as the world lasts, from the fact that they are occupied in administering to the creatures below them. This is signified by the fact that Jacob saw angels ascending the ladder (Gen. 28. 12),—which refers to contemplation,—and descending,—which refers to action. Nevertheless, as Gregory remarks (Moral. ii, 3),¹ “they do not wander abroad from the Divine vision in such a way as to be deprived of the joys of inward contemplation.” Hence in them the active life does not differ from the contemplative life as it does in us for whom the works of the active life are a hindrance to contemplation.

Nor is the likeness to the angels promised to us as regards the administering to lower creatures, for this does not belong to us not by reason of our natural order, as it is to the angels, but by reason of our seeing God.

Reply Obj. 3. That the durability of the active life in the present state surpasses the durability of the contemplative life arises not from any property of either life considered in itself, but from our own deficiency, since we are withheld from the heights of contemplation by the weight of the body. Hence Gregory adds (ibid.) that “the mind through its very weakness being repelled from that immense height recoils on itself.”

QUESTION CLXXXII

OF THE ACTIVE LIFE IN COMPARISON WITH THE CONTEMPLATIVE LIFE (In Four Articles)

WE must now consider the active life in comparison with the contemplative life, under which head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Which of them is greater import or excellence? (2) Which of them has the greater merit? (3) Whether the contemplative life is hindered by the active life? (4) Of their order.

ARTICLE 1. Whether the Active Life Is More Excellent Than the Contemplative?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that the active life is more excellent than the contemplative.

Objection 1. For “that which belongs to better men would seem to be worthier and better,” as the Philosopher says.² Now the active life belongs to persons of higher rank, namely prelates, who are placed in a position of honour and power; hence Augustine says³ that “in our actions we must not love honour or power in this life.” Therefore it would seem that the active life is more excellent than the contemplative.

Obj. 2. Further, In all habits and acts, commanding belongs to the more excellent; thus the military art, being the more excellent, commands the art of the bridle-maker. Now it belongs to the active life to direct and command the contemplative, as appears from the words addressed to Moses (Exod. 19. 21), Go down and charge the people, lest they should have a mind to pass the fixed limits to see the Lord. Therefore the active life is more excellent than the contemplative.

Obj. 3. Further, No man should be taken away from a greater thing in order to be occupied with lesser things, for the Apostle says (I Cor. 12. 31): Be zealous for the better gifts. Now some are taken away from the state of the contemplative life to the occupations of the active life, as in the case of those who are transferred to the state of prelacy. Therefore it would seem that the active life is more excellent than the contemplative.

On the contrary, Our Lord said (Luke 10. 42): Mary hath chosen the best part, which shall not be taken away from her. Now Mary is a figure of the contemplative life. Therefore the contemplative life is more excellent than the active.

I answer that, Nothing prevents certain things being more excellent in themselves which nevertheless are surpassed by another in some respect. Accordingly we must reply that the contemplative life absolutely is more excellent than the active; and the Philosopher proves this by eight reasons.⁴ The first is because the contemplative life befits man according to that which is best in him, namely the intellect, and according to its proper objects, namely intelligibles; the active life however is occupied with externals. Hence Rachel, by whom the contemplative life is signified, is interpreted “the vision of the principle,” whereas as Gregory says (Moral. vi, 37)⁵ the active life is signified by Lia who was “blear-eyed.” The second reason is because the contemplative life can be more continuous, although not as regards the highest degree of contemplation, as stated above (Q. CLXXX, A. 8; Q. CLXXXI, A. 4, reply 3), and so Mary, by whom the contemplative life is signified, is described as sitting all the time at the Lord's feet. Thirdly, because the contemplative life is more delightful than the active; hence Augustine says¹ that "Martha was troubled, but Mary feasted." Fourthly, because in the contemplative life man is more self-sufficient, since he needs fewer things for that purpose; therefore it was said (Luke 10. 41): Martha, Martha, thou art careful and art troubled about many things. Fifthly, because the contemplative life is loved more for its own sake, while the active life is directed to something else. Hence it is written (Ps. 26. 4): One thing I have asked of the Lord, this will I seek after, that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, that I may see the delight of the Lord. Sixthly, because the contemplative life consists in leisure and rest, according to Ps. 45. 11, Be still and see that I am God. Seventhly, because the contemplative life is according to Divine things, while active life is according to human things; hence Augustine says:² "In the beginning was the Word": to Him was Mary hearkening; 'The word was made flesh': Him was Martha serving." Eighthly, because the contemplative life is according to that which is most proper to man, namely his intellect; in the works of the active life however the lower powers also, which are common to us and brutes, have their part; hence (Ps. 35. 8) after the words, Men and beasts thou wilt preserve, O Lord, that which is special to man is added (verse 10): In Thy light we shall see light.

Our Lord adds a ninth reason (Luke 10. 42) when He says: Mary hath chosen the best part, which shall not be taken away from her, which words Augustine expounds thus:³ "Not.—Thou hast chosen badly but,—She has chosen better. Why better? Listen.—Because it shall not be taken away from her. But the burden of necessity shall at length be taken from thee; but the sweetness of truth is eternal."

Yet in a restricted sense and in a particular case one should prefer the active life on account of the needs of the present life. Thus too the Philosopher says:⁴ "It is better to philosophize than to be rich, yet for one who is in need, it is better to be rich."

Reply Obj. 1. Not only the active life concerns prelates, but they should also excel in the contemplative life; hence Gregory says (Pastor. ii, 1):⁵ "A prelate should be foremost in action, more uplifted than others in contemplation."

Reply Obj. 2. The contemplative life consists in a certain liberty of mind. For Gregory says (Hom. iii in Ezech.)⁶ that "the contemplative life obtains a certain freedom of mind, for it thinks not of temporal but of eternal things." And Boethius says (De Consol. v, 2):⁷ "The soul of man must be more free while it continues to gaze on the Divine mind, and less so when it stoops to bodily things." Therefore it is evident that the active life does not directly command the contemplative life, but prescribes certain works of the active life as dispositions to the contemplative life, which it accordingly serves rather than commands. Gregory refers to this when he says (loc. cit. in Ezech.)⁸ that "the active life is bondage, but the contemplative life is freedom."

Reply Obj. 3. Sometimes a man is called away from the contemplative life to the works of the active life on account of some necessity of the present life, yet not so as to be compelled to forsake contemplation altogether. Hence Augustine says:⁹ "The love of truth seeks a holy leisure, the demands of charity undertake an honest toil," the work namely of the active life. "If no one imposes this burden upon us we must devote ourselves to the search for and contemplation of truth, but if it be imposed on us, we must bear it because charity demands it of us. Yet even then we must not altogether forsake the delights of truth, lest we deprive ourselves of its sweetness, and this burden overwhelm us." Hence it is clear that when a person is called from the contemplative to the active life, this is done by way not of taking away but of addition.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the Active Life Is of Greater Merit Than the Contemplative?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that the active life is of greater merit than the contemplative.

Objection 1. For merit implies relation to reward; and reward is due to labour, according to I Cor. 3. 8, Every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour. Now labour is ascribed to the active life, and rest to the contemplative life; for Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.):¹ "Whosoever is converted to God must first of all sweat from labour, that is, he must take Lia, that afterwards he may rest in the embraces of Rachel so as to see the principle." Therefore the active life is of greater merit than the contemplative.

Obj. 2. Further, The contemplative life is a certain beginning of the happiness to come; therefore Augustine commenting on John 21. 22, So I will have him to remain till I come, says (Tract. cxxiv in Joann.):² "This may be expressed more clearly: Let perfect works follow Me conformed to the example of My passion, and let contemplation begun here remain until I come, that it may be perfected when I shall come." And Gregory says (loc. cit. in Ezech.) that "the life of contemplation begins here, so as to be perfected in our heavenly home." Now the life to come will be a state not of meriting but of receiving the reward of our merits. Therefore the contemplative life would seem to have less of the character of merit than the active, but more of the character of reward.

Obj. 3. Further, Gregory says (Hom. xii in Ezech.) that "no sacrifice is more acceptable to God than zeal for souls." Now by the zeal for souls a man turns to the occupations of the active life. Therefore it would seem that the contemplative life is not of greater merit than the active.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Moral. vi):³ "Great are the merits of the active life, but greater still those of the contemplative."

I answer that, As stated above (Part I-II, q. cxiv, A. 4), the root of merit is charity; and, while, as stated above (q. xxv, A. 1), charity consists in the love of God and our neighbour, the love of God is by itself the more meritorious than the love of our neighbour, as stated above (q. xxvii, A. 8). Therefore that which pertains more directly to the love of God is of its very genus more meritorious than that which pertains directly to the love of our neighbour for God's sake. Now the contemplative life pertains directly and immediately to the love of God; for Augustine says⁴ that "the love of truth seeks a holy leisure," namely of the contemplative life, for it is that truth above all which the contemplative life seeks, as stated above (q. clxxx, A. 4; q. clxxxii, A. 4, reply 2). On the other hand, the active life is more directly concerned with the love of our neighbour, because it is busy about much serving (Luke 10. 40). Therefore the contemplative life is generically of greater merit than the active life. This is moreover asserted by Gregory (Hom. iii in Ezech.):⁵ "The contemplative life surpasses in merit the active life, because the latter labours under the stress of present work," by reason of the necessity of assisting our neighbour, "while the former with heartfelt relish has a foretaste of the coming rest," that is the contemplation of God.

Nevertheless it may happen that one man merits more by the works of the active life than another by the works of the contemplative life. For instance through excess of Divine love a man may now and then suffer separation from the sweetness of Divine contemplation for the time being, that God's will may be done and for His glory's sake. Thus the Apostle said (Rom. 9. 3): I wished myself to be an anathema from Christ, for my brethren; which words Chrysostom expounds as follows (De Compunct. i):⁶ "His mind was so steeped in the love of Christ that, although he desired above all to be with Christ, he despised even this, because thus he pleased Christ."

Reply Obj. 1. External labour conduces to the increase of the accidental reward, but the increase of merit with regard to the essential reward consists chiefly in charity, a sign of which is external labour borne for Christ's sake. Yet a much more expressive sign of this is shown when a man, renouncing whatsoever pertains to this life, delights to occupy himself entirely with Divine contemplation.

Reply Obj. 2. In the state of future happiness man has arrived at perfection, and therefore there is no room for advancement by merit; and if there were, the merit would be more efficacious by reason of the greater charity. But in the present life contemplation is not without some imperfection, and can always become more perfect; therefore it does not remove the idea of merit, but causes a yet greater merit on account of the practice of greater Divine charity.

Reply Obj. 3. A sacrifice is rendered to God spiritually when something is offered to Him; and of all man's goods, God specially accepts that of the human soul when it is offered to Him in sacrifice. Now a man ought to offer to God, in the first place, his soul, according to Ecclus. 30. 24, Have pity on thy own soul, pleasing God; in the second place, the souls of others, according to Apoc. 22. 17, He that hear- eth, let him say: Come. And the more closely a man unites his own or another's soul to God, the more acceptable is his sacrifice to God; therefore it is more acceptable to God that one apply one's own soul and the souls of others to contemplation than to action. Consequently the statement that "no sacrifice is more acceptable to God than zeal for souls," does not mean that the merit of the active life is preferable to the merit of the contemplative life, but that it is more meritorious to offer to God one's own soul and the souls of others, than any other external gifts.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the Contemplative Life Is Hindered By the Active Life?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that the contemplative life is hindered by the active life.

Objection 1. For the contemplative life requires a certain stillness of mind, according to Ps. 45. 2, Be still, and see that I am God; but the active life involves restlessness, according to Luke 10. 41, Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things. Therefore the active life hinders the contemplative.

Obj. 2. Further, Clearness of vision is a requisite for the contemplative life. Now active life is a hindrance to clear vision; for Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.)¹ that "Lia is bleary-eyed and fruitful, because the active life, being occupied with works, sees less." Therefore the active life hinders the contemplative.

Obj. 3. Further, One contrary hinders the other. Now the active and the contemplative life are apparently contrary to one another, since the active life is busy about many things, while the contemplative life attends to the contemplation of one; therefore they differ in opposition to one another. Therefore it would seem that the contemplative life is hindered by the active.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Moral. vi, 37):² "Those who wish to hold the fortress of contemplation must first of all train in the camp of action."

I answer that, The active life may be considered from two points of view. First, as regards the attention to and practice of external works; and thus it is evident that the active life hinders the contemplative, in so far as it is impossible for one to be busy with external action and at the same time give oneself to Divine contemplation. Secondly, active life may be considered as quieting and putting in order the internal passions of the soul; and from this point of view the active life is a help to the contemplative, since the latter is hindered by the lack of order of the internal passions. Hence Gregory says (loc. cit.): "Those who wish to hold the fortress of contemplation must first of all train in the camp of action. Thus after careful study they will learn whether they no longer wrong their neighbour, whether they bear with equanimity the wrongs their neighbours do to them, whether their soul is neither overcome with joy in the presence of temporal goods, nor cast down with too great a sorrow when those goods are withdrawn. In this way they will know when they withdraw within themselves, in order to explore spiritual things, whether they no longer carry with them the shadows of the things corporeal or, if these follow them, whether they prudently drive them away." Hence the work of the active life conduces to the contemplative, by quelling the interior passions which give rise to the phantasms by which contemplation is hindered. And this suffices for the Replies to the Objections; for these arguments consider the occupation itself of external actions, and not the effect which is the moderation of the passions.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the Active Life Precedes the Contemplative?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that the active life does not precede the contemplative.

Objection 1. For the contemplative life pertains directly to the love of God, while the active life pertains to the love of our neighbour. Now the love of God precedes the love of our neighbour, since we love our neighbour for God's sake. It seems therefore the contemplative life also precedes the active life.

Obj. 2. Further, Gregory says (Hom. ii in Ezech.):³ "It should be observed that while a well-ordered life proceeds from action to contemplation, sometimes it is useful for the soul to turn from the contemplative to the active life." Therefore the active life is not absolutely prior to the contemplative.

Obj. 3. Further, It would seem that there is not necessarily any order between things that are suitable to different subjects. Now the active and the contemplative life are suitable to different subjects; for Gregory says (Moral. vi, 37):⁴ "Often those who were able to contemplate God so long as they were undisturbed have fallen when pressed with occupation; and

³ PL 76, 954.

⁴ PL 75, 761.

frequently they who might live advantageously occupied with the service of their fellow-creatures are killed by the sword of their inaction."

On the contrary, Gregory says (Hom. iii in Ezech.):¹ "The active life precedes in time the contemplative life, for it is from good works that we tend to contemplation."

I answer that, A thing is said to precede in two ways. First, with regard to its nature; and in this way the contemplative life precedes the active, in so far as it applies itself to things which precede and are better than others. And for this reason it moves and directs the active life. For the higher reason which is assigned to contemplation is compared to the lower reason which is assigned to action, and the husband is compared to his wife, who should be ruled by her husband, as Augustine says (De Trin. xii, 12).²

Secondly, a thing precedes with regard to us, because it comes first in the order of generation. In this way the active precedes the contemplative life, because it disposes one to it, as stated above (A. 3; Q. CLXXXI, A. 1, reply 3); and, in the order of generation, disposition precedes form, although the latter precedes absolutely and according to its nature.

Reply Obj. 1. The contemplative life is directed to the love of God, not of any degree, but to that which is perfect; but the active life is necessary for any degree of the love of our neighbour. Hence Gregory says (loc. cit., in Ezech.): "Without the contemplative life it is possible to enter the heavenly kingdom, provided one omit not the good actions we are able to do; but we cannot enter therein without the active life, if we neglect to do the good we can do."

² PL 42, 1007; cf. also chaps. 3, 7 (PL 42, 999, 1003).

From this it is also evident that the active precedes the contemplative life as that which is common to all precedes, in the order of generation, that which is proper to the perfect.

Reply Obj. 2. Progress from the active to the contemplative life is according to the order of generation; but the return from the contemplative life to the active is according to the order of direction, in so far, that is, as the active life is directed by the contemplative. Even thus habit is acquired by acts, and by the acquired habit one acts yet more perfectly, as stated in the Ethics.³

Reply Obj. 3. He that is prone to yield to his passions on account of his impulse to action is likewise more apt for the active life by reason of his restless spirit. Hence Gregory says (Moral. vi, 37) that "there are some so restless that when they are free from labour they labour all the more, because the more leisure they have for thought, the worse interior turmoil they have to bear." Others, on the contrary, have a mind naturally pure and restful, so that they are apt for contemplation, and if they were to apply themselves wholly to action, this would be detrimental to them. Hence Gregory says (loc. cit., Moral vi) that "some are so slothful of mind that if they chance to have any hard work to do they give way at the very outset." Yet, as he adds further on,⁴ "often . . . love stimulates slothful souls to work, and fear restrains souls that are disturbed in contemplation." Consequently those who are more adapted to the active life can prepare themselves for the contemplative by the practice of the active life; while, none the less, those who are more adapted to the contemplative life can take upon themselves the works of the active life, so as to become yet more apt for contemplation.

TREATISE ON THE STATES OF LIFE

QUESTION CLXXXIII OF MAN'S VARIOUS DUTIES AND STATES IN GENERAL (In Four Articles)

WE must next consider man's various states and duties. We shall consider (1) man's duties and states in general; (2) the state of the perfect in particular (Q. CLXXXIV).

Under the first head there are four points of inquiry: (1) What constitutes a state among men? (2) Whether among men there should be various states and duties? (3) Of the diversity of duties. (4) Of the diversity of states.

ARTICLE 1. Whether the Notion of a State Denotes a Condition of Freedom or Servitude?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that the notion of a state does not denote a condition of freedom or servitude.

Objection 1. For state (status) takes its name from standing (stando). Now a person is said to stand on account of his being upright, and so it is said (Ezech. 2. 1), Son of man, stand (sta) upon thy feet; and Gregory says (Moral. vii):¹ "To fall by speaking harmful words is to forfeit entirely the state of rectitude." But a man acquires spiritual uprightness by submitting his will to God; therefore a gloss on Ps. 32. 1, Praise becometh the upright, says:² "The upright are those who direct their heart according to God's will." Therefore it would seem that obedience to the Divine commandments suffices alone for the notion of a state.

Obj. 2. Further, The word state seems to denote immobility, according to 1 Cor. 15. 58, Be ye steadfast (stabiles) and immovable; hence Gregory says (Hom. ix in Ezech):³ "The stone is foursquare, and is stable on all sides, if no disturbance will make it fall." Now it is virtue that "enables us to act with immobility," according to the Ethics.⁴ Therefore it would seem that a state is acquired by every virtuous action.

Obj. 3. Further, The word state seems to indicate height of a kind, because to stand is to be raised upwards. Now one man is made higher than another by various duties; and in like manner men are raised upwards in various ways by various grades and orders. Therefore the mere difference of grades, orders, or duties suffices for a difference of states.

On the contrary, It is thus laid down in the Decretals (Part II, Q. VI, cap. 40):⁵ "Whenever anyone intervenes in a cause where life or state is at stake he must do so not by a proxy, but in his own person"; and state here has reference to freedom or servitude. Therefore it would seem that nothing differentiates a man's state except that which refers to freedom or servitude.

I answer that, State, properly speaking, denotes a kind of position according to which a thing is disposed with a certain immobility in a manner according with its nature. For it is natural to man that his head should be directed upwards, his feet set firmly on the ground, and his other intermediate members disposed in fitting order; and this is not the case if he lie down, sit, or recline, but only when he stands upright. Nor again is he said to stand if he moves, but only when he is still. Hence it is again that even in human acts, a matter is said to have stability (statum) in reference to its own disposition in the point of a certain immobility or rest. Consequently matters which easily change and are extrinsic to them do not constitute a state among men, for instance that a man be rich or poor, of high or low rank, and so forth. Therefore in the civil law (Lib. Causius ff de Senatoribus)⁶ it is said that if a man be removed from the senate, he is deprived of his dignity rather than of his state. But that alone seems to pertain to a man's state, which regards an obligation binding his person, in so far, that is, as a man is his own master or subject to another, not indeed from any slight or unstable cause, but from one that is firmly established; and this is something pertaining to the nature of freedom or servitude. Therefore state properly regards freedom or servitude, whether in spiritual or in civil matters.

⁴ Aristotle, II, 4 (1105^a32).

⁶ Digest., Bk. 1, IX, 3 (KR 1, 40^a).

Reply Obj. 1. Uprightness as such does not pertain to the notion of state, except in so far as it is connatural to man with the addition of a certain being at rest. Hence other animals are said to stand without its being required that they should be upright; nor again are men said to stand, however upright their position be, unless they be still.

Reply Obj. 2. Immobility does not suffice for the notion of state; for even one who sits or lies down is still, and yet he is not said to stand.

Reply Obj. 3. Duty implies relation to act, while grades denote an order of superiority and inferiority. But state requires immobility in that which regards a condition of the person himself.

ARTICLE 2. Whether There Should Be Different Duties or States in the Church?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that there should not be different duties or states in the Church.

Objection 1. For difference is opposed to unity. Now the faithful of Christ are called to unity according to John 21. 22: That they . . . may be one in Us . . . as We also are one. Therefore there should not be a difference of duties and states in the Church.

Obj. 2. Further, Nature does not employ many means where one suffices. But the working of grace is much more orderly than the working of nature. Therefore it would be more fitting for things pertaining to the operations of grace to be administered by the same persons, in such a way that there would not be a distinction of duties and states in the Church.

Obj. 3. Further, The good of the Church seems to consist chiefly in peace, according to Ps. 147. 3, Who hath placed peace in thy borders, and II Cor. 13. 11, Have peace, and the God of peace . . . shall be with you. Now distinction is a hindrance to peace, for peace would seem to result from likeness, according to Ecclus. 13. 19, Every beast loveth its like, while the Philosopher says¹ that a little difference causes dissension in a state. Therefore it would seem that there ought not to be a distinction of states and duties in the Church.

On the contrary, It is written in praise of the Church (Ps. 44. 10) that she is surrounded with variety; and a gloss on these words says² that "the Queen," namely the Church, is bedecked with the teaching of the apostles, the confession of martyrs, the purity of virgins, the sorrows of penitents."

I answer that, The difference of states and duties in the Church regards three things. In the first place it regards the perfection of the Church. For even as in the order of natural things, perfection, which in God is simple and uniform, is not to be found in the created universe except in a multiform and manifold manner, so too, the fulness of grace, which is centred in Christ as head, flows forth to His members in various ways, for the perfecting of the body of the Church. This is the meaning of the Apostle's words (Eph. 4. 11, 12): He gave some apostles, and some prophets and other some evangelists, and other some pastors and doctors for the perfecting of the saints. Secondly, it regards the need of those actions which are necessary in the Church. For a diversity of actions requires a diversity of men appointed to them, in order that all things may be accomplished without delay or confusion; and this is indicated by the Apostle (Rom. 12. 4, 5), As in one body we have many members, but all the members have not the same office, so we being many are one body in Christ. Thirdly, this belongs to the dignity and beauty of the Church, which consist in a certain order; hence it is written (III Kings 10. 4, 5) that when the queen of Saba saw all the wisdom of Solomon . . . and the apartments of his servants, and the order of his ministers . . . she had no longer any spirit in her. Hence the Apostle says (II Tim. 2. 20) that in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and silver, but also of wood and of earthenware.

Reply Obj. 1. The distinction of states and duties is not an obstacle to the unity of the Church, for this results from the unity of faith, charity, and mutual service, according to the saying of the Apostle (Eph. 4. 16): From Whom the whole body being compacted, namely by faith, and fitly joined together, namely by charity, by what every joint supplieth, namely by one man serving another.

Reply Obj. 2. Just as nature does not employ many means where one suffices, so neither does it confine itself to one where many are required, according to the saying of the Apostle (I Cor. 12. 17), If the whole body were the eye, where would be the hearing? Hence there was need in the Church, which is Christ's body, for the members to be differentiated by various duties, states, and grades.

Reply Obj. 3. Just as in the natural body the various members are held together in unity by the power of the quickening spirit, and are dissociated from one another as soon as that spirit departs, so too in the Church's body the peace of the various members is preserved by the power of the Holy Spirit, Who quickens the body of the Church, as stated in John 6. Hence the Apostle says (Eph. 4. 3): Careful to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. Now a man departs from this unity of spirit when he seeks his own, just as in an earthly kingdom peace ceases when the citizens seek each man his own. Besides, the peace both of mind and of an earthly commonwealth is the better preserved by a distinction of duties and states, since thereby the greater number have a share in public actions. Therefore the Apostle says (I Cor. 12. 24, 25) that God hath tempered us (Vulg.,—the body) together that there might be no schism in the body, but the members might be mutually careful one for another.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Duties Differ According to Their Actions?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that duties do not differ according to their actions.

Objection 1. For there are infinite varieties of human acts both in spiritual things and in temporal. Now there can be no certain distinction among things that are infinite in number. Therefore human duties cannot be differentiated according to a difference of acts.

Obj. 2. Further, The active and the contemplative life differ according to their acts, as stated above (Q. CLXXIX, A. 1). But the distinction of duties seems to be other than the distinction of lives. Therefore duties do not differ according to their acts.

Obj. 3. Further, Even ecclesiastical orders, states, and grades seem to differ according to their acts. If, then, duties differ according to their acts it would seem that duties, grades, and states differ in the same way. Yet this is not true, since they are divided into their respective parts in different ways. Therefore duties do not differ according to their acts.

On the contrary, Isidore says (Etym. vi, 19)¹ that "duty (officium) takes its name from to effect (efficere), as though it were instead of 'efficiam,' by the change of one letter for the sake of the sound." But effecting pertains to action. Therefore duties differ according to their acts.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 2), difference among the members of the Church is directed to three things: perfection, action, and beauty; and according to these three we may distinguish a threefold distinction among the faithful. One, with regard to perfection, and thus we have the difference of states, in reference to which some persons are more perfect than others. Another distinction regards action and this is the distinction of duties; for persons are said to have various duties when they are appointed to various actions. A third distinction regards the order of ecclesiastical beauty; and thus we distinguish various grades according as in the same state or duty one person is above another. Hence according to a variant text (Septuagint) it is written (Ps. 47. 3): In her grades shall God be known.

Reply Obj. 1. The material diversity of human acts is infinite. It is not thus that duties differ, but by their formal diversity which results from diverse species of acts, and in this way human acts are not infinite.

Reply Obj. 2. Life is predicated of a thing absolutely. Therefore diversity of lives results from a diversity of acts which are fitting to man considered in himself. But efficient, from which we have the word office (as stated in the argument, On the contrary), denotes action tending to something else according to the Metaphysics.² Hence offices differ properly in respect of acts that are referred to other persons; thus a teacher is said to have an office, and so is a judge, and so forth. Therefore Isidore says (loc. cit.) that to have an office "is to be officious," that is harmful "to no one, but to be useful to all."

Reply Obj. 3. Differences of state, offices and grades are taken from different things, as stated above. Yet these three things may concur in the same subject; thus when a person is appointed to a higher action, he attains thereby both office and grade and at the same time a certain state of perfection, on account of the sublimity of the act, as in the case of a bishop. The ecclesiastical orders are particularly distinct according to various offices. For Isidore says (Etym. vi, 19):³ "There are various kinds of offices; but the foremost is that which relates to sacred and Divine things."

ARTICLE 4. Whether the Difference of States Applies to Those Who Are Beginning, Progressing, or Perfect?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that the difference of states does not apply to those who are beginning, progressing, or perfect.

Objection 1. For different things have diverse species and differences. Now this difference of beginning, progress, and perfection is applied to the degrees of charity, as stated above (Q. xxiv, A. 9), where we were treating of charity. Therefore it would seem that the differences of states should not be assigned in this manner.

Obj. 2. Further, As stated above (A. 1) state regards a condition of servitude or freedom, which apparently has no connection with the above mentioned difference of beginning, progress, and perfection. Therefore it is unfitting to divide state in this way.

Obj. 3. Further, The distinction of beginning, progress, and perfection seems to refer to more and less, and this seems to imply the notion of grades. But the distinction of grades differs from that of states, as we have said above (A. 3). Therefore state is unfittingly divided according to beginning, progress, and perfection.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Moral. xxiv, 11).¹ "There are three states of the converted, the beginning, the middle, and the perfection"; and (Hom. iii in Ezech.):² "Other is the beginning of virtue, other its progress, and other still its perfection."

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1) state regards freedom or servitude. Now in spiritual things there is a twofold servitude and a twofold freedom; for there is the servitude of sin and the servitude of justice. And there is likewise a twofold freedom: from sin, and from justice, as appears from the words of the Apostle (Rom. 6. 20, 22), When you were the servants of sin, you were free men to justice; . . . but now being made free from sin, you are . . . become servants to God.

Now the servitude of sin or justice consists in being inclined to evil by a habit of sin, or inclined to good by a habit of justice. And in like manner freedom from sin is not to be overcome by the inclination to sin, and freedom from justice is not to be held back from evil for the love of justice. Nevertheless, since man, by his natural reason, is inclined to justice, while sin is contrary to natural reason, it follows that freedom from sin is true freedom which is united to the servitude of justice, since they both incline man to that which is fitting to him. In like manner true servitude is the servitude of sin, which is connected with freedom from justice, because man is thereby hindered from attaining that which is proper to him. That man becomes the servant of justice or sin results from man's efforts, as the Apostle declares (ibid., verse 16): To whom you yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants you are whom you obey, whether it be of sin unto death, or of obedience unto justice. Now in every human effort we can distinguish a beginning, a middle, and a term. And consequently the state of spiritual servitude and freedom is differentiated according to these things, namely the beginning,—to which pertains the state of beginners,—the middle, to which pertains the state of the proficient,—and the term, to which belongs the state of the perfect.

Reply Obj. 1. Freedom from sin results from charity which is poured forth in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, Who is given to us (Rom. 5. 5). Hence it is written (II Cor. 3. 17): Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. Therefore the same division applies to charity as to the state of those who enjoy spiritual freedom.

Reply Obj. 2. Men are said to be beginners, proficient, and perfect (so far as these terms indicate different states), not in relation to any occupation whatever, but in relation to such occupations as pertain to spiritual freedom or servitude, as stated above in this Article and A. 1.

Reply Obj. 3. As already observed (A. 3, reply 3), nothing hinders grade and state from concurring in the same subject. For even in earthly affairs those who are free not only belong to a different state from those who are slaves, but are also of a higher grade.

QUESTION CLXXXIV

OF THINGS PERTAINING TO THE STATE

OF PERFECTION IN GENERAL

(In Eight Articles)

WE must now consider those things that pertain to the state of perfection to which the other states are ordered. For the consideration of offices in relation to other acts belongs to the legislator; and in relation to the sacred ministry, it comes under the consideration of Orders, of which we shall treat in the Third Part (Suppl., Q. xxxiv). Concerning the state of the perfect, a threefold consideration presents itself: (1) The state of perfection in general; (2) things relating to the perfection of bishops (Q. clxxxv); (3) things relating to the perfection of religious (Q. clxxxvi).

Under the first head there are eight points of inquiry: (1) Whether perfection bears any relation to charity? (2) Whether one can be perfect in this life? (3) Whether the perfection of this life consists chiefly in observing the counsels or in observing the commandments? (4) Whether whoever is perfect is in the state of perfection? (5) Whether especially prelates and religious are in the state of perfection? (6) Whether all prelates are in the state of perfection? (7) Which is the more perfect, the episcopal or the religious state? (8) The comparison between religious and parish priests and archdeacons.

ARTICLE 1. Whether the Perfection of the Christian Life Consists Especially in Charity?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that the perfection of the Christian life does not consist especially in charity.

Objection 1. For the Apostle says (I Cor. 14. 20): In malice be children, but in sense be perfect. But charity regards not the senses but the affections. Therefore it would seem that the perfection to the Christian life does not chiefly consist in charity.

Obj. 2. Further, It is written (Eph. 6. 13): Take unto you the armour of God, that you may be able to resist in the evil day, and to stand in all things perfect; and the text continues (verses 14, 16) speaking of the armour of God: Stand therefore having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breastplate of justice . . . in all things taking the shield of faith. Therefore the perfection of the Christian life consists not only in charity, but also in other virtues.

Obj. 3. Further, Virtues, like other habits, are specified by their acts. Now it is written (James 1. 4) that patience hath a perfect work. Therefore it seems that the state of perfection consists more specially in patience.

On the contrary, It is written (Col. 3. 14): Above all things have charity, which is the bond of perfection, because it binds, as it were, all the other virtues together in perfect unity.

I answer that, A thing is said to be perfect in so far as it attains its proper end, which is its ultimate perfection. Now it is charity that unites us to God, Who is the last end of the human mind, since he that abideth in charity abideth in God, and God in him (I John 4. 16). Therefore the perfection of the Christian life consists especially in charity.

Reply Obj. 1. The perfection of the human senses would seem to consist chiefly in their concurring together in the unity of truth, according to I Cor. 1. 10. That you be perfect in the same mind (sensu), and in the same judgment. Now this is effected by charity which operates consent in us men. Therefore even the perfection of the senses has its roots in the perfection of charity.

Reply Obj. 2. A man may be said to be perfect in two ways. First, absolutely. And this perfection regards that which belongs to a thing's nature; for instance an animal may be said to be perfect when it lacks nothing in the disposition of its members and in such things as are necessary for an animal's life. Secondly, a thing is said to be perfect relatively. And this perfection regards something connected with the thing externally, such as whiteness or blackness or something of the kind. Now the Christian life consists especially in charity, by which the soul is united to God; and so it is written (I John 3. 14): He that loveth not abideth in death. Hence the perfection of the Christian life consists absolutely in charity, but in the other virtues relatively. And since that which is absolutely, is paramount and greatest in comparison with other things, it follows that the perfection of charity is paramount in relation to the perfection that regards the other virtues.

Reply Obj. 3. Patience is stated to have a perfect work in relation to charity, in so far as it is an effect of the abundance of charity that a man bears hardships patiently, according to Rom. 8. 35, Who . . . shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation? or distress? etc.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Any One Can Be Perfect in This Life?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that none can be perfect in this life.

Objection 1. For the Apostle says (I Cor. 13. 10): When that which is perfect is come, that which is in part shall be done away. Now in this life that which is in part is not done away; for in this life faith and hope, which are in part, remain. Therefore none can be perfect in this life.

Obj. 2. Further, The perfect is that which lacks nothing, according to the Physics.¹ Now there is no one in this life who lacks nothing; for it is written (James 3. 2): In many things we all offend; and (Ps. 138. 16): Thy eyes did see my imperfect being. Therefore none is perfect in this life.

¹ Aristotle, III, 6 (207^a8).

Obj. 3. Further, The perfection of the Christian life, as stated in the foregoing Article, relates to charity, which comprises the love of God and of our neighbour. Now, neither as to the love of God can one have perfect charity in this life, since according to Gregory (Hom. ii in Ezech.)¹ "the furnace of love which begins to burn here will burn more fiercely when we see Him Whom we love"; nor as to the love of our neighbour, since in this life we cannot love all our neighbours actually, even though we love them habitually; and habitual love is imperfect. Therefore it seems that no one can be perfect in this life.

On the contrary, The Divine law does not prescribe the impossible. Yet it prescribes perfection according to Matt. 5. 48, Be you . . . perfect, as also your heavenly Father is perfect. Therefore it seems that one can be perfect in this life.

I answer that, As stated in the foregoing Article, the perfection of the Christian life consists in charity. Now perfection implies a certain universality, because according to the Physics,² "the perfect is that which lacks nothing." Hence we may consider a threefold perfection. One is absolute, and answers to a totality not only on the part of the lover, but also on the part of the thing loved, so that God be loved as much as He is lovable. Such perfection as this is not possible to any creature, but belongs to God alone, in Whom good is wholly and essentially.

Another perfection answers to an absolute totality on the part of the lover, so that the affective power always actually tends to God as much as it possibly can; and such perfection as this is not possible so long as we are on the way, but we shall have it in heaven.

The third perfection answers to a totality neither on the part of the thing loved, nor on the part of the lover as regards his always actually tending to God, but on the part of the lover as regards the removal of obstacles to the movement of love towards God, in which sense Augustine says³ that "carnal desire is the bane of charity; to have no carnal desires is the perfection of charity." Such perfection as this can be had in this life, and in two ways. First, by the removal from man's affections of all that is contrary to charity, such as mortal sin; and there can be no charity apart from this perfection. Hence it is necessary for salvation. Secondly, by the removal from man's affections not only of whatever is contrary to charity, but also of whatever hinders the mind's affections from tending wholly to God. Charity is possible apart from this perfection, for instance in those who are beginners and in those who are making progress.

Reply Obj. 1. The Apostle is speaking there of heavenly perfection which is not possible to those who are on the way.

Reply Obj. 2. Those who are perfect in this life are said to "offend in many things" with regard to venial sins, which result from the weakness of the present life; and in this respect they have an "imperfect being" in comparison with the perfection of heaven.

Reply Obj. 3. As the state of the present life does not allow of a man always tending actually to God, so neither does it allow of his always tending actually to each individual neighbour; but it suffices for him to tend to all in common and collectively, and to each individual habitually and according to the preparedness of his mind.

Now in the love of our neighbour, as in the love of God, we may observe a twofold perfection: one without which charity is impossible, and consisting in one's having in one's affections nothing that is contrary to the love of one's neighbour; and another without which it is possible to have charity. The latter perfection may be considered in three ways. First, as to the extent of love, through a man loving not only his friends and acquaintances but also strangers and even his enemies, for as Augustine says (Enchir. lxxiii)⁴ this is a mark of the perfect children of God. Secondly, as to the intensity of love, which is shown by the things which man despises for his neighbour's sake, through his despising not only external goods for the sake of his neighbour, but also bodily hardships and even death, according to John. 15. 13, Greater love than this no man hath, that a man lay down his life for his friends. Thirdly, as to the effect of love, so that a man will pour out not only temporal but also spiritual goods and even himself, for his neighbour's sake, according to the words of the Apostle (II Cor. 12. 15), But I most gladly will spend and be spent myself for your souls.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Perfection Consists in the Observance of the Commandments or of the Counsels?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that perfection consists in the observance not of the commandments but of the counsels.

Objection 1. For our Lord said (Matt. 19. 21): If thou wilt be perfect, go sell all (Vulg.,—what) thou hast, and give to the poor . . . and come, follow Me. Now this is a counsel. Therefore perfection regards the counsels and not the precepts.

Obj. 2. Further, All are bound to the observance of the commandments, since this is necessary for salvation. Therefore, if the perfection of the Christian life consists in observing the commandments, it follows that perfection is necessary for salvation, and that all are bound to it. And this is evidently false.

Obj. 3. Further, The perfection of the Christian life is gauged according to charity, as stated above (A. 1). Now the perfection of charity, seemingly, does not consist in the observance of the commandments, since the perfection of charity is preceded both by its increase and by its beginning, as Augustine says on the canonical epistles of St. John (Tract. ix.)¹ But the beginning of charity cannot precede the observance of the commandments, since according to John 14. 23, If any one love Me, he will keep My word. Therefore the perfection of life regards not the commandments but the counsels.

On the contrary, It is written (Deut. 6. 5): Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart, and (Lev. 19. 18): Thou shalt love thy neighbour (Vulg.,—friend) as thyself; and these are the commandments of which our Lord said (Matt. 22. 40): On these two commandments dependeth the whole law and the prophets. Now the perfection of charity, in respect of which the Christian life is said to be perfect, consists in our loving God with our whole heart, and our neighbour as ourselves. Therefore it would seem that perfection consists in the observance of the precepts.

I answer that, Perfection is said to consist in a thing in two ways: in one way, in itself and essentially; in another, secondarily and accidentally. In itself and essentially the perfection of the Christian life consists in charity, principally as to the love of God, secondarily as to the love of our neighbour, both of which are the matter of the chief commandments of the Divine law, as stated above (On the contrary; Part I-II, Q. C, A. 3, Reply 1; A. 2). Now the love of God and of our neighbour is not commanded according to a measure, so that what is in excess of the measure be a matter of counsel. This is evident from the very form of the commandment, pointing, as it does, to perfection,—for instance in the words, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart, since "the whole is the same as the perfect," according to the Philosopher,²—and in the words, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, since every one loves himself most. The reason of this is that the end of the commandment is charity according to the Apostle (I Tim. 1. 5). And the end is not subject to a measure, but only such things as are directed to the end, as the Philosopher observes;³ thus a physician does not measure the amount of his healing, but how much medicine or diet he shall employ for the purpose of healing. Consequently it is evident that perfection consists essentially in the observance of the commandments; hence Augustine says (De Perf. Justit. viii.):⁴ "Why then should not this perfection be prescribed to man, although no man has it in this life?"

Secondarily and instrumentally, however, perfection consists in the observance of the counsels, all of which, like the commandments, are directed to charity; yet not in the same way. For the commandments, other than the precepts of charity, are directed to the removal of things contrary to charity, with which, namely, charity is incompatible. But the counsels are directed to the removal of things that hinder the act of charity, and yet are not contrary to charity, such as marriage, the occupation of worldly business, and so forth. Hence Augustine says (Enchir. cxxi.):⁵ "Whatever things God commands, for instance, 'Thou shalt not commit adultery,' and whatever are not commanded, yet suggested by a special counsel, for instance, 'It is good for a man not to touch a woman,' are then done rightly when they are referred to the love of God, and of our neighbour for God's sake, both in this world and in the world to come." Hence it is that in the Conferences of the Fathers (Coll. i, cap. vii.)⁶ the abbot Moses says: "Fasting, watchings, meditating on the Scriptures, penury and loss of all one's wealth, these are not perfection but means to perfection, since not in them does the school of perfection find its end, but through them it achieves its end," and he had already said that "we endeavour to ascend by these steps to the perfection of charity."

Reply Obj. 1. In this saying of our Lord something is indicated as being the way to perfection by the words, Go, sell all thou hast, and give to the poor; and something else is added in which consists perfection, when He said, And follow Me. Hence Jerome in his commentary on Matt. 19. 27, Behold we have left all things, says¹ that "since it is not enough merely to leave, Peter added that which is perfect: 'And have followed Thee'"; and Ambrose, commenting on Luke 5. 27, Follow Me, says:² "He commands him to follow, not with steps of the body, but with devotion of the soul," which is the effect of charity. Therefore it is evident from the very way of speaking that the counsels are means of attaining to perfection, since it is thus expressed: If thou wilt be perfect, go, sell, etc., as though He said: "By so doing thou shalt accomplish this end."

Reply Obj. 2. As Augustine says (De Perf. Justit. viii)³ the perfection of charity is prescribed to man in this life because "one runs not right unless one knows whither to run. And how shall we know this if no commandment declares it to us?" And since that which is a matter of precept can be fulfilled variously, one does not break a commandment through not fulfilling it in the best way, but it is enough to fulfil it in any way whatever. Now the perfection of Divine love is a matter of precept for all without exception, so that even the perfection of heaven is not excepted from this precept, as Augustine says (loc. cit.)⁴ and one escapes transgressing the precept, in whatever measure one attains to the perfection of Divine love. The lowest degree of Divine love is to love nothing more than God, or contrary to God, or equally with God, and whoever fails from this degree of perfection in no way fulfils the precept. There is another degree of the Divine love, which cannot be fulfilled so long as we are on the way, as stated in the foregoing Article, and it is evident that to fail from this is not to be a transgressor of the precept; and in like manner one does not transgress the precept, if one does not attain to the intermediate degrees of perfection, provided one attain to the lowest.

Reply Obj. 3. Just as man has a certain perfection of his nature as soon as he is born, which perfection belongs to the very essence of his species, while there is another perfection which he acquires by growth, so again there is a perfection of charity which belongs to the very species of charity, namely that man love God above all things, and love nothing contrary to God; while there is another perfection of charity even in this life, to which a man attains by a kind of spiritual growth, for instance when a man refrains even from lawful things, in order more freely to give himself to the service of God.

ARTICLE 4. Whether Whoever Is Perfect Is in the State of Perfection?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that whoever is perfect is in the state of perfection.

Objection 1. For, as stated in the foregoing Article, (reply 3), just as bodily perfection is reached by bodily growth, so spiritual perfection is acquired by spiritual growth. Now after bodily growth one is said to have reached the state of perfect age. Therefore it seems also that after spiritual growth, when one has already reached spiritual perfection, one is in the state of perfection.

Obj. 2. Further, According to the Physics,⁵ movement from one contrary to another has the same character as movement from less to more. Now when a man is changed from sin to grace he is said to change his state, in so far as the state of sin differs from the state of grace. Therefore it would seem that in the same manner, when one progresses from a lesser to a greater grace so as to reach the perfect degree, one is in the state of perfection.

Obj. 3. Further, A man acquires a state by being freed from servitude. But one is freed from the servitude of sin by charity, because charity covereth all sins (Prov. 10. 12). Now one is said to be perfect on account of charity, as stated above (A 1). Therefore, it seems that whoever has perfection, for this very reason has the state of perfection.

On the contrary, Some are in the state of perfection who are wholly lacking in charity and grace, for instance wicked bishops or religious. Therefore it would seem that on the other hand some have the perfection of life who nevertheless have not the state of perfection.

I answer that, As stated above (Q. CLXXXIII, A. 1), state properly regards a condition of freedom or servitude. Now spiritual freedom or servitude may be considered in man in two ways: first, with respect to his internal actions; secondly, with respect to his external actions. And since according to I Kings 16. 7, man seeth those things that appear, but the Lord beholdeth the heart, it follows that with regard to man's internal disposition we consider his spiritual state in relation to the Divine judgment, while with regard to his external actions we consider man's spiritual state in relation to the Church.

³ PL 44, 302.

⁴ PL 44, 301.

⁵ Aristotle, V, 2 (226^b1).

It is in this latter sense that we are now speaking of states, namely in so far as the Church derives a certain beauty from the variety of states.

Now it must be observed that so far as men are concerned, in order that any one attain to a state of freedom or servitude there is required first of all an obligation or a release. For the mere fact of serving someone does not make a man a slave, since even the free serve, according to Gal. 5. 13, By charity of the spirit serve one another; nor again does the mere fact of ceasing to serve make a man free, as in the case of a runaway slave. But properly speaking a man is a slave if he be bound to serve, and a man is free if he be released from service. Secondly, it is required that the above obligation be imposed with a certain solemnity, even as a certain solemnity is observed in other matters which among men obtain a settlement in perpetuity. Accordingly, properly speaking, one is said to be in the state of perfection not through having the act of perfect love, but through binding himself in perpetuity and with a certain solemnity to those things that pertain to perfection.

Moreover it happens that some persons bind themselves to that which they do not keep, and some fulfil that to which they have not bound themselves, as in the case of the two sons (Matt. 21. 28, 30), one of whom when his father said: Work in my vineyard, answered: I will not, and afterwards . . . he went, while the other answering said: I go . . . and he went not. Therefore nothing hinders some from being perfect without being in the state of perfection, and some in the state of perfection without being perfect.

Reply Obj. 1. By bodily growth a man progresses in things pertaining to nature, and therefore he attains to the state of nature; especially since what is according to nature is, in a way, unchangeable, in so far as nature is determined to one thing. In like manner by inward spiritual growth a man reaches the state of perfection in relation to the Divine judgment. But as regards the distinctions of ecclesiastical states, a man does not reach the state of perfection except by growth in respect of external actions.

Reply Obj. 2. This argument also regards the interior state. Yet when a man passes from sin to grace, he passes from servitude to freedom; and this does not result from a mere progress in grace, except when a man binds himself to things pertaining to grace.

Reply Obj. 3. Again this argument considers the interior state. Nevertheless, although charity causes the change of condition from spiritual servitude to spiritual freedom, an increase of charity has not the same effect.

ARTICLE 5. Whether Religious and Prelates Are in the State of Perfection?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It seems that prelates and religious are not in the state of perfection.

Objection 1. For the state of perfection differs from the state of the beginners and the proficient. Now no class of men is specially assigned to the state of the proficient or of the beginners. Therefore it would seem that neither should any class of men be assigned to the state of perfection.

Obj. 2. Further, The outward state should answer to the inward, for otherwise one is guilty of lying, "which consists not only in false words, but also in deceitful deeds," according to Ambrose in one of his sermons (xxx. de Tempore).¹ Now there are many prelates and religious who have not the inward perfection of charity. Therefore, if all religious and prelates are in the state of perfection, it would follow that all of them that are not perfect are in mortal sin, as deceivers and liars.

Obj. 3. Further, As stated above (A. 1), perfection is measured according to charity. Now the most perfect charity would seem to be in the martyrs, according to John. 15. 13, Greater love than this no man hath, that a man lay down his life for his friends; and a gloss on Heb. 12. 4, For you have not yet resisted unto blood, says:² "In this life no love is more perfect than that to which the holy martyrs attained, who strove against sin even unto blood." Therefore it would seem that the state of perfection should be ascribed to the martyrs rather than to religious and bishops.

On the contrary, Dionysius (Eccl. Hier. v)³ ascribes perfection to bishops as being perfectors, and (ibid. vi)⁴ to religious (whom he calls monks or θεράπευται, i.e. servants of God) as being perfected.

I answer that, As stated in the foregoing Article, there is required for the state of perfection a perpetual obligation to things pertaining to perfection, together with a certain solemnity. Now both these conditions apply to religious and bishops. For religious bind themselves by vow to refrain from worldly affairs, which they might lawfully use, in order more freely to give themselves to God, in which consists the perfection of the present life. Hence Dionysius says (Eccl. Hier. vi.),¹ speaking of religious: "Some call them θεράπευται, i.e. servants of God, on account of their pure service and bondage, others call them monks on account of the indivisible and single-minded life which unites them in a Godlike union and a perfection beloved of God, through their envelopment in, that is, contemplation of, indivisible things." Moreover, the obligation in both cases is undertaken with a certain solemnity of profession and consecration, and therefore Dionysius adds (ibid.): "Hence the holy legislation in bestowing perfect grace on them accords them a hallowing invocation."

In like manner bishops bind themselves to things pertaining to perfection when they take up the pastoral duty, to which it pertains that a shepherd lay down his life for his sheep, according to John 10. 15. Therefore the Apostle says (I Tim. 6. 12): Thou . . . hast confessed a good confession before many witnesses, that is to say, "when he was ordained," as a gloss says on this passage.² Again, a certain solemnity of consecration is employed together with this profession, according to II Tim. 1. 6: Stir up the grace of God which is in thee by the imposition of my hands, which the gloss ascribes to the grace of the episcopate.³ And Dionysius says (Eccl. Hier. v.)⁴ that "when the high priest," that is, the bishop, "is ordained, he receives on his head the most holy imposition of the sacred oracles, whereby it is signified that he is a participator in the whole and entire hierarchical power, and that not only is he the enlightener of all (which pertains to his holy discourses and actions), but that he also confers this on others."

Reply Obj. 1. Beginning and increase are sought not for their own sake, but for the sake of perfection; hence it is only to the state of perfection that some are admitted under certain obligations and with solemnity.

Reply Obj. 2. Those who enter the state of perfection do not profess to be perfect, but to tend to perfection. Hence the Apostle says (Phil. 3. 12): Not as though I had already attained, or were already perfect; but I follow after, if I may by any means apprehend: and afterwards (verse 15): Let us therefore as many as are perfect, be thus minded. Hence a man who takes up the state of perfection is not guilty of lying or deceit through not being perfect, but through withdrawing his mind from the intention of reaching perfection.

Reply Obj. 3. Martyrdom represents the most perfect act of charity. But an act of perfection is not enough to establish a state of perfection, as we have said (A. 4).

ARTICLE 6. Whether All Ecclesiastical Prelates Are in the State of Perfection?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It seems that all ecclesiastical prelates are in the state of perfection.

Objection 1. For Jerome commenting on Tit. 1. 5, Ordain . . . in every city, etc., says:⁵ "Formerly priest was the same as bishop," and afterwards he adds: "Just as priests know that by the custom of the Church they are subject to the one who is placed over them, so too, bishops should recognize that, by custom rather than by the very ordinance of our Lord, they are above the priests, and are together the rightful governors of Church." Now bishops are in the state of perfection. Therefore those priests also are who have the care of souls.

Obj. 2. Further, Just as bishops together with their consecration receive the care of souls, so also do parish priests and archdeacons, of whom a gloss on Acts 6. 3, Brethren, look ye out . . . seven men of good reputation, says:⁶ "The apostles decided here to appoint throughout the Church seven deacons, who were to be of a higher degree, and as it were the supports of that which is nearest to the altar." Therefore it would seem that these also are in the state of perfection.

Obj. 3. Further, Just as bishops are bound to lay down their life for their sheep, so too are parish priests and archdeacons. But this belongs to the perfection of charity, as stated above (A. 2, reply 3; A. 5). Therefore it would seem that parish priests and archdeacons also are in the state of perfection.

On the contrary, Dionysius says (Eccl. Hier. v.):⁷ The order of pontiffs is consummative and perfecting, that of the priests is illuminative and light-giving, that of the ministers is cleansing and discriminative. Hence it is evident that perfection is ascribed to bishops only.

⁷ Pt. I, sect. 7 (PG 3, 508); cf. sect. 6 (PG 3, 505).

I answer that, In priests and deacons having care of souls two things may be considered, namely their order and their charge. Their order is directed to some act in the Divine offices. Hence it has been stated above (Q. CLXXXIII, A. 3, reply 3) that the distinction of orders is comprised under the distinction of offices. And so by receiving a certain order a man receives the power of exercising certain sacred acts, but he is not bound on this account to things pertaining to perfection, except in so far as in the Western Church the receiving of a sacred order includes the taking of a vow of continence, which is one of the things pertaining to perfection, as we shall state further on (Q. CLXXXVI, A. 4). Therefore it is clear that from the fact that a man receives a sacred order a man is not placed absolutely in the state of perfection, although inward perfection is required in order that one exercise such acts worthily.

In like manner, neither are they placed in the state of perfection on the part of the charge which they take upon themselves. For they are not bound by this very fact under the obligation of a perpetual vow to retain the care of souls, but they can surrender it,—either by entering religion, even without their bishop's permission (Cf. Decret. xix, qu. 2. cap. Dua sunt).¹—or again an archdeacon may with his bishop's permission resign his archdeaconry or parish, and accept a simple prebend without cure, which would be in no way lawful if he were in the state of perfection; for no man putting his hand to the plough and looking back is fit for the kingdom of God (Luke 9. 62). On the other hand bishops, since they are in the state of perfection, cannot abandon the episcopal charge save by the authority of the Sovereign Pontiff (to whom alone it belongs also to dispense from perpetual vows), and this for certain causes, as we shall state further on (Q. CLXXXV, A. 4). Therefore it is manifest that not all prelates are in the state of perfection, but only bishops.

Reply Obj. 1. We may speak of priest and bishop in two ways. First, with regard to the name; and thus formerly bishops and priests were not distinct. For bishops are so called "because they watch over others," as Augustine observes,² while the priests according to the Greek are elders.³ Hence the Apostle employs the term "priests" in reference to both, when he says (I Tim. 5. 17): Let the priests that rule well be esteemed worthy of double honour; and again he uses the term "bishops" in the same way, and so, addressing the priests of the Church of Ephesus he says (Acts 20. 28): Take heed to yourselves and to the whole flock, wherein the Holy Ghost hath placed you bishops, to rule the church of God.

But as regards the thing signified by these terms, there was always a difference between them, even at the time of the apostles. This is clear on the authority of Dionysius (Eccl. Hier. v).⁴ and of a gloss on Luke 10. 1, After these things the Lord appointed, etc., which says:⁵ "Just as the apostles were made bishops, so the seventy-two disciples were made priests of the second order." Subsequently, however, in order to avoid schism, it became necessary to distinguish even the terms, by calling the higher ones bishops and the lower ones priests.

But to assert that priests in no way differ from bishops is reckoned by Augustine among heretical doctrines (De Hæres. liii).⁶ where he says that the Arians maintained that "no distinction should be proclaimed between a priest and a bishop."

Reply Obj. 2. Bishops have the chief care of the sheep of their diocese, while parish priests and archdeacons exercise an inferior ministry under the bishops. Hence a gloss on I Cor. 12. 28, to one, helps, to another, governments, (Vulg.—God hath set some in the church . . . helps, governments, etc.) says: Helps, that is, "assistants to those who are in authority, as Titus was to the Apostle, or as archdeacons to the bishop"; governments, namely "persons of lesser authority, such as priests who have to instruct the people"; and Dionysius says (Eccl. Hier. v)⁷ that "just as we see the whole hierarchy culminating in Jesus, so each office culminates in its respective godlike hierarch or bishop." Also it is said (xvi, Q. 1, cap. Cunctis):⁸ "Priests and deacons must all take care not to do anything without their bishop's permission." Therefore it is evident that they stand in relation to their bishop as wardens or mayors to the king; and for this reason, just as in earthly governments the king alone receives a solemn blessing, while others are appointed by simple commission, so too in the Church the episcopal charge is conferred with the solemnity of consecration, while the archdeacon or parish priest receives his charge by simple appointment, although he is consecrated in receiving orders before having a charge.

Reply Obj. 3. As parish priests and archdeacons have not the chief charge, but a certain ministry as committed to them by the bishop, so the pastoral office does not belong to them in chief, nor are they bound to lay down their life for the sheep, except in so far as they have a share in their charge. Hence we should say that they have an office pertaining to perfection rather than that they attain the state of perfection.

ARTICLE 7. Whether the Religious State Is More Perfect Than That of Prelates?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It seems that the religious state is more perfect than that of prelates.

Objection 1. For our Lord said (Matt. 19. 21): If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell all (Vulg.—what) thou hast, and give to the poor; and religious do this. But bishops are not bound to do so, for it is said (XII, Q. 1, cap. 19):¹ "Bishops, if they wish, may bequeath to their heirs their personal or acquired property, and whatever belongs to them personally." Therefore religious are in a more perfect state than bishops.

Obj. 2. Further, Perfection consists more especially in the love of God than in the love of our neighbour. Now the religious state is directly ordered to the love of God, and therefore it takes "its name from the divine service and bondage," as Dionysius says (Eccl. Hier. vi):² but the bishop's state would seem to be ordered to the love of our neighbour, of whose care he is the warden, and from this he takes his name, as Augustine observes.³ Therefore it would seem that the religious state is more perfect than that of bishops.

Obj. 3. Further, The religious state is directed to the contemplative life, which is more excellent than the active life to which the episcopal state is directed. For Gregory says (Pastor. ii, 1)⁴ that "Isaias wishing to be of profit to his neighbour by means of the active life desired the office of preaching, whereas Jeremias, who was fain to hold fast to the love of his Creator, exclaimed against being sent to preach." Therefore it would seem that the religious state is more perfect than the episcopal state.

On the contrary, It is not lawful for anyone to pass from a more excellent to a less excellent state, for this would be to look back.⁵ Yet a man may pass from the religious to the episcopal state, for it is said (XVIII, Q. 1, cap. Statutum)⁶ that "the holy ordination makes a monk to be a bishop." Therefore the episcopal state is more perfect than the religious.

I answer that, As Augustine says (Gen. ad Lit. xii, 16),⁷ "the agent is ever more excellent than the patient." Now in the genus of perfection according to Dionysius (Eccl. Hier. v, vi),⁸ bishops are in the position of perfecters, while religious are in the position of being perfected, the former of which pertains to action, and the latter to passion. From this it is evident that the state of perfection is more excellent in bishops than in religious.

Reply Obj. 1. Renunciation of one's possessions may be considered in two ways. First, as being actual, and thus it is not essential, but a means, to perfection, as stated above (A. 3). Hence nothing hinders the state of perfection from being without renunciation of one's possessions, and the same applies to other outward practices. Secondly, it may be considered in relation to one's preparedness, in the sense of being prepared to renounce or give away all, and this belongs directly to perfection. Hence Augustine says (De QQ. Evang. ii, 11).⁹ "Our Lord shows that the children of wisdom understand righteousness to consist neither in eating nor in abstaining, but in bearing want patiently." Hence the Apostle says (Phil. 4. 12): I know . . . both to abound and to suffer need. Now bishops especially are bound to despise all things for the honour of God and the spiritual welfare of their flock, when it is necessary for them to do so, either by giving to the poor of their flock, or by suffering with joy the being stripped of their own goods.¹⁰

Reply Obj. 2. That bishops are busy about things pertaining to the love of their neighbour arises out of the abundance of their love of God. Hence our Lord asked Peter first of all whether he loved Him, and afterwards committed the care of His flock to him. And Gregory says (Pastor. i, 5):¹¹ "If the pastoral care is a proof of love, he who refuses to feed God's flock, though having the means to do so, is convicted of not loving the supreme Pastor." And it is a sign of greater love if a man devotes himself to others for his friend's sake, than if he be willing only to serve his friend.

Reply Obj. 3. As Gregory says (Pastor. ii, 1),¹ "a prelate should be foremost in action, and more uplifted than others in contemplation," because it is incumbent on him to contemplate not only for his own sake, but also for the purpose of instructing others. Hence Gregory applies (Hom. v in Ezech.)² the words of Ps. 144. 7, They shall publish the memory . . . of Thy sweetness, to perfect men returning after their contemplation.

ARTICLE 8. Whether Parish Priests and Archdeacons Are More Perfect Than Religious?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It seems that also parish priests and archdeacons are more perfect than religious.

Objection 1. For Chrysostom says in his Dialogue, (De Sacerdot., vi):³ "Take for example a monk, such as Elias, if I may exaggerate somewhat; he is not to be compared with one who, cast among the people and compelled to carry the sins of many, remains firm and strong." A little further on he says: "If I were given the choice, where would I prefer to please, in the priestly office, or in the monastic solitude, without hesitation I should choose the former." Again in the same book he says:⁴ "If you compare the toils of this project, namely of the monastic life, with a well-employed priesthood, you will find them as far distant from one another as a common citizen is from a king." Therefore it would seem that priests who have the care of souls are more perfect than religious.

Obj. 2. Further, Augustine says in a letter to Valerius (Ep. xxi):⁵ "Let thy religious prudence observe that in this life, and especially at these times, there is nothing so difficult, so onerous, so perilous as the office of bishop, priest, or deacon; while in God's sight there is no greater blessing, if one engage in the fight as ordered by our Commander-in-chief." Therefore religious are not more perfect than priests or deacons.

Obj. 3. Further, Augustine says (Ep. lx ad Aurel.):⁶ "It would be most regrettable were we to exalt monks to such a disastrous degree of pride, and deem the clergy deserving of such a grievous insult, as to assert that a bad monk is a good clerk, since sometimes even a good monk makes a bad clerk." And a little before this he says⁷ that "God's servants," that is monks, "must not be allowed to think that they may easily be chosen for something better," namely the clerical state, "if they should thereby become worse," namely by leaving the monastic state. Therefore it would seem that those who are in the clerical state are more perfect than religious.

Obj. 4. Further, It is not lawful to pass from a more perfect to a less perfect state. Yet it is lawful to pass from the monastic state to a priestly office with a charge attached, as appears (xvi, Q. 1, cap. 28)⁸ from a decree of Pope Gelasius, who says:⁹ "If there be a monk, who by the merit of his exemplary life is worthy of the priesthood, and the abbot under whose authority he fights for Christ his King ask that he be made a priest, the bishop shall take him and ordain him in such place as he shall choose fitting." And Jerome says (Ad Rustic. Monach., Ep. cxxv):¹⁰ "In the monastery so live as to deserve to be a clerk." Therefore parish priests and archdeacons are more perfect than religious.

Obj. 5. Further, Bishops are in a more perfect state than religious, as shown in the foregoing Article. But parish priests and archdeacons, through having care of souls, are more like bishops than religious are. Therefore they are more perfect.

Obj. 6. Further, virtue is concerned with the difficult and the good, according to the Ethics.¹¹ Now it is more difficult to lead a good life in the office of parish priest or archdeacon than in the religious state. Therefore parish priests and archdeacons have more perfect virtue than religious.

On the contrary, It is stated (xix, Q. II, cap. Duæ):¹² "If a man while governing the people in his church under the bishop and leading a secular life is inspired by the Holy Ghost to desire to work out his salvation in a monastery or under some canonical rule, since he is led by a private law, there is no reason why he should be constrained by a public law." Now a man is not led by the law of the Holy Ghost, which is here called a private law, except to something more perfect. Therefore it would seem that religious are more perfect than archdeacons or parish priests.

I answer that, When we compare things in the point of supereminence, we look not at that in which they agree, but at that in which they differ. Now in parish priests and archdeacons three things may be considered, their state, their order, and their office. It belongs to their state that they are seculars, to their order that they are priests or deacons, to their office that they have the care of souls committed to them.

Accordingly, if we compare these with one who is a religious by state, a deacon or priest by order, having the care of souls by office, as many monks and canons regular have, this one will excel in the first point, and in the other points he will be equal. But if the latter differ from the former in state and office, but agree in order, such as religious priests and deacons not having the care of souls, it is evident that the latter will be more excellent than the former in state, less excellent in office, and equal in order.

We must therefore consider which is the greater, pre-eminence of state or of office; and here, it seems, we should take note of two things, goodness and difficulty. Accordingly, if we make the comparison with a view to goodness, the religious state surpasses the office of parish priest or archdeacon, because a religious pledges his whole life to the quest of perfection, while the parish priest or archdeacon does not pledge his whole life to the care of souls, as a bishop does, nor does it belong to him, as it does to a bishop, to exercise the care of souls in chief, but only in certain particulars regarding the care of souls committed to his charge, as stated above (A. 6, reply 2). Therefore the comparison of their religious state with their office is like the comparisons of the universal with the particular, and of a holocaust with a sacrifice, which is less than a holocaust according to Gregory (Hom. viii in Ezech.).¹ Hence it is said (XIX, Q. 1, cap. 1):² "Clerics who wish to take the monastic vows through being desirous of a better life must be allowed by their bishops the free entrance into the monastery."

This comparison, however, must be considered as regarding the genus of the deed; for as regards the charity of the doer it happens sometimes that a deed which is of less account in its genus is of greater merit if it be done out of greater charity.

On the other hand, if we consider the difficulty of leading a good life in religion and in the office of one having the care of souls, in this way it is more difficult to lead a good life together with the exercise of the care of souls, on account of outward dangers, although the religious life is more difficult as regards the genus of the deed, by reason of the strictness of religious observance.

If, however, the religious is also without orders, as in the case of religious lay brethren, then it is evident that the pre-eminence of order excels in the point of dignity, since by holy orders a man is appointed to the most august ministry of serving Christ Himself in the sacrament of the altar. For this requires a greater inward holiness than that which is requisite for the religious state, since as Dionysius says (Eccles. Hier. vi)³ "the monastic order must follow the priestly orders, and ascend to Divine things in imitation of them." Hence, other things being equal, a cleric who is in holy orders sins more grievously if he does something contrary to holiness than a religious who is not in holy orders, although a religious who is not in orders is bound to regular observance to which persons in holy orders are not bound.

Reply Obj. 1. We might answer briefly these quotations from Chrysostom by saying that he does not speak of a priest of lesser order who has the care of souls, but of a bishop, who is called a high-priest; and this agrees with the purpose of that book in which he consoles himself and Basil in that they were chosen to be bishops.

We may, however, pass this over and reply that he speaks in view of the difficulty. For he had already said (cap. 6):⁴ "When the pilot is surrounded by the stormy sea and is able to bring the ship safely out of the tempest, then he deserves to be acknowledged by all as a perfect pilot"; and afterwards he concludes, as quoted above in the objection, with regard to the monk, "who is not to be compared with one who, cast among the people, . . . remains firm"; and he gives the reason why, because "both in the calm and in the storm he piloted himself to safety." This proves nothing more than that the state of one who has the cure of souls is fraught with more danger than the monastic state; and to keep oneself innocent in face of a greater peril is proof of greater virtue. On the other hand, it also indicates greatness of virtue if a man avoid dangers by entering religion; hence he does not say that he would prefer to have the priestly office to being in the monastic solitude, but that he would rather please in the former than in the latter, since this is a proof of greater virtue.

Reply Obj. 2. This passage quoted from Augustine also clearly refers to the question of difficulty which proves the greatness of virtue in those who lead a good life, as stated above (reply 1).

Reply Obj. 3. Augustine there compares monks with clerics as regards the pre-eminence of order, not as regards the distance between religious and secular life.

Reply Obj. 4. Those who are taken from the religious state to receive the care of souls, being already in sacred orders, attain to something they had not hitherto, namely the office of the care of souls, yet they do not put aside what they had already. For it is said in the Decretals (xvi, q. 1, cap. 3):¹ "With regard to those monks who after long residence in a monastery attain to the order of clerics, we bid them not to lay aside their former purpose."

On the other hand, parish priests and archdeacons, when they enter religion, resign their charge, in order to attain to the state of perfection. This very fact shows the excellence of the religious life. When religious who are not in orders are admitted to the clerical state and to the sacred orders, they are clearly promoted to something better, as stated in the Fourth Objection; this is indicated by the very way in which Jerome expresses himself: "So live in the monastery as to deserve to be a clerk."

Reply Obj. 5. Parish priests and archdeacons are more like bishops than religious are, in a certain respect, namely as regards the care of souls which they have in a secondary way; but as regards the obligation in perpetuity, religious are more like a bishop, as appears from what we have said above (aa. 5. 6).

Reply Obj. 6. The difficulty that arises from the arduousness of the deed adds to the perfection of virtue; but the difficulty that results from outward obstacles sometimes lessens the perfection of virtue,—for instance when a man does not love virtue so much as to wish to avoid the obstacles to virtue, according to the saying of the Apostle (I Cor. 9. 25), Everyone that striveth for the mastery refraineth himself from all things; and sometimes it is a sign of more perfect virtue,—for instance when a man does not forsake virtue, although he is hindered in the practice of virtue unawares or by some unavoidable cause. In the religious state there is greater difficulty arising from the arduousness of deeds; but for those who in any way at all live in the world, there is greater difficulty resulting from obstacles to virtue, which obstacles the religious has had the foresight to avoid.

QUESTION CLXXXV OF THINGS PERTAINING TO THE EPISCOPAL STATE (In Eight Articles)

WE must now consider things pertaining to the episcopal state. Under this head there are eight points of inquiry: (1) Whether it is lawful to desire the office of a bishop? (2) Whether it is lawful to refuse the office of bishop definitively? (3) Whether the better man should be chosen for the episcopal office? (4) Whether a bishop may pass over to the religious state? (5) Whether he may lawfully abandon his subjects in a bodily manner? (6) Whether he can have anything of his own? (7) Whether he sins mortally by not distributing ecclesiastical goods to the poor? (8) Whether religious who are appointed to the episcopal office are bound to religious observances?

ARTICLE 1. Whether It Is Lawful To Desire the Office of a Bishop?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that it is lawful to desire the office of a bishop.

Objection 1. For the Apostle says (I Tim. 3. 1): He that desires (Vulg., —If a man desire) the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work. Now it is lawful and praiseworthy to desire a good work. Therefore it is even praiseworthy to desire the office of a bishop.

Obj. 2. Further, The episcopal state is more perfect than the religious, as we have said above (Q. CLXXXIV. A. 7). But it is praiseworthy to desire to enter the religious state. Therefore it is also praiseworthy to desire promotion to the episcopal state.

Obj. 3. Further, It is written (Prov. 11. 26): He that hideth up corn shall be cursed among the people; but a blessing upon the head of them that sell. Now a man who is apt, both in manner of life and by knowledge, for the episcopal office, would seem to hide up the spiritual wheat, if he shuns the episcopal state, but by accepting the episcopal office he enters the state of a dispenser of spiritual wheat. Therefore it would seem praiseworthy to desire the office of a bishop, and blameworthy to refuse it.

Obj. 4. Further, The deeds of the saints related in Holy Writ are set before us as an example, according to Rom. 15. 4, What things soever were written, were written for our learning. Now we read (Isa. 6. 8) that Isaias offered himself for the office of preacher, which belongs chiefly to bishops. Therefore it would seem praiseworthy to desire the office of a bishop.

On the contrary, Augustine says:¹ "The higher place, without which the people cannot be ruled, though it be filled becomingly, is unbecomingly desired."

I answer that, Three things may be considered in the episcopal office. One is principal and final, namely the bishop's work, by which the good of our neighbour is intended, according to John 21. 17, Feed My sheep. Another thing is the height of degree, for a bishop is placed above others, according to Matt. 24. 45, A faithful and a wise servant, whom his lord hath appointed over his family. The third is something resulting from these, namely reverence, honour, and a sufficiency of temporalities, according to I Tim. 5. 17, Let the priests that rule well be esteemed worthy of double honour.

Accordingly, to desire the episcopal office on account of these incidental goods is manifestly unlawful, and pertains to covetousness or ambition. Therefore our Lord said against the Pharisees (Matt. 23. 6, 7): They love the first places at feasts, and the first chairs in the synagogues, and salutations in the market-place, and to be called by men, Rabbi. As regards the second, namely the height of degree, it is presumptuous to desire the episcopal office. Hence our Lord reproved His disciples for seeking precedence, by saying to them (Matt. 20. 25): You know that the princes of the gentiles lord it over them. Here Chrysostom says (Hom. lxxv in Matt.)² that in these words He points out that it is heathenish to seek precedence; and thus by comparing them to the gentiles He converted their impetuous soul.

On the other hand, to desire to do good to one's neighbour is in itself praiseworthy, and virtuous. Nevertheless, since considered as an episcopal act it has height of degree attached to it, it would seem that, unless there be manifest and urgent reason for it, it would be presumptuous for any man to desire to be set over others in order to do them good. Thus Gregory says (Pastor. i. 8)³ that "it was praiseworthy to seek the office of a bishop when it was certain to bring one into graver dangers." Therefore it was not easy to find a person to accept this burden, especially seeing that it is through the zeal of charity that one is divinely instigated to do so, according to Gregory, who says (Pastor. i. 7)⁴ that "Isaias being desirous of profiting his neighbour, commendably desired the office of preacher."

Nevertheless anyone may, without presumption, desire to do such works if he should happen to be in that office, or to be worthy of doing them, so that the object of his desire is the good work and not the precedence in dignity. Hence Chrysostom says:⁵ "It is indeed good to desire a good work, but to desire the primacy of honour is vanity. For primacy seeks one that shuns it, and abhors one that desires it."

Reply Obj. 1. As Gregory says (Pastor. i. 8)⁶ "when the Apostle said this he who was set over the people was the first to be dragged to the torments of martyrdom," so that there was nothing to be desired in the episcopal office, save the good work. Therefore Augustine says⁷ that when the Apostle said, "Whoever desireth the office of bishop, desireth a good work," he wished to explain that "the episcopacy signifies work and not honour. For it is a Greek word, ἐπὶ denoting 'over' and σκόπος 'watching.' Therefore if we like we may render ἐπισκοπεῖν by the Latin 'superintendere' (to watch over), that a man may know himself to be no bishop if he loves to precede rather than to profit others." For, as he observed shortly before, "in our actions we should seek, not honour nor power in this life, since all things beneath the sun are vanity, but the work itself which that honour or power enables us to do." Nevertheless, as Gregory says (Pastor., loc. cit.), "the Apostle while praising the desire (namely of the good work) forthwith turns this object of praise into one of fear, when he adds: It behoveth . . . a bishop to be blameless," as though to say: "I praise what you seek, but learn first what it is you seek."

Reply Obj. 2. There is no parity between the religious and the episcopal state, for two reasons. First because perfection of life is a prerequisite of the episcopal state, as appears from our Lord asking Peter if he loved Him more than the others, before committing the pastoral office to him, while perfection is not a prerequisite of the religious state, since the latter is the way to perfection. Hence our Lord did not say (Matt. 19. 21): If thou art perfect, go, sell all (Vulg.,—what) thou hast, but If thou wilt be perfect. The reason for this difference is because, according to Dionysius (Eccles. Hier. v.),¹ perfection pertains actively to the bishop, as the perfecter, but to the monk passively as one who is perfected; and one needs to be perfect in order to bring others to perfection, but not in order to be brought to perfection. Now it is presumptuous to think oneself perfect, but it is not presumptuous to tend to perfection.

Secondly, because he who enters the religious state subjects himself to others for the sake of a spiritual profit, and anyone may lawfully do this. Therefore Augustine says:² "No man is debarred from striving for the knowledge of truth, since this pertains to a praiseworthy ease." On the other hand, he who enters the episcopal state is raised up in order to watch over others, and no man should seek to be raised thus, according to Heb. 5. 4. Neither doth any man take the honour to himself, but he that is called by God; and Chrysostom says:³ "To desire supremacy in the Church is neither just nor useful. For what wise man seeks of his own accord to submit to such servitude and peril, as to have to render an account of the whole Church? None save him who fears not God's judgment, and makes a secular abuse of his ecclesiastical authority, by turning it to secular uses."

Reply Obj. 3. The dispensing of spiritual wheat is not to be carried on in an arbitrary fashion, but chiefly according to the appointment and disposition of God, and in the second place according to the appointment of the higher prelates, in whose person it is said (I Cor. 4. 1): Let a man so account of us as of the ministers of Christ, and the dispensers of the mysteries of God. Therefore a man is not understood to hide spiritual wheat if he avoids governing or correcting others, and is not able to do so, neither in virtue of his office nor of his superior's command; thus alone is he understood to hide it when he neglects to dispense it while under obligation to do so in virtue of his office, or obstinately refuses to accept the office when it is imposed on him. Hence Augustine says:⁴ "The love of truth seeks a holy leisure, the demands of charity undertake an honest labour. If no one imposes this burden upon us, we must devote ourselves to the research and contemplation of truth, but if it be imposed on us, we must bear it because charity demands it of us."

Reply Obj. 4. As Gregory says (Pastor. i, 7),⁵ "Isaías, who wishing to be sent, knew himself to be already cleansed by the live coal taken from the altar, shows us that no one should dare uncleansed to approach the sacred ministry. Since then it is very difficult for anyone to be able to know that he is cleansed, it is safer to decline the office of preacher."

ARTICLE 2. Whether It Is Lawful for a Man To Refuse Absolutely an Appointment to the Episcopate?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that it is lawful to refuse absolutely an appointment to the episcopate.

Objection 1. For as Gregory says (Pastor. i, 7),⁶ "Isaías wishing to be of profit to his neighbour by means of the active life, desired the office of preaching, but Jeremias who was fain to hold fast to the love of his Creator exclaimed against being sent to preach." Now no man sins by being unwilling to forgo better things in order to adhere to things that are not so good. Since then the love of God surpasses the love of our neighbour, and the contemplative life is preferable to the active, as shown above (Q. XXVI, A. 2; CLXXXII, A. 1) it would seem that a man does not sin if he refuse absolutely the episcopal office.

Obj. 2. Further, As Gregory says (Pastor. i, 7),⁷ "it is very difficult for anyone to be able to know that he is cleansed; nor should anyone uncleansed approach the sacred ministry." Therefore if a man perceives that he is not cleansed, however urgently the episcopal office be enjoined him, he ought not to accept it.

Obj. 3. Further, Jerome, in the prologue to his Commentary on Mark, says that "it is related of the Blessed Mark that after receiving the faith he cut off his thumb that he might be excluded from the priesthood."⁸ Likewise some take a vow never to accept a bishopric. Now to place an obstacle to a thing amounts to the same as refusing it altogether. Therefore it would seem that one may, without sin, refuse the episcopal office absolutely.

On the contrary, Augustine says (Ep. xlviii, ad Eudox.):⁹ "If Mother Church requires your service, neither accept with greedy conceit, nor refuse with fawning indolence"; and afterwards he adds: "Nor prefer your ease to the needs of the Church; for if no good men were willing to assist her in her labour, you would seek in vain how we could be born of her."

I answer that, Two things have to be considered in the acceptance of the episcopal office: first, what a man may fittingly desire according to his own will; secondly, what is proper for a man to do according to the will of another. As regards his own will it becomes a man to look chiefly to his own spiritual welfare, but that he look to the spiritual welfare of others becomes a man according to the appointment of another having authority, as stated above (A. 1, reply 3). Hence just as it is a mark of an inordinate will that a man of his own choice incline to be appointed to the government of others, so too it indicates an inordinate will if a man definitively refuse that office of government in direct opposition to the appointment of his superior, and this for two reasons.

First, because this is contrary to the love of our neighbour, for whose good a man should offer himself according as place and time demand; hence Augustine says¹ that "the demands of charity undertake an honest labour." Secondly, because this is contrary to humility, by which a man submits to his superior's commands; hence Gregory says (Pastor, i, 6):² "In God's sight humility is true when it does not obstinately refuse to submit to what is usefully prescribed."

Reply Obj. 1. Although simply and absolutely speaking the contemplative life is more excellent than the active, and the love of God better than the love of our neighbour, yet, on the other hand, the good of the many should be preferred to the good of the individual. Therefore Augustine says in the passage quoted above: "Nor prefer your own ease to the needs of the Church," and all the more since it belongs to the love of God that a man undertake the pastoral care of Christ's sheep. Hence Augustine, commenting on John 21, 17, Feed My sheep, says (Tract. cxxiii in Joann.):³ "Be it the task of love to feed the Lord's flock, even as it was the mark of fear to deny the Shepherd."

Moreover prelates are not transferred to the active life, so as to forsake the contemplative; and so Augustine says⁴ that "if the burden of the pastoral office be imposed, we must not abandon the delights of truth," which are derived from contemplation.

Reply Obj. 2. No one is bound to obey his superior by doing what is unlawful, as appears from what was said above concerning obedience (Q. civ, A. 5). Accordingly it may happen that he who is appointed to the office of prelate perceives something in himself on account of which it is unlawful for him to accept a prelacy. But this obstacle may sometimes be removed by the very person who is appointed to the pastoral cure—for instance, if he have a purpose to sin, he may abandon it—and for this reason he is not excused from being bound to obey definitely the superior who has appointed him.

Sometimes, however, he is unable himself to remove the impediment that makes the pastoral office unlawful to him, yet the prelate who appoints him can do so—for instance, if he be irregular or excommunicate. In such a case he ought to make known his defect to the prelate who has appointed him, and if the latter be willing to remove the impediment, he is bound humbly to obey. Hence when Moses had said (Exod. 4, 10): I beseech thee, Lord, I am not eloquent from yesterday, and the day before, the Lord answered (verse 12): I will be in thy mouth, and I will teach thee what thou shalt speak.

At other times the impediment cannot be removed, neither by the person appointing nor by the one appointed—for instance, if an archbishop be unable to dispense from an irregularity. Therefore a subject, if irregular, would not be bound to obey him by accepting the episcopate or even sacred orders.

Reply Obj. 3. It is not in itself necessary for salvation to accept the episcopal office, but it becomes necessary by reason of the superior's command. Now one may lawfully place an obstacle to things thus necessary for salvation before the command is given; otherwise it would not be lawful to marry a second time, lest one should thus incur an impediment to the episcopate or holy orders. But this would not be lawful in things necessary for salvation. Hence the Blessed Mark did not act against a precept by cutting off his finger, although it is credible that he did this by the instigation of the Holy Ghost, without which it would be unlawful for anyone to lay hands on himself.

If a man take a vow not to accept the bishop's office, and by this intend to bind himself not even to accept it in obedience to his superior: prelate, his vow is unlawful. But if he intend to bind himself so far as it lies with him not to seek the episcopal office, nor to accept it except under urgent necessity, his vow is lawful, because he vows to do what it becomes a man to do.

ARTICLE 3. Whether He That Is Appointed to the Episcopate Ought To Be Better Than Others?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that one who is appointed to the episcopate ought to be better than others.

Objection 1. For our Lord, when about to commit the pastoral office to Peter, asked him if he loved Him more than the others. Now a man is the better through loving God the more. Therefore it would seem that one ought not to be appointed to the episcopal office except he be better than others.

Obj. 2. Further, Pope Symmachus says (cap. Vilissimus, i, qu. 1):¹ "A man is of very little worth who though excelling in dignity, excels not in knowledge and holiness." Now he who excels in knowledge and holiness is better. Therefore a man ought not to be appointed to the episcopate unless he be better than others.

Obj. 3. Further, In every genus the lesser are governed by the greater, as corporeal things are governed by things spiritual, and the lower bodies by the higher, as Augustine says (De Trin. iii, 4).² Now a bishop is appointed to govern others. Therefore he should be better than others.

On the contrary, The Decretal says (cap. Cum dilectus, de electione, etc.)³ that "it suffices to choose a good man, nor is it necessary to choose the better man."

I answer that, In designating a man for the episcopal office, something has to be considered on the part of the person designate, and something on the part of the designator. For on the part of the designator, whether by election or by appointment, it is required that he choose such a one as will dispense the divine mysteries faithfully. These should be dispensed for the good of the Church, according to I Cor. 14. 12, Seek to abound unto the edifying of the Church, and the divine mysteries are not committed to men for their own reward, which they should await in the life to come. Consequently he who has to choose or appoint one for a bishop, is not bound to take one who is best absolutely, that is, according to charity, but one who is best for governing the Church, one namely who is able to instruct, defend, and govern the Church peacefully. Hence Jerome, commenting on Tit. 1. 5, Ordain . . . in every city, says against certain persons that "some seek to erect as pillars of the Church, not those whom they know to be more useful to the Church, but those whom they love more, or those by whose obsequiousness they have been cajoled or undone, or for whom some person in authority has spoken, and, not to say worse than this, have succeeded by means of gifts in being made clerics."⁴

Now this pertains to the receiving of persons, which in such matters is a grave sin. Hence a gloss on James 2. 1, Brethren, have not . . . with respect of persons, says: "If this distinction of sitting and standing be referred to ecclesiastical honours, we must not deem it a slight sin to 'have the faith of the Lord of glory with respect of persons.' For who would suffer a rich man to be chosen for the Church's seat of honour, in despite of a poor man who is better instructed and holier?"⁵

On the part of the person appointed, it is not required that he esteem himself better than others, for this would be proud and presumptuous, but it suffices that he perceive nothing in himself which would make it unlawful for him to take up the office of prelate. Hence although Peter was asked by our Lord if he loved Him more than the others, he did not, in his reply, set himself before the others, but answered simply that he loved Christ.

Reply Obj. 1. Our Lord knew that, by His own bestowal, Peter was in other respects fitted to govern the Church, and therefore He questioned him about his greater love, to show that when we find a man otherwise fitted for the government of the Church, we must look chiefly to his pre-eminence in the love of God.

Reply Obj. 2. This statement refers to the pursuits of the man who is placed in authority. For he should aim at showing himself to be more excellent than others in both knowledge and holiness. Therefore Gregory says (Pastor. ii, 1)⁶ "the occupations of a prelate ought to excel those of the people as much as the shepherd's life excels that of his flock." But he is not to be blamed and looked upon as worthless if he excelled not before being raised to the prelacy.

Reply Obj. 3. According to I Cor. 12. 4 seq., there are diversities of graces, . . . and . . . of ministries . . . and . . . of operations. Hence nothing hinders one from being more fitted for the office of governing who does not excel in the grace of holiness. It is otherwise in the government of the natural order, where that which is higher in the natural order is for that very reason more fitted to dispose of those that are lower.

ARTICLE 4. Whether a Bishop May Lawfully Forsake the Episcopal Charge in Order To Enter Religion?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that a bishop cannot lawfully forsake his episcopal charge in order to enter religion.

Objection 1. For no one can lawfully pass from a more perfect to a less perfect state, since this is to look back, which is condemned by the words of our Lord (Luke 9. 62), No man putting his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God. Now the episcopal state is more perfect than the religious, as shown above (Q. CLXXXIV, A. 7). Therefore just as it is unlawful to return to the world from the religious state, so is it unlawful to pass from the episcopal to the religious state.

Obj. 2. Further, The order of grace is more congruous than the order of nature. Now according to nature a thing is not moved in contrary directions; thus if a stone be naturally moved downwards, it cannot naturally return upwards from below. But according to the order of grace it is lawful to pass from the religious to the episcopal state. Therefore it is not lawful to pass contrariwise from the episcopal to the religious state.

Obj. 3. Further, In the works of grace nothing should be inoperative. Now when once a man is consecrated bishop he retains in perpetuity the spiritual power of giving orders and doing like things that pertain to the episcopal office, and this power would seem to remain inoperative in one who gives up the episcopal charge. Therefore it would seem that a bishop may not forsake the episcopal charge and enter religion.

On the contrary, No man is compelled to do what is in itself unlawful. Now those who seek to resign their episcopal charge are compelled to resign (Extrav. de Renunt., cap. Quidam).¹ Therefore apparently it is not unlawful to give up the episcopal charge.

I answer that, The perfection of the episcopal state consists in this that for love of God a man binds himself to work for the salvation of his neighbour, and therefore he is bound to retain the pastoral charge so long as he is able to procure the spiritual welfare of the subjects entrusted to his care, a matter which he must not neglect—neither for the sake of the quiet of divine contemplation, since the Apostle, on account of the needs of his subjects, suffered patiently to be delayed even from the contemplation of the life to come, according to Philip 1. 22-25, What I shall choose I know not, but I am straitened between two, having a desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ, a thing by far better. But to abide still in the flesh is needful for you. And having this confidence, I know that I shall abide; nor for the sake of avoiding any hardships or of acquiring any gain whatsoever, because as it is written (John 10. 11), the good shepherd giveth his life for his sheep.

At times, however, it happens in several ways that a bishop is hindered from procuring the spiritual welfare of his subjects. Sometimes on account of his own defect, either of conscience (for instance if he be guilty of murder or simony), or of body (for example if he be old or infirm), or of irregularity arising, for instance, from bigamy. Sometimes he is hindered through some defect in his subjects, whom he is unable to profit. Hence Gregory says (Dial. ii, 3):² "The wicked must be borne patiently, when there are some good who can be succoured, but when there is no profit at all for the good, it is sometimes useless to labour for the wicked. Therefore the perfect when they find that they labour in vain are often minded to go elsewhere in order to labour with fruit." Sometimes again this hindrance arises on the part of others, as when scandal results from a certain person being in authority, for the Apostle says (I Cor. 8. 13): If meat scandalize my brother, I will never eat flesh: provided, however the scandal is not caused by the wickedness of persons desirous of subverting the faith or the justice of the Church, because the pastoral charge is not to be laid aside on account of scandal of this kind, according to Matt. 15. 14, Let them alone, those namely who were scandalized at the truth of Christ's teaching, they are blind, and leaders of the blind.

Nevertheless just as a man takes upon himself the charge of authority at the appointment of a higher superior, so too he should be subject to the latter's authority in laying aside the accepted charge for the reasons given above.

Hence Innocent III. says (Extrav. de Renunt., cap. Nisi cum pridem):¹ "Though thou hast wings wherewith thou art anxious to fly away into solitude, they are so tied by the bonds of authority that thou art not free to fly without our permission." For the Pope alone can dispense from the perpetual vow, by which a man binds himself to the care of his subjects, when he took upon himself the episcopal office.

Reply Obj. 1. The perfection of religious and that of bishops are gauged from different standpoints. For it pertains to the perfection of a religious to occupy oneself in working out one's own salvation, while it pertains to the perfection of a bishop to occupy oneself in working for the salvation of others. Hence so long as a man can be useful to the salvation of his neighbour, he would be going back if he wished to pass to the religious state, to busy himself only with his own salvation, since he has bound himself to work not only for his own but also for others' salvation. Therefore Innocent III. says in the Decretal cited above² that "it is more easily allowable for a monk to ascend to the episcopacy than for a bishop to descend to the monastic life." If, however, he be unable to procure the salvation of others it is proper that he should seek his own.

Reply Obj. 2. On account of no obstacle should a man forego the work of his own salvation, which pertains to the religious state. But there may be an obstacle to the procuring of another's salvation, and therefore a monk may be raised to the episcopal state in which he is able also to work out his own salvation. And a bishop, if he be hindered from procuring the salvation of others, may enter the religious life, and may return to his bishopric should the obstacle cease, for instance by the correction of his subjects, cessation of the scandal, healing of his infirmity, removal of his ignorance by sufficient instruction. Again, if he owed his promotion to simony of which he was in ignorance, and resigning his episcopate entered the religious life, he can be reappointed to another bishopric. On the other hand, if a man be deposed from the episcopal office for some sin and confined in a monastery that he may do penance, he cannot be reappointed to a bishopric. Hence it is stated (VII, Q. 1, cap. Hoc nequaquam):³ "The holy synod orders that any man who has been degraded from the episcopal dignity to the monastic life and a place of repentance, should by no means rise again to the episcopate."

Reply Obj. 3. Even in natural things power remains inactive on account of a supervening obstacle, for instance the act of sight ceases through an affliction of the eye. So neither is it unreasonable if, on account of a supervening impediment, the episcopal power remain without the exercise of its act.

ARTICLE 5. Whether It Is Lawful for a Bishop on Account of Bodily Persecution To Abandon the Flock Committed to His Care?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It seems that it is unlawful for a bishop, on account of some temporal persecution, to withdraw his bodily presence from the flock committed to his care.

Objection 1. For our Lord said (John 10. 12) that he is a hireling and no true shepherd, who seeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep and flieth; and Gregory says (Hom. xiv in Ev.)⁴ that "the wolf comes upon the sheep when any man by his injustice and robbery oppresses the faithful and the humble." Therefore if, on account of the persecution of a tyrant, a bishop withdraws his bodily presence from the flock entrusted to his care, it would seem that he is a hireling and not a shepherd.

Obj. 2. Further, It is written (Prov. 6. 1): My son, if thou be surety for thy friend, thou hast engaged fast thy hand to a stranger, and afterwards (verse 3): Run about, make haste, stir up thy friend. Gregory expounds these words and says (Pastor. iii, 4):⁵ "To be surety for a friend, is to come to the aid of the soul in danger. And whoever is put forward as an example to the lives of others, is warned not only to watch but also to support his friend." Now he cannot do this if he withdraw his bodily presence from his flock. Therefore it would seem that a bishop should not on account of persecution withdraw his bodily presence from his flock.

Obj. 3. Further, it belongs to the perfection of the bishop's state that he devote himself to the care of his neighbour. Now it is unlawful for one who has professed the state of perfection to forsake altogether the things that pertain to perfection. Therefore it would seem unlawful for a bishop to withdraw his bodily presence from the execution of his office, except perhaps for the purpose of devoting himself to works of perfection in a monastery.

On the contrary, Our Lord commanded the apostles, whose successors bishops are (Matt. 10. 23): When they shall persecute you in this city, flee into another.

I answer that, In any obligation the chief thing to be considered is the end of the obligation. Now bishops bind themselves to fulfil the pastoral office for the sake of the salvation of their subjects. Consequently when the salvation of his subjects demands the personal presence of the pastor, the pastor should not withdraw his personal presence from his flock, neither for the sake of some temporal advantage nor even on account of some impending danger to his person, since the good shepherd is bound to lay down his life for his sheep.

On the other hand, if the salvation of his subjects can be sufficiently provided for by another person in the absence of the pastor, it is lawful for the pastor to withdraw his bodily presence from his flock, either for the sake of some advantage to the Church, or on account of some danger to his person. Hence Augustine says (Ep. ccxxviii, ad Honorat.):¹ "Christ's servants may flee from one city to another when one of them is specially sought out by persecutors, in order that the Church be not abandoned by others who are not so sought for. When, however, the same danger threatens all, those who stand in need of others must not be abandoned by those whom they need." For "if it is dangerous for the helmsman to leave the ship when the sea is calm, how much more so when it is stormy," as Pope Nicholas I. says² and it is repeated in VII, 1 can. 47.³

Reply Obj. 1. To flee as a hireling is to prefer temporal advantage or one's bodily welfare to the spiritual welfare of one's neighbour. Hence Gregory says (loc. cit.): "A man cannot endanger himself for the sake of his sheep if he uses his authority over them not through love of them but for the sake of earthly gain; and so he fears to stand in the way of danger lest he lose what he loves." But he who, in order to avoid danger, leaves the flock without endangering the flock, does not flee as a hireling.

Reply Obj. 2. If he who is surety for another be unable to fulfil his engagement, it suffices that he fulfil it through another. Hence if a superior is hindered from attending personally to the care of his subjects, he fulfils his obligation if he do so through another.

Reply Obj. 3. When a man is appointed to a bishopric he embraces the state of perfection as regards one kind of perfection; and if he be hindered from its practice he is not bound to another kind of perfection, so as to be obliged to enter the religious state. Yet he is under the obligation of retaining the intention of devoting himself to his neighbour's salvation, should an opportunity offer, and necessity require it of him.

ARTICLE 6. Whether It Is Lawful for a Bishop To Have Property of His Own?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It seems that it is not lawful for a bishop to have property of his own.

Objection 1. For our Lord said (Matt. 19. 21): If thou wilt be perfect, go sell all (Vulg., —what) thou hast, and give to the poor . . . and come, follow Me; hence it would seem to follow that voluntary poverty is requisite for perfection. Now bishops are in the state of perfection. Therefore it would seem unlawful for them to possess anything as their own.

Obj. 2. Further, Bishops take the place of the apostles in the Church, according to a gloss on Luke 10. 1.⁴ Now our Lord commanded the apostles to possess nothing of their own, according to Matt. 10. 9. Do not possess gold, nor silver, nor money in your purses; hence Peter said for himself and the other apostles (Matt. 19. 27): Behold we have left all things and have followed Thee. Therefore it would seem that bishops are bound to keep this command, and to possess nothing of their own.

Obj. 3. Further, Jerome says (Ep. ad Nepotian.):⁵ "The Greek κληρος denotes the Latin 'sors.' Hence clerics are so called either because they are of the Lord's estate, or because the Lord Himself is the estate, that is, portion of clerics. Now he that possesses the Lord can have nothing beside God; and if he have gold and silver, possessions, and chattels of all kinds, with such a portion the Lord does not vouchsafe to be his portion also." Therefore it would seem that not only bishops but even clerics should have nothing of their own.

On the contrary, It is stated (XII, Q. 1, cap. 19):⁶ "Bishops, if they wish, may bequeath to their heirs their personal or acquired property, and whatever belongs to them personally."

I answer that, No one is bound to works of supererogation, unless he binds himself specially thereto by vow. Hence Augustine says (Ep. cxxvii, ad Paulin. et Arment.):⁷ "Since you have taken the vow you have already bound yourself, you can no longer do otherwise. Before you were bound by the vow you were free to submit." Now it is evident that to live without possessing anything is a work of supererogation, for it is a matter not of precept but of counsel. Therefore our Lord after saying to the young man: If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments, said afterwards by way of addition: If thou wilt be perfect go sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor (Matt. 19. 17, 21). Bishops, however, do not bind themselves at their ordination to live without possessions of their own; nor indeed does the pastoral office, to which they bind themselves, make it necessary for them to live without anything of their own. Therefore bishops are not bound to live without possessions of their own.

² Epist. Ad Hunfridum Episc. (MA xv, 399).

Reply Obj. 1. As stated above (Q. CLXXXIV, A. 3, reply 1) the perfection of the Christian life does not essentially consist in voluntary poverty, but voluntary poverty conduces instrumentally to the perfection of life. Hence it does not follow that where there is greater poverty there is greater perfection; indeed the highest perfection is compatible with great wealth, since Abraham, to whom it was said (Gen. 17. 1): Walk before Me and be perfect, is stated to have been rich (ibid. 13. 2).

Reply Obj. 2. This saying of our Lord can be understood in three ways. First, mystically, that we should possess neither gold nor silver means that the preacher should not rely chiefly on temporal wisdom and eloquence; thus Jerome expounds the passage in commenting on Matt. 10. 10, Nor two coats.¹

Secondly, according to Augustine's explanation (De Consens. Ev. ii, 30),² we are to understand that our Lord said this not in command but in permission. For He permitted them to go preaching without gold or silver or other means, since they were to receive the means of livelihood from those to whom they preached; and so He added: For the workman is worthy of his meat. And yet if anyone were to use his own means in preaching the Gospel, this would be a work of supererogation, as Paul says in reference to himself (I Cor. 9. 12, 15).

Thirdly, according to the exposition of Chrysostom (Hom. ii in Rom. 16. 3, Salute Prisca),³ we are to understand that our Lord laid these commands on His disciples in reference to the mission on which they were sent to preach to the Jews, so that they might be encouraged to trust in His power, seeing that

He provided for their wants without their having means of their own. But it does not follow from this that they, or their successors, were obliged to preach the Gospel without having means of their own, since we read of Paul (II Cor. 11. 8) that he received wages of other churches for preaching to the Corinthians, and therefore it is clear that he possessed something sent to him by others. And it seems foolish to say that so many holy bishops as Athanasius, Ambrose, and Augustine would have disobeyed these commandments if they believed themselves bound to observe them.

Reply Obj. 3. Every part is less than the whole. Accordingly a man has other portions together with God if he becomes less intent on things pertaining to God by occupying himself with things of the world. Now neither bishops nor clerics ought thus to possess means of their own that while busy with their own they neglect those that concern the worship of God.

ARTICLE 7. Whether Bishops Sin Mortally If They Do Not Distribute to the Poor the Ecclesiastical Goods Which Accrue to Them?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It seems that bishops sin mortally if they do not distribute to the poor the ecclesiastical goods which they acquire.

Objection 1. For Ambrose expounding Luke 12. 16, The land of a certain . . . man brought forth plenty of fruits, says (Serm. lxiv, de Temp.):⁴ "Let no man claim as his own that which he has taken and obtained by violence from the common property in excess of his requirements"; and afterwards he adds: "It is not less criminal to take from him who has, than, when you are able and have plenty, to refuse him who has not." Now it is a mortal sin to take another's property by violence. Therefore bishops sin mortally if they give not to the poor that which they have in excess.

Obj. 2. Further, A gloss of Jerome on Isa. 3. 14, The spoil of the poor is in your house, says that ecclesiastical goods belong to the poor.⁵ Now whoever keeps for himself or gives to others that which belongs to another, sins mortally and is bound to restitution. Therefore if bishops keep for themselves, or give to their relations or friends, their surplus of ecclesiastical goods, it would seem that they are bound to restitution.

⁵ Glossa ordin. (IV, 12A); Jerome (PL 24, 69).

³ PG 51, 197.

Obj. 3. Further, Much more may one take what is necessary for oneself from the goods of the Church, than accumulate a surplus from them. Yet Jerome says in a letter to Pope Damasus:¹ "It is right that those clerics who receive no goods from their parents and relations should be supported from the funds of the Church. But those who have sufficient income from their parents and their own possessions, if they take what belongs to the poor, they commit and incur the guilt of sacrilege." Therefore the Apostle says (I Tim. 5. 16): If any of the faithful have widows, let him minister to them, and let not the Church be charged, that there may be sufficient for them that are widows indeed. Much more therefore do bishops sin mortally if they give not to the poor the surplus of their ecclesiastical goods.

On the contrary, Many bishops do not give their surplus to the poor, but would seem commendably to lay it out so as to increase the revenue of the Church.

I answer that, The same is not to be said of their own goods which bishops may possess and of ecclesiastical goods. Because they have real dominion over their own goods; therefore from the very nature of the case they are not bound to give these things to others, and may either keep them for themselves or bestow them on others at will. Nevertheless they may sin in this disposal by inordinate affection, which leads them either to accumulate more than they should, or not to assist others in accordance with the demands of charity; yet they are not bound to restitution, because such things are entrusted to their ownership.

On the other hand, they hold ecclesiastical goods as dispensers or trustees. For Augustine says (Ep. clxxxv, ad Bonif.):² "If we possess privately what is enough for us, other things belong not to us but to the poor, and we have the dispensing of them; but we can claim ownership of them only by wicked theft." Now dispensing requires good faith, according to I Cor. 4. 2, Here now it is required among the dispensers that a man be found faithful.

Moreover ecclesiastical goods are to be applied not only to the good of the poor, but also to the divine worship and the needs of its ministers. Hence it is said (XII, Q. II, cap. 28):³ "Of the Church's revenues or the offerings of the faithful only one part is to be assigned to the bishop, two parts are to be used by the priest, under pain of suspension, for the ecclesiastical fabric, and for the benefit of the poor; the remaining part is to be divided among the clergy according to their respective merits."

Accordingly if the goods which are assigned to the use of the bishop are distinct from those which are appointed for the use of the poor, or the ministers, or for the ecclesiastical worship, and if the bishop keeps back for himself part of that which should be given to the poor, or to the ministers for their use, or expended on the divine worship, without doubt he is an unfaithful dispenser, sins mortally, and is bound to restitution. But as regards those goods which are deputed to his private use, the same apparently applies as to his own property, namely that he sins through immoderate attachment or use of them if he exceeds moderation in what he keeps for himself, and fails to assist others according to the demands of charity.

On the other hand, if no distinction is made in these goods, their distribution is entrusted to his good faith; and if he fail or exceed in a slight degree, this may happen without prejudice to his good faith, because in such matters a man cannot possibly decide precisely what ought to be done. On the other hand, if the excess be very great he cannot be ignorant of the fact, and consequently he would seem to be lacking in good faith, and is guilty of mortal sin. For it is written (Matt. 24. 48-51) that if that evil servant shall say in his heart: My lord is long acoming, which shows contempt of God's judgment, and shall begin to strike his fellow-servants, which is a sign of pride, and shall eat and drink with drunkards, which proceeds from lust, the lord of that servant shall come in a day that he hopeth not . . . and shall separate him, namely from the fellowship of good men, and appoint his portion with hypocrites, namely in hell.

Reply Obj. 1. This saying of Ambrose refers to the administration not only of ecclesiastical things but also of any goods whatever from which a man is bound, as a duty of charity, to provide for those who are in need. But it is not possible to state definitely when this need is such as to impose an obligation under pain of mortal sin, as is the case in other points of detail that have to be considered in human acts; for the decision in such matters is left to human prudence.

Reply Obj. 2. As stated in the Article the goods of the Church have to be employed not only for the use of the poor, but also for other purposes. Hence if a bishop or cleric wish to deprive himself of that which is assigned to his own use and give it to his relations or others, he does not sin so long as he observes moderation, so that, namely, they cease to be in want without thus becoming the richer. Hence Ambrose says (De Offic. i, 30):¹ "It is a commendable liberality if you overlook not your kindred when you know them to be in want; yet not so as to wish to make them rich with what you can give to the poor."

² PL 33, 809. ³ Gratian, Decretum, pt. II (RF I, 697).

Reply Obj. 3. The goods of churches should not all be given to the poor, except in a case of necessity; for then, as Ambrose says (De Offic. ii, 28),² even the vessels consecrated to the divine worship are to be sold for the ransom of prisoners, and other needs of the poor. In such a case of necessity a cleric would sin if he chose to maintain himself on the goods of the Church, always supposing him to have a patrimony of his own on which to support himself.

Reply Obj. 4. The goods of the churches should be employed for the good of the poor. Consequently a man is to be commended if, there being no present necessity for helping the poor, he spends the surplus from the Church revenue in buying property, or lays it by for some future use connected with the Church or the needs of the poor. But if there be a pressing need for helping the poor, to lay by for the future is a superfluous and inordinate saving, and is forbidden by our Lord Who said (Matt. 6, 34): Be . . . not solicitous for the morrow.

ARTICLE 8. Whether Religious Who Are Raised to the Episcopate Are Bound to Religious Observances?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It seems that religious who are raised to the episcopate are not bound to religious observances.

Objection 1. For it is said (xviii, q. 1, cap. Statutum)³ that "a canonical election loosens a monk from the yoke imposed by the rule of the monastic profession, and the holy ordination makes of a monk a bishop." Now the regular observances pertain to the yoke of the rule. Therefore religious who are appointed bishops are not bound to religious observances.

Obj. 2. Further, He who ascends from a lower to a higher degree does not seem to be bound to those things which pertain to the lower degree; thus it was stated above (Q. LXXXVIII, A.

12, reply 1) that a religious is not bound to keep the vows he made in the world. But a religious who is appointed to the episcopate ascends to something greater, as stated above (Q. CLXXXIV, A. 7). Therefore it would seem that a bishop is not bound to those things to which he was bound in the state of religion.

Obj. 3. Further, Religious would seem to be bound above all to obedience, and to live without property of their own. But religious who are appointed bishops are not bound to obey the superiors of their order, since they are above them; nor apparently are they bound to poverty, since according to the decree quoted above (obj. 1) "when the holy ordination has made of a monk a bishop he enjoys the right, as the lawful heir, of claiming his paternal inheritance." Moreover they are sometimes allowed to make a will. Much less therefore are they bound to other regular observances.

On the contrary, It is said in the Decretals (xvi, q. 1, cap. 3):⁴ "With regard to those who after long residence in a monastery attain to the order of clerics, we bid them not to lay aside their former purpose."

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1, reply 2) the religious state pertains to perfection, as a way of tending to perfection, while the episcopal state pertains to perfection as a kind of teacher of perfection. Hence the religious state is compared to the episcopal state as the state of the disciple to that of the master, and as disposition to perfection. Now the disposition is not voided at the advent of perfection, except perhaps as regards what is incompatible with perfection, while as to that in which it is in accord with perfection it is confirmed the more. Thus when the disciple has become a master it is no longer appropriate to him to be a listener, but it is fitting to him to read and meditate even more than before.

Accordingly we must assert that if there be among religious observances any that instead of being an obstacle to the episcopal office are a safeguard of perfection, such as continence, poverty, and so forth, a religious, even after he has been made a bishop, remains bound to observe these, and consequently to wear the habit of his order, which is a sign of this obligation.

On the other hand, a man is not bound to keep such religious observances as may be incompatible with the episcopal office, for instance solitude, silence, and certain severe abstinences or watchings and such as would render him bodily unable to exercise the episcopal office.

⁴ Gratian, pt. II (RF I, 762).

² Pl. 16, 148; cf. Gratian, Decretum, pt. II, causa XII, q. 2, can. 70 (RF I, 710).

³ Gratian, Decretum, pt. II (RF I, 828).

For the rest he may dispense himself from them, according to the needs of his person or office, and the manner of life of those among whom he dwells, in the same way as religious superiors dispense themselves in such matters.

Reply Obj. 1. He who from being a monk becomes a bishop is loosened from the yoke of the monastic profession not in everything, but in those that are incompatible with the episcopal office, as stated in the Article.

Reply Obj. 2. The vows of those who are living in the world are compared to the vows of religion as the particular to the universal, as stated above (obj. 2). But the vows of religion are compared to the episcopal dignity as disposition to perfection. Now the particular is superfluous when one has the universal, but the disposition is still necessary when perfection has been attained.

Reply Obj. 3. It is accidental that religious who are bishops are not bound to obey the superiors of their order, because, that is, they have ceased to be subjects, even as the latter have ceased to be their religious superiors. Nevertheless the obligation of the vow remains virtually, so that if any person be lawfully set above them they would be bound to obey them, since they are bound to obey both the statutes of their rule in the way mentioned above, and their superiors if they have any.

As to property they cannot in any way have it. For they claim their paternal inheritance not as their own, but as due to the Church. Hence it is added (ibid.) that "after he has been ordained bishop at the altar to which he is consecrated and appointed according to the holy canons, he must restore whatever he may acquire."

Nor can he make any will at all, because he is entrusted solely with the administration of things ecclesiastical, and this ends with his death, after which a will comes into force according to the Apostle (Heb. 9. 17). If, however, by the Pope's permission he make a will, he is not to be understood to bequeath property of his own, but we are to understand that by apostolic authority the power of his administration has been prolonged so as to remain in force after his death.

QUESTION CLXXXVI

OF THOSE THINGS IN WHICH THE RELIGIOUS STATE PROPERLY CONSISTS
(In Ten Articles)

WE must now consider things pertaining to the religious state, which consideration will be four-fold. In the first place we shall consider those things in which the religious state consists chiefly; secondly, those things which are lawfully befitting to religious (Q. CLXXXVII); thirdly, the different kinds of religious orders (Q. CLXXXVIII); fourthly, the entrance into the religious state (Q. CLXXXIX).

Under the first head there are ten points of inquiry: (1) Whether the religious state is perfect? (2) Whether religious are bound to all the counsels? (3) Whether voluntary poverty is required for the religious state? (4) Whether continence is necessary? (5) Whether obedience is necessary? (6) Whether it is necessary that these should be the matter of a vow? (7) Of the sufficiency of these vows. (8) Of their comparison one with another. (9) Whether a religious sins mortally whenever he transgresses a statute of his rule? (10) Whether, other things being equal, a religious sins more grievously by the same kind of sin than a secular person?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Religion Implies a State of Perfection?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that religion does not imply a state of perfection.

Objection 1. For that which is necessary for salvation does not seem to pertain to perfection. But religion is necessary, for salvation, whether because "thereby we are bound (religamur) to the one true God," as Augustine says (De Vera Relig. 55),¹ or because it takes its name from "our returning (religimus) to God Whom we had lost by neglecting Him," according to Augustine.² Therefore it would seem that religion does not denote the state of perfection.

Obj. 2. Further, Religion according to Tully (De Inv. Rhet. ii, 53)³ is that "which offers worship and ceremony to the divine nature." Now the offering of worship and ceremony to God would seem to pertain to the ministry of holy orders rather than to the diversity of states, as stated above (Q. XL, A. 2; Q. CLXXXIII, A. 3). Therefore it would seem that religion does not denote the state of perfection.

Obj. 3. Further, The state of perfection is distinct from the state of beginners and that of the proficient. But in religion also some are beginners, and some are proficient. Therefore religion does not denote the state of perfection.

Obj. 4. Further, Religion would seem a place of repentance; for it is said in the Decrees (vii, 2. 1, cap. Hoc nequaquam):⁴ "The holy

² City of God, x, 3 (PL 41, 280).

³ DD 1, 105.

⁴ Gratian, Decretum, pt. II (RF 1, 585).

synod orders that any man who has been degraded from the episcopal dignity to the monastic life and a place of repentance should by no means rise again to the episcopate." Now a place of repentance is opposed to the state of perfection; hence Dionysius (Eccl. Hier. vi)¹ places penitents in the lowest place, namely among those who are to be cleansed. Therefore it would seem that religion is not the state of perfection.

On the contrary, In the Conferences of the Fathers (Collat. i. 7)² abbot Moses speaking of religious says: "We must recognize that we have to undertake the hunger of fasting, watchings, bodily toil, privation, reading and other acts of virtue in order by these degrees to mount to the perfection of charity." Now things pertaining to human acts are specified and named from the intention of the end. Therefore religious belong to the state of perfection. Moreover Dionysius says (Eccl. Hier. vi)³ that those who are called servants of God by reason of their rendering pure service and subjection to God, are united to the perfection beloved of Him.

I answer that, As stated above (Q. CXLI, A. 2) that which is applicable to many things in common is ascribed antonomastically to that to which it is applicable by way of excellence. Thus the name of fortitude is claimed by the virtue which preserves the firmness of the mind in regard to most difficult things, and the name of temperance by that virtue which tempers the greatest pleasures. Now religion as stated above (Q. LXXXI, A. 2; A. 3, reply 2) is a virtue by which a man offers something to the service and worship of God. Therefore those who give themselves up entirely to the divine service, as offering a holocaust to God, are called religious antonomastically. Hence Gregory says (Hom. viii in Ezech.):⁴ "Some there are who keep nothing for themselves, but sacrifice to almighty God their tongue, their senses, their life, and the property they possess." Now the perfection of man consists in adhering wholly to God, as stated above (Q. CLXXXIV, A. 2), and in this sense religion denotes the state of perfection.

Reply Obj. 1. To offer something to the worship of God is necessary for salvation, but to offer oneself wholly, and one's possessions, to the worship of God belongs to perfection.

Reply Obj. 2. As stated above (Q. LXXXI, A. 1, reply 1; A. 4, reply 1 and 2) when we were treating of the virtue of religion, religion has reference not only to the offering of sacrifices and other like things that are proper to religion, but also to the acts of all the virtues which, in so far as these are referred to God's service and honour, become acts of religion. Accordingly if a man devotes his whole life to the divine service, his whole life belongs to religion, and thus by reason of the religious life that they lead, those who are in the state of perfection are called religious.

Reply Obj. 3. As stated above (On the contrary) religion denotes the state of perfection by reason of the end intended. Hence it does not follow that whoever is in the state of perfection is already perfect, but that he tends to perfection. Hence Origen commenting on Matt. 19 21, If thou wilt be perfect, etc., says (Tract. xv in Matt.)⁵ that "he who has exchanged riches for poverty in order to become perfect does not become perfect at the very moment of giving his goods to the poor; but from that day the contemplation of God will begin to lead him to all the virtues." Thus all are not perfect in religion, but some are beginners, some proficient.

Reply Obj. 4. The religious state was instituted chiefly that we might obtain perfection by means of certain exercises by means of which the obstacles to perfect charity are removed. By the removal of the obstacles of perfect charity, much more are the occasions of sin cut off, for sin destroys charity altogether. Therefore since it pertains to penance to cut out the causes of sin, it follows that the religious state is a most fitting place for penance. Hence (xxxiii, Q. II, cap. Admonere)⁶ a man who had killed his wife is counselled to enter a monastery which is described as "better and lighter," rather than to do public penance while remaining in the world.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Every Religious Is Bound To Keep All the Counsels?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that every religious is bound to keep all the counsels.

Objection 1. For whoever professes a certain state of life is bound to observe whatever belongs to that state. Now each religious professes the state of perfection. Therefore every religious is bound to keep all the counsels that pertain to the state of perfection.

Obj. 2. Further, Gregory says (Hom. viii in Ezech.)⁷ that "he who renounces this world, and

³ Cassianus (PL 49, 489).

⁴ Bk. II (PL 70, 1037).

⁵ PG 13, 1301.

⁶ Gratian, Decretum, pt. II. (RF I, 1152).

⁷ Bk. II (PL 70, 1038).

does all the good he can, is like one who has gone out of Egypt and offers sacrifice in the wilderness." Now it pertains specially to religious to renounce the world. Therefore it pertains to them also to do all the good they can, and so it would seem that each of them is bound to fulfil all the counsels.

Obj. 3. Further, If it is not requisite for the state of perfection to fulfil all the counsels, it would seem enough to fulfil some of them. But this is false, since some who lead a secular life fulfil some of the counsels, for instance those who observe continence. Therefore it would seem that every religious who is in the state of perfection is bound to fulfil whatever pertains to perfection; and such are the counsels.

On the contrary, One is not bound, unless one bind oneself, to do works of supererogation. But every religious does not bind himself to keep all the counsels, but to certain definite ones, some to some, others to others. Therefore all are not bound to keep all of them.

I answer that, A thing pertains to perfection in three ways. First, essentially, and thus, as stated above (Q. CLXXXIV, A. 3) the perfect observance of the precepts of charity belongs to perfection. Secondly, a thing belongs to perfection as a consequence; such are those things that result from the perfection of charity, for instance to bless them that curse you (Luke 6. 27), and to keep counsels of a like kind, which though they are binding as regards the preparedness of the mind, so that one has to fulfil them when necessity requires; yet are sometimes fulfilled without there being any necessity, through superabundance of charity. Thirdly, a thing pertains to perfection instrumentally and by way of disposition, as poverty, continence, abstinence, and the like.

Now it has been stated (A. 1) that the perfection of charity is the end of the religious state. And the religious state is a school or exercise for the attainment of perfection, which men strive to reach by various practices, just as a physician may use various remedies in order to heal. But it is evident that for him who works for an end it is not necessary that he should already have attained the end, but it is requisite that he should tend to it by some path. Hence he who enters the religious state is not bound to have perfect charity, but he is bound to tend to this, and use his endeavours to have perfect charity.

For the same reason he is not bound to fulfil those things that result from the perfection of charity, although he is bound to intend to fulfil them. He acts against this intention if he condemns them, however, and so he sins not by omitting them but by contempt of them.

In like manner he is not bound to observe all the practices by which perfection may be attained, but only those which are definitely prescribed to him by the rule which he has professed.

Reply Obj. 1. He who enters religion does not make profession to be perfect, but he professes to endeavour to attain perfection; even as he who enters the schools does not profess to have knowledge, but to study in order to acquire knowledge. Therefore as Augustine says,¹ Pythagoras was unwilling to profess to be a wise man, but acknowledged himself "a lover of wisdom." Hence a religious does not violate his profession if he be not perfect, but only if he despises to tend to perfection.

Reply Obj. 2. Just as, though all are bound to love God with their whole heart, yet there is a certain wholeness of perfection which cannot be omitted without sin, and another wholeness which can be omitted without sin, provided there be no contempt, as stated above (reply 1) so too, all, both religious and seculars, are bound in a certain measure to do whatever good they can, for to all without exception it is said (Eccles. 9. 10): Whatsoever thy hand is able to do, do it earnestly. Yet there is a way of fulfilling this precept so as to avoid sin, namely if one do what one can as required by the conditions of one's state of life, provided there be no contempt of doing better things, which contempt sets the mind against spiritual progress.

Reply Obj. 3. There are some counsels such that if they are omitted, man's whole life would be taken up with secular business; for instance if he have property of his own, or enter the married state, or do something of the kind that pertains to the essential vows of religion themselves. Therefore religious are bound to keep all such counsels. Other counsels there are, however, about certain particular better actions, which can be omitted without one's life being taken up with secular actions. Therefore there is no need for religious to be bound to fulfil all of them.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Poverty Is Required for Religious Perfection?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It seems that poverty is not required for religious perfection.

¹ City of God, VIII, 2 (PL 41, 225); cf. Cicero, Tuscul., V, 3 (DD IV, 47).

Objection 1. For that which it is unlawful to do does not apparently belong to the state of perfection. But it would seem to be unlawful for a man to give up all he possesses, since the Apostle (II Cor. 8. 12) lays down the way in which the faithful are to give alms, saying: If the will be forward, it is accepted according to that which a man hath, that is, "you should keep back what you need,"¹ and afterwards he adds (verse 13): For I mean not that others should be eased, and you burthened, that is "with poverty," according to a gloss.² Moreover a gloss on I Tim. 6. 8, Having food, and wherewith to be covered, says: "Though we brought nothing, and will carry nothing away, we must not give up these temporal things altogether."³ Therefore it seems that voluntary poverty is not requisite for religious perfection.

Obj. 2. Further, Whosoever exposes himself to danger sins. But he who renounces all he has and embraces voluntary poverty exposes himself to danger—not only spiritual, according to Prov. 30. 9, Lest perhaps . . . being compelled by poverty, I should steal and forswear the name of my God, and Ecclus. 27. 1, Through poverty many have sinned,—but also corporal, for it is written (Eccl. 7. 13): As wisdom is a defence, so money is a defence, and the Philosopher says⁴ that "the waste of property appears to be a sort of ruining of one's self, since thereby man lives." Therefore it would seem that voluntary poverty is not requisite for the perfection of religious life.

Obj. 3. Further, Virtue observes the mean, as stated in the Ethics.⁵ But he who renounces all by voluntary poverty seems to go to the extreme rather than to observe the mean. Therefore he does not act virtuously, and so this does not pertain to the perfection of life.

Obj. 4. Further, The ultimate perfection of man consists in happiness. Now riches conduce to happiness; for it is written (Ecclus. 31. 8): Blessed is the rich man that is found without blemish, and the Philosopher says⁶ that riches contribute instrumentally to happiness. Therefore voluntary poverty is not requisite for religious perfection.

Obj. 5. Further, The episcopal state is more perfect than the religious state. But bishops may have property, as stated above (Q. CLXXXV., A. 6). Therefore religious may also.

² Glossa interl. (vi, 71v); Glossa Lombardi (PL 192, 58).

³ Glossa Lombardi (PL 192, 358); cf. Glossa interl., on II Cor. 8.13 (vi, 122v).

⁴ Ethics, IV, 1 (1120^a2).

⁵ Aristotle, II, 6 (1100^b36).

⁶ Ethics, I, 8 (1099^b1).

Obj. 6. Further, Almsgiving is a work most acceptable to God, and as Chrysostom says (Hom. ix in Ep. ad Hebr.)⁷ "is a most effective remedy in repentance." Now poverty excludes almsgiving. Therefore it would seem that poverty does not pertain to religious perfection.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Moral. viii, 26):⁸ "There are some of the just who bracing themselves up to lay hold of the very height of perfection, while they aim at higher objects within abandon all things without." Now, as stated above, (AA. 1, 2) it pertains properly to religious to brace themselves up in order to lay hold of the very height of perfection. Therefore it belongs to them to abandon all outward things by voluntary poverty.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 2), the religious state is an exercise and a discipline for attaining to the perfection of charity. For this it is necessary that a man wholly withdraw his affections from worldly things, since Augustine says,⁹ speaking to God: "Too little doth he love Thee who loves anything with Thee, which he loveth not for Thee." Therefore he says (QQ. LXXXIII, qu. 36)¹⁰ that "charity is nourished by the lessening of cupidity, and is perfect when cupidity is no more." Now the possession of worldly things draws a man's mind to the love of them; hence Augustine says (Ep. ad Paulin. et Theras. xxxi)¹¹ that "we are more firmly attached to earthly things when we have them than when we desire them; for why did that young man go away sad, save because he had great wealth? For it is one thing not to wish to lay hold of what one has not, and another to renounce what one already has; the former are rejected as foreign to us, the latter are cut off as a limb." And Chrysostom says (Hom. lxiii in Matt.)¹² that "the possession of wealth kindles a greater flame and the desire for them becomes stronger."

Hence it is that in the attainment of the perfection of charity the first foundation is voluntary poverty, whereby a man lives without property of his own, according to the saying of our Lord (Matt. 19. 21), If thou wilt be perfect, go, sell all (Vulg.,—what) thou hast, and give to the poor, . . . and come, follow Me.

Reply Obj. 1. As the gloss adds (ibid.)¹³ the Apostle said "not that we (you) should be burthened," that is with poverty, "not as though it were not better to give all; but he feared for the weak, whom he admonished so to give as not to suffer privation." Hence in like manner the other gloss¹ means not that it is unlawful to renounce all one's temporal goods, but that this is not required of necessity. Therefore Ambrose says (De Offic. i.):² "Our Lord does not wish," namely does not command us "to pour out our wealth all at once, but to dispense it; or perhaps to do as did Eliseus who slew his oxen, and fed the poor with that which was his own so that no household care might hold him back."

Reply Obj. 2. He who renounces all his possessions for Christ's sake exposes himself to no danger, neither spiritual nor corporal. For spiritual danger ensues from poverty when the latter is not voluntary, because those who are unwillingly poor, through the desire of money-getting, fall into many sins, according to I Tim. 9, They that will become rich, fall into temptation and into the snare of the devil. This affection is put away by those who embrace voluntary poverty, but it gathers strength in those who have wealth, as stated in the Article. Again bodily danger does not threaten those who, intent on following Christ, renounce all their possessions and entrust themselves to divine providence. Hence Augustine says (De Serm. Dom. in Monte, ii, 17):³ "Those who seek first the kingdom of God and His justice are not weighed down by anxiety lest they lack what is necessary."

Reply Obj. 3. According to the Philosopher,⁴ the mean of virtue is taken according to right reason, not according to the quantity of a thing. Consequently whatever may be done in accordance with right reason is not rendered sinful by the greatness of the quantity, but all the more virtuous. It would, however, be against right reason to throw away all one's possessions through intemperance, or without any useful purpose; but it is in accordance with right reason to renounce wealth in order to devote oneself to the contemplation of wisdom. Even certain philosophers are said to have done this; for Jerome says (Ep. ad Paulin.):⁵ "That famous Theban, Crates, once a very wealthy man, when he was going to Athens to study philosophy, cast away a large amount of gold; for he considered that he could not possess both gold and virtue at the same time." Much more therefore is it according to right reason for a man to renounce all he has in order perfectly to follow Christ. Therefore Jerome says (Ep. ad Rust. Monach.):⁶ "Poor thyself, follow Christ poor."

Reply Obj. 4. Happiness or felicity is twofold. One is perfect, to which we look forward in the life to come; the other is imperfect, in respect of which some are said to be happy in this life. The happiness of this life is twofold, one is according to the active life, the other according to the contemplative life, as the Philosopher asserts.⁷ Now wealth conduces instrumentally to the happiness of the active life which consists in external actions, because as the Philosopher says,⁸ "we do many things by friends, by riches, by political influence, as it were by instruments." On the other hand, it does not conduce to the happiness of the contemplative life, but rather is it an obstacle to it, in so far as the anxiety it involves disturbs the quiet of the soul, which is most necessary to one who contemplates. Hence it is that the Philosopher asserts⁹ that "for actions many things are needed, but the contemplative man needs no such things," namely external goods, "for his operation, but they are impediments to his contemplation."

Man is directed to future happiness by charity; and since voluntary poverty is an efficacious exercise for the attaining of perfect charity, it follows that it is of great avail in acquiring the happiness of heaven. Therefore our Lord said (Matt. 19. 21): Go, sell all (Vulg.—what) thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven. Now riches once they are possessed are in themselves of a nature to hinder the perfection of charity, especially by enticing and distracting the mind. Hence it is written (Matt. 13. 22) that the care of this world and the deceitfulness of riches choke up the word of God, for as Gregory says (Hom. xv in Ev.):¹⁰ by preventing the good desire from entering into the heart, they destroy life at its very outset. Consequently it is difficult to safeguard charity amidst riches; hence our Lord said (Matt. 19. 23) that a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven, which we must understand as referring to one who actually has wealth, since He says that this is impossible for him who places his affection in riches, according to the explanation of Chrysostom (Hom. lxiii in Matt.),¹¹ for He adds (verse

Hence it is not said absolutely that the rich man is blessed, but the rich man that is found without blemish, and that hath not gone after gold, and this because he has done a difficult thing, and so the text continues (verse 9): Who is he? and we will praise him; for he hath done wonderful things in his life, namely by not loving riches though placed in the midst of them.

Reply Obj. 5. The episcopal state is not directed to the attainment of perfection, but rather to the effect that, in virtue of the perfection which he already has, a man may govern others, by administering not only spiritual but also temporal things. This belongs to the active life, wherein many things occur that may be done by means of wealth as an instrument, as stated in the preceding Reply. Therefore it is not required of bishops who make profession of governing Christ's flock, that they have nothing of their own, as it is required of religious who make profession of learning to obtain perfection.

Reply Obj. 6. The renouncement of one's own wealth is compared to almsgiving as the universal to the particular, and as the holocaust to the sacrifice. Hence Gregory says (Hom. viii in Ezech.)¹ that "those who assist the needy with the things they possess, by their good deeds offer sacrifice, since they offer up something to God and keep back something for themselves; but those who keep nothing for themselves offer a holocaust which is greater than a sacrifice." Therefore Jerome also says (Contra Vigilant. v):² "When you declare that those do better who retain the use of their possessions, and dole out the fruits of their possessions to the poor, it is not I but the Lord Who answers you; If thou wilt be perfect, etc.", and afterwards he goes on to say: "This man whom you praise belongs to the second and third degree, and we too commend him; provided we acknowledge the first as to be preferred to the second and third." For this reason in order to exclude the error of Vigilantius it is said (De Eccl. Dogm. 71):³ "It is a good thing to give away one's goods by dispensing them to the poor; it is better to give them away once for all with the intention of following the Lord, and, free of solicitude, to be poor with Christ."

ARTICLE 4. Whether Perpetual Continence Is Required for Religious Perfection?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It seems that perpetual continence is not required for religious perfection.

Objection 1. For all perfection of the Christian life began with Christ's apostles. Now the apostles do not appear to have observed continence, as evidenced by Peter, of whose mother-in-law we read Matt. 8. 14. Therefore it would seem that perpetual continence is not requisite for religious perfection.

Obj. 2. Further, The first example of perfection is shown to us in the person of Abraham, to whom the Lord said (Gen. 17. 1): Walk before Me, and be perfect. Now the copy should not surpass the example. Therefore perpetual continence is not requisite for religious perfection.

Obj. 3. Further, That which is required for religious perfection is to be found in every religious order. Now there are some religious who lead a married life. Therefore religious perfection does not require perpetual continence.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (II Cor. 7. 1): Let us cleanse ourselves from all defilement of the flesh and of the spirit, perfecting sanctification in the fear of God. Now cleanness of flesh and spirit is safeguarded by continence, for it is said (I Cor. 7. 34): The unmarried woman and the virgin thinketh on the things of the Lord that she may be holy both in spirit and in body (Vulg.—both in body and in spirit). Therefore religious perfection requires continence.

I answer that, The religious state requires the removal of whatever hinders man from devoting himself entirely to God's service. Now the use of sexual union hinders the mind from giving itself wholly to the service of God, and this for two reasons. First, on account of its vehement pleasure, which by frequent repetition increases concupiscence, as also the Philosopher observes;⁴ and hence it is that the use of sexual intercourse withdraws the mind from that perfect intentness on tending to God. Augustine expresses this when he says (Solil. i, 10):⁵ "I consider that nothing so casts down the manly mind from its height as the fondling of women, and those bodily contacts which belong to the married state." Secondly, because it involves man in solicitude for the control of his wife, his children, and his temporalities which serve for their upkeep. Hence the Apostle says (I Cor. 7. 32, 33): He that is without a wife is solicitous for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please God: but he that is with a wife is solicitous for the things of the world, how he may please his wife.

Therefore perpetual continence, as well as voluntary poverty, is requisite for religious perfection. Therefore just as Vigilantius was condemned for equalling riches to poverty,¹ so was Jovinian condemned for equalling marriage to virginity.²

Reply Obj. 1. The perfection not only of poverty but also of continence was introduced by Christ Who said (Matt. 19. 12). There are eunuchs who have made themselves eunuchs, for the kingdom of heaven, and then added: He that can take, let him take it. And lest anyone should be deprived of the hope of attaining perfection, he admitted to the state of perfection those even who were married. Now the husbands could not without committing an injustice forsake their wives, although all could without injustice renounce riches. Therefore Peter whom He found married, He severed not from his wife, while He withheld from marriage John who wished to marry.

Reply Obj. 2. As Augustine says (De Bono Conjug. 22),³ "the chastity of celibacy is better than the chastity of marriage, one of which Abraham had in use, both of them in habit. For he lived chastely, and he might have been chaste without marrying, but it was not requisite then." Nevertheless if the patriarchs of old had perfection of mind together with wealth and marriage, which is a mark of the greatness of their virtue, this is no reason why any weaker person should presume to have such great virtue that he can attain to perfection though rich and married; as neither does a man unarmed presume to attack his enemy because Samson slew many foes with the jaw-bone of an ass. For those fathers, had it been seasonable to observe continence and poverty, would have been most careful to observe them.

Reply Obj. 3. Such ways of living as admit of the use of marriage are not the religious life simply and absolutely speaking, but in a restricted sense, in so far as they have a certain share in those things that belong to the religious state.

³ PL 40, 392.

ARTICLE 5. Whether Obedience Belongs to Religious Perfection?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It seems that obedience does not belong to religious perfection.

Objection 1. For those things seem to belong to religious perfection which are works of supererogation and are not binding upon all. But all are bound to obey their superiors, according to the saying of the Apostle (Heb. 13. 17), Obey your prelates, and be subject to them. Therefore it would seem that obedience does not belong to religious perfection.

Obj. 2. Further, Obedience would seem to belong properly to those who have to be guided by the sense of others, that is persons who are lacking in discernment. Now the Apostle says (Heb. 5. 14) that strong meat is for the perfect, for them who by custom have their senses exercised to the discerning of good and evil. Therefore it would seem that obedience does not belong to the state of the perfect.

Obj. 3. Further, If obedience were requisite for religious perfection, it would follow that it is fitting for all religious. But it is not fitting for all, since some religious lead a solitary life, and have no superior whom they obey. Again religious superiors apparently are not bound to obedience. Therefore obedience would seem not to pertain to religious perfection.

Obj. 4. Further, If the vow of obedience were requisite for religion, it would follow that religious are bound to obey their superiors in all things, just as they are bound to abstain from all sexual intercourse by their vow of continence. But they are not bound to obey their superiors in all things, as stated above (Q. civ., A. 5), when we were treating of the virtue of obedience. Therefore the vow of obedience is not requisite for religion.

Obj. 5. Further, Those services are most acceptable to God which are done freely and not of necessity, according to II Cor. 9. 7, Not with sadness or of necessity. Now that which is done out of obedience is done of necessity of precept. Therefore those good works are more deserving of praise which are done of one's own accord. Therefore the vow of obedience is unbecoming to religion whereby men seek to attain to that which is better.

On the contrary, Religious perfection consists chiefly in the imitation of Christ, according to Matt. 19. 21, If thou wilt be perfect, etc. . . follow Me. Now in Christ obedience is commended above all according to Philip. 2.

8, He became (Vulg.,—becoming) obedient unto death. Therefore it seems that obedience belongs to religious perfection.

I answer that, As stated above (AA. 2, 3) the religious state is a discipline and exercise for tending to perfection. Now those who are being instructed or exercised in order to attain a certain end must follow the direction of someone under whose control they are instructed or exercised so as to attain that end as disciples under a master. Hence religious need to be placed under the instruction and command of someone as regards things pertaining to the religious life; hence it is said (VII, Q. 1, cap. Hoc nequaquam):¹ "The monastic life denotes subjection and discipleship." Now one man is subjected to another's command and instruction by obedience, and consequently obedience is requisite for religious perfection.

Reply Obj. 1. To obey one's superiors in matters that are necessary to virtue is not a work of supererogation, but is common to all; but to obey in matters pertaining to the practice of perfection belongs properly to religious. This latter obedience is compared to the former as the universal to the particular. For those who live in the world keep something for themselves, and offer something to God, and in the latter respect they are under obedience to their superiors; while those who live in religion give themselves wholly and their possessions to God, as stated above (AA. 1, 3). Hence their obedience is universal.

Reply Obj. 2. As the Philosopher says,² by performing actions we contract certain habits, and when we have acquired the habit we are best able to perform the actions. Accordingly those who have not attained to perfection acquire perfection by obeying, while those who have already acquired perfection are most ready to obey, not as though they need to be directed to the acquisition of perfection, but as maintaining themselves by this means in that which belongs to perfection.

Reply Obj. 3. The subjection of religious is chiefly in reference to bishops, who are compared to them as perfectors to perfected, as Dionysius states (Eccl. Hier. vi),³ where he also says that "the monastic order is subjected to the perfecting virtues of the bishops, and is taught by their godlike enlightenment." Hence neither hermits nor religious superiors are exempt from obedience to bishops; and if they be wholly or partly exempt from obedience to the bishop of the diocese, they are nevertheless bound to obey the Sovereign Pontiff, not only in matters affecting all in common, but also in those which pertain specially to religious discipline.

Reply Obj. 4. The vow of obedience taken by religious, extends to the disposition of a man's whole life, and in this way it has a certain universality, although it does not extend to all individual acts. For some of these do not belong to religion, through not being of those things that concern the love of God and of our neighbour, such as rubbing one's beard, lifting a stick from the ground and so forth, which do not come under a vow nor under obedience; some are also contrary to religion. Nor is there any comparison with continence whereby acts are excluded which are altogether contrary to religion.

Reply Obj. 5. The necessity of coercion makes an act involuntary and consequently deprives it of the character of praise or merit. But the necessity which is consequent upon obedience is a necessity not of coercion but of a free will, in so far as a man is willing to obey, although perhaps he would not be willing to do the thing commanded considered in itself. Therefore since by vow of obedience a man lays himself under the necessity of doing for God's sake certain things that are not pleasing in themselves, for this very reason that which he does is the more acceptable to God, though it be of less account, because man can give nothing greater to God, than by subjecting his will to another man's for God's sake. Hence in the Conferences of the Fathers (Coll. xviii, 7)⁴ it is stated that the Sarabaitæ are the worst class of monks, because through providing for their own needs without being subject to superiors, they are free to do as they will; and yet day and night they are more busily occupied in work than those who live in monasteries.

ARTICLE 6. Whether It is Requisite for Religious Perfection That Poverty, Continence, and Obedience Should Come Under a Vow?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It seems that it is not requisite for religious perfection that the three aforesaid, namely poverty, continence, and obedience, should come under a vow.

Objection 1. For the discipline of perfection is founded on the principles laid down by our Lord. Now our Lord in formulating perfection

² Ethics, II, 1, 2 (1103^a14; 1103^b26).

³ Sect. 3 (PG 3, 532).

⁴ Cassian (PL 49, 1102).

(Matt. 19. 21) said: If thou wilt be perfect, go, sell all (Vulg.—what) thou hast, and give to the poor, without any mention of a vow. Therefore it would seem that a vow is not necessary for the discipline of religion.

Obj. 2. Further, A vow is a promise made to God, and so (Eccl. 5. 3) the wise man after saying: If thou hast vowed anything to God, defer not to pay it, adds at once, for an unfaithful and foolish promise displeaseth Him. But when a thing is being actually given there is no need for a promise. Therefore it suffices for religious perfection that one keep poverty, continence, and obedience without vowing them.

Obj. 3. Further, Augustine says (De Adult. Conjug. i, 14):¹ "The services we render are more pleasing when we might lawfully not render them, yet do so out of love." Now it is lawful not to render a service which we have not vowed, whereas it is unlawful if we have vowed to render it. Therefore it seems that it is more pleasing to God to keep poverty, continence, and obedience without a vow. Therefore a vow is not requisite for religious perfection.

On the contrary, In the Old Law the Nazareans were consecrated by vow according to Num. 6. 2. When a man or woman shall make a vow to be sanctified and will consecrate themselves to the Lord, etc. Now these were a figure of those who attain the summit of perfection, as Gregory says (Moral. ii, 52).² Therefore a vow is requisite for religious perfection.

I answer that, It pertains to religious to be in the state of perfection, as shown above (Q. CLXXXIV, A. 5). Now the state of perfection requires an obligation to whatever belongs to perfection, and this obligation consists in binding oneself to God by means of a vow. But it is evident from what has been said (AA. 3. 4, 5) that poverty, continence, and obedience belong to the perfection of the Christian life. Consequently the religious state requires that one be bound to these three by vow. Hence Gregory says (Hom. viii in Ezech.):³ "When a man vows to almighty God all his possessions, all his life, all his knowledge, it is a holocaust"; and afterwards he says that this refers to those who renounce the present world.

Reply Obj. 1. Our Lord declared that it belongs to the perfection of life that a man follow Him, not anyhow, but in such a way as not to turn back. Therefore He says again (Luke 9. 62): No man putting his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God. And though some of His disciples went back, yet when our Lord asked (John 6. 68, 69), Will you also go away? Peter answered for the others: Lord, to whom shall we go? Hence Augustine says (De Consensu Ev. ii, 17)⁴ that "as Matthew and Mark relate, Peter and Andrew followed Him after drawing their boats on to the beach, not as though they purposed to return, but as following Him at His command" Now this unwavering following of Christ is made fast by a vow, and therefore a vow is requisite for religious perfection.

Reply Obj. 2. As Gregory says (loc. cit.) religious perfection requires that a man give God whatever he has vowed. But a man cannot actually give God his whole life, because that life taken as a whole is not simultaneous but successive. Hence a man cannot give his whole life to God otherwise than by the obligation of a vow.

Reply Obj. 3. Among other services that we can lawfully give, is our own liberty, which is dearer to man than anything else. Consequently when a man of his own accord deprives himself by vow of the liberty of abstaining from things pertaining to God's service, this is most acceptable to God. Hence Augustine says (Ep. cxxvi, ad Paulin. et Arment.):⁵ "Repent not of thy vow; rejoice rather that thou canst no longer do lawfully, what thou mightest have done lawfully but to thy own cost. Happy the necessity that compels to better things."

ARTICLE 7. Whether It Is Right To Say That Religious Perfection Consists in These Three Vows?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It seems that it is not right to say that religious perfection consists in these three vows.

Objection 1. For the perfection of life consists of inward rather than of outward acts, according to Rom. 14. 17, The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but justice and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. Now the religious vow binds a man to things belonging to perfection. Therefore vows of inward actions, such as contemplation, love of God and our neighbour, and so forth, should pertain to the religious state, rather than the vows of poverty, continence, and obedience which refer to outward actions.

Obj. 2. Further, The above three things come under the religious vow in so far as they belong to the practice of tending to perfection. But there are many other things that religious practise, such as abstinence, watchings, and the like. Therefore it would seem that these three vows are incorrectly described as pertaining to the state of perfection.

⁵ PL 33, 487.

Obj. 3. Further, By the vow of obedience a man is bound to do according to his superior's command whatever pertains to the practice of perfection. Therefore the vow of obedience suffices without the two other vows.

Obj. 4. Further, External goods comprise not only riches but also honours. Therefore, if religious, by the vow of poverty, renounce earthly riches, there should be another vow whereby they may despise worldly honours.

(On the contrary, It is stated (Extrav. de Statu Monach., cap. Cum ad monasterium)¹ that "the keeping of chastity and the renouncing of property are joined to the monastic rule."

I answer that, The religious state may be considered in three ways. First, as being a practice of tending to the perfection of charity; secondly, as quieting the human mind from outward solicitude, according to I Cor. 7. 32: I would have you to be without solicitude; thirdly, as a holocaust whereby a man offers himself and his possessions wholly to God. And in corresponding manner the religious state is constituted by these three vows.

First, as regards the practice of perfection, a man is required to remove from himself whatever may hinder his affections from tending wholly to God, for it is in this that the perfection of charity consists. Such hindrances are of three kinds. First, the attachment to external goods, which is removed by the vow of poverty; secondly, the concupiscence of sensible pleasures, chief among which are sexual pleasures, and these are removed by the vow of continence; thirdly, the want of order in the human will, and this is removed by the vow of obedience.

In like manner the disquiet of worldly solicitude is aroused in man in reference especially to three things. First, as regards the dispensing of external things, and this solicitude is removed from man by the vow of poverty; secondly, as regards the control of wife and children, which is cut away by the vow of continence; thirdly, as regards the disposal of one's own actions, which is eliminated by the vow of obedience, whereby a man commits himself to the disposal of another.

Again, a holocaust is the offering to God of all that one has, according to Gregory (Hom. viii in Ezech.)² Now man has a threefold good, according to the Philosopher.³ First, the good of external things, which he wholly offers to God by the vow of voluntary poverty; secondly, the good of his own body, and this good he offers to God especially by the vow of continence, whereby he renounces the greatest bodily pleasures; the third is the good of the soul, which man wholly offers to God by the vow of obedience, whereby he offers God his own will by which he makes use of all the powers and habits of the soul.

Therefore the religious state is fittingly constituted by the three vows.

Reply Obj. 1. As stated above (AA. 1, 2), the end to which the religious vow is directed is the perfection of charity, since all the interior acts of virtue belong to charity as to their mother, according to I Cor. 13. 4, Charity is patient, is kind, etc. Hence the interior acts of virtue, for instance humility, patience, and so forth, do not come under the religious vow, but this is directed to them as its end.

Reply Obj. 2. All other religious observances are directed to the above three principal vows; for if any of them are instituted for the purpose of procuring a livelihood, such as labour, begging, and so on, they are to be referred to poverty, for the safeguarding of which religious seek a livelihood by these means. Other observances whereby the body is chastised, such as watching, fasting, and the like, are directly ordered to the observance of the vow of continence. And such religious observances as regard human actions whereby a man is directed to the end of religion, namely the love of God and his neighbour (such as reading, prayer, visiting the sick, and the like), are comprised under the vow of obedience that applies to the will, which directs its actions to the end according to the ordering of another person. The distinction of habit belongs to all three vows, as a sign of being bound by them. Hence the religious habit is given or blessed at the time of profession.

Reply Obj. 3. By obedience a man offers to God his will, to which though all human affairs are subject, yet some are subject to it alone in a special manner, namely human actions, since passions belong also to the sensitive appetite. Therefore in order to restrain the passions of carnal pleasures and of external objects of appetite, which hinder the perfection of life, there was need for the vows of continence and poverty; but for the ordering of one's own actions according as the state of perfection requires, there was need for the vow of obedience.

³ Ethics, I, 8 (1098^b12).

Reply Obj. 4. As the Philosopher says,¹ strictly and truly speaking honour is not due save to virtue. Since, however, external goods serve instrumentally for certain acts of virtue, the consequence is that a certain honour is given to their excellence especially by the common people who acknowledge none but outward excellence. Therefore since religious tend to the perfection of virtue it becomes them not to renounce the honour which is given to God and all the saints on account of virtue, according to Ps. 138. 17, But to me thy friends, O God, are made exceedingly honourable. On the other hand, they renounce the honour that is given to outward excellence by the very fact that they withdraw from a worldly life. Hence no special vow is needed for this.

ARTICLE 8. Whether the Vow of Obedience Is the Chief of the Three Religious Vows?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It seems that the vow of obedience is not the chief of the three religious vows.

Objection 1. For the perfection of the religious life was inaugurated by Christ. Now Christ gave a special counsel of poverty, but He is not stated to have given a special counsel of obedience. Therefore the vow of poverty is greater than the vow of obedience.

Obj. 2. Further, It is written (Ecclus. 26. 20) that no price is worthy of a continent soul. Now the vow of that which is more worthy is itself more excellent. Therefore the vow of continence is more excellent than the vow of obedience.

Obj. 3. Further, The greater a vow the more indispensable it would seem to be. Now the vows of poverty and continence are so inseparable from the monastic rule that not even the Sovereign Pontiff can allow them to be broken, according to a Decretal (De Statu Monach., cap. Cum ad monasterium);² yet he can dispense a religious from obeying his superior. Therefore it would seem that the vow of obedience is less than the vow of poverty and continence.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Moral. xxxv. 45):³ Obedience is rightly placed before victims, since by victims another's flesh, but by obedience one's own will, is sacrificed." Now the religious vows are holocausts, as stated above (AA. 1, 7). Therefore the vow of obedience is the chief of all religious vows.

I answer that, The vow of obedience is the chief of the three religious vows, and this for three reasons.

First, because by the vow of obedience man offers God something greater, namely his own will; for this is of more account than his own body, which he offers God by continence, and than external things, which he offers God by the vow of poverty. Therefore that which is done out of obedience is more acceptable to God than that which is done of one's own will, according to the saying of Jerome to the monk Rusticus:⁴ "My words are intended to teach you not to rely on your own judgment"; and a little further on he says: "You may not do what you will; you must eat what you are bidden to eat, you may possess as much as you receive, clothe yourself with what is given to you." Hence fasting is not acceptable to God if it is done of one's own will, according to Isa. 58. 3, Behold in the day of your fast your own will is found.

Secondly, because the vow of obedience includes the other vows, but not vice versa; for a religious, though bound by vow to observe continence and poverty, yet these also come under obedience, as well as many other things besides the keeping of continence and poverty.

Thirdly, because the vow of obedience extends properly to those acts that are closely connected with the end of religion; and the more closely a thing is connected with the end, the better it is.

It follows from this that the vow of obedience is more essential to the religious life. For if a man without taking a vow of obedience were to observe, even by vow, voluntary poverty and continence, he would not therefore belong to the religious state, which is to be preferred to virginity observed even by vow; for Augustine says (De Virgin. xlv):⁵ "No one, I think would dare to prefer virginity to the monastic life."

Reply Obj. 1. The counsel of obedience was included in the very following of Christ, since to obey is to follow another's will. Consequently it is more pertinent to perfection than the vow of poverty, because as Jerome, commenting on Matt. 19. 27, Behold we have left all things, observes,⁶ "Peter added that which is perfect when he said: And have followed Thee."

Reply Obj. 2. The words quoted mean that continence is to be preferred not to all other acts of virtue, but to conjugal chastity, or to external riches of gold and silver which are measured by weight.¹ Or again continence is taken in a general sense for abstinence from all evil, as stated above (Q. CLV, A. 4, reply 1).

Reply Obj. 3. The Pope cannot dispense a religious from his vow of obedience so as to release him from obedience to every superior in matters relating to the perfection of life, for he cannot exempt him from obedience to himself. He can, however, exempt him from subjection to a lower superior, but this is not to dispense him from his vow of obedience.

ARTICLE 9. Whether a Religious Sins Mortally Whenever He Transgresses the Things Contained in His Rule?

We proceed thus to the Tenth Article: It seems that a religious sins mortally whenever he transgresses the things contained in his rule.

Objection 1. For to break a vow is a sin worthy of condemnation, as appears from I Tim. 5. 11, 12, where the Apostle says that widows who will marry again (Vulg.—having) damnation, because they have made void their first faith. But religious are bound to a rule by the vows of their profession. Therefore they sin mortally by transgressing the things contained in their rule.

Obj. 2. Further, The rule is enjoined upon a religious in the same way as a law. Now he who transgresses a precept of law sins mortally. Therefore it would seem that a monk sins mortally if he transgress the things contained in his rule.

Obj. 3. Further, Contempt involves a mortal sin. Now whoever repeatedly does what he ought not to do seems to sin from contempt. Therefore it would seem that a religious sins mortally by frequently transgressing the things contained in his rule.

On the contrary, The religious state is safer than the secular state; hence Gregory (Ep. ad Leand. Episc., cap. i.)² compares the secular life to the stormy sea, and the religious life to the calm port. But if every transgression of the things contained in his rule were to involve a religious in mortal sin, the religious life would be fraught with danger on account of its multitude of observances. Therefore not every transgression of the things contained in the rule is a mortal sin.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 2; A. 7, reply 1 and 2), a thing is contained in the rule in two ways. First, as the end of the rule, for instance things that pertain to the acts of the virtues; and the transgression of these, as regards those which come under a common precept, involves a mortal sin. But as regards those which go beyond the common obligation of a precept, their transgression does not involve a mortal sin, except by reason of contempt, because, as stated above (A. 2), a religious is not bound to be perfect, but to tend to perfection, to which the contempt of perfection is opposed. Secondly, a thing is contained in the rule through pertaining to the outward practice, such as all external observances, to some of which a religious is bound by the vow of his profession. Now the vow of profession regards chiefly the three things mentioned before, namely poverty, continence, and obedience, and all others are directed to these. Consequently the transgression of these three involves a mortal sin, while the transgression of the others does not involve a mortal sin, except either by reason of contempt of the rule (since this is directly contrary to the profession whereby a man vows to live according to the rule), or by reason of a precept, whether given orally by a superior, or expressed in the rule, since this would be to act contrary to the vow of obedience.

Reply Obj. 1. He who professes a rule does not vow to observe all the things contained in the rule, but he vows the regular life which consists essentially in the three previously mentioned things. Hence in certain religious orders precaution is taken to profess, not the rule, but to live according to the rule, that is to tend to form one's conduct in accordance with the rule as a kind of model; and this is set aside by contempt. Yet greater precaution is observed in some religious orders by professing obedience according to the rule, so that only that which is contrary to a precept of the rule is contrary to the profession, while the transgression or omission of other things binds only under pain of venial sin, because, as stated above (A. 7, reply 2), such things are disposition to the chief vows. And venial sin is a disposition to mortal, as stated above (Part I-II Q. LXXXVIII, A. 3), since it hinders those things whereby a man is disposed to keep the chief precepts of Christ's law, namely the precepts of charity.

There is also a religious order, that of the Friars Preachers, where such transgressions or omissions do not, by their very nature, involve sin, either mortal or venial; but they bind one to suffer punishment attached to them, because it is in this way that they are bound to observe such things. Nevertheless they may sin venially or mortally through neglect, concupiscence, or contempt.

Reply Obj. 2. Not all the contents of the law are set forth by way of precept, for some are expressed under the form of ordinance or statute binding under pain of a fixed punishment. Accordingly, just as in the civil law the transgression of a legal statute does not always render a man deserving of bodily death, so neither in the law of the Church does every ordinance or public statute bind under mortal sin. And the same applies to the statutes of the rule.

Reply Obj. 3. An action or transgression proceeds from contempt when a man's will refuses to submit to the ordinance of the law or rule, and from this he proceeds to act against the law or rule. On the other hand, he does not sin from contempt, but from some other cause, when he is led to do something against the ordinance of the law or rule through some particular cause such as concupiscence or anger, even though he often repeat the same kind of sin through the same or some other cause. Thus Augustine says (De Nat. et Grat. xxix)¹ that not all sins are committed through proud contempt. Nevertheless the frequent repetition of a sin leads to contempt by way of disposition, according to the words of Prov. 18. 3, The wicked man, when he is come into the depth of sins, contemneth.

ARTICLE 10. Whether a Religious Sins More Grievously Than a Secular by the Same Kind of Sin?

We proceed thus to the Tenth Article: It would seem that a religious does not sin more grievously than a secular by the same kind of sin.

Objection 1. For it is written (2 Paralip. 30. 18, 19): The Lord Who is good will show mercy to all them who with their whole heart seek the Lord the God of their fathers, and will not impute it to them that they are not sanctified. Now religious apparently follow the Lord the God of their fathers with their whole heart rather than seculars, who partly give themselves and their possessions to God and reserve part for themselves, as Gregory says (Hom. viii in Ezech.).² Therefore it would seem that it is less imputed to them if they fall short somewhat of their sanctification.

Obj. 2. Further, God is less angered at a man's sins if he does some good deeds, according to 2 Paralip. 19. 2, 3, Thou helpest the ungodly, and thou art joined in friendship with them that hate the Lord, and therefore thou didst deserve indeed the wrath of the Lord: but good works are found in thee. Now religious do more good works than seculars. Therefore if they commit any sins, God is less angry with them.

Obj. 3. Further, This present life is not carried through without sin, according to Jas. 3. 2, In many things we all offend. Therefore if the sins of religious were more grievous than those of seculars it would follow that religious are worse off than seculars, and consequently it would not be a wholesome counsel to enter religion.

On the contrary, The greater the evil the more it would seem to be deplored. But the sins of those who are in the state of holiness and perfection seem to be the most deplorable, for it is written (Jer. 23. 9): My heart is broken within me, and afterwards (verse 9): For the prophet and the priest are defiled; and in My house I have found their wickedness. Therefore religious and others who are in the state of perfection, other things being equal, sin more grievously.

I answer that, A sin committed by a religious may be in three ways more grievous than a like sin committed by a secular. First, if it be against his religious vow; for instance if he be guilty of fornication or theft, because by fornication he acts against the vow of continence, and by theft against the vow of poverty, and not merely against a precept of the divine law. Secondly, if he sin out of contempt, because thereby he would seem to be the more ungrateful for the divine favours which have raised him to the state of perfection. Thus the Apostle says (Heb. 10. 29) that the believer deserveth worse punishments who through contempt tramples under foot the Son of God. Hence the Lord complains (Jer. 21. 15): What is the meaning that My beloved hath wrought much wickedness in My house? Thirdly, the sin of a religious may be greater on account of scandal, because many take note of his manner of life. Hence it is written (Jer. 23. 14): I have seen the likeness of adulterers, and the way of lying in the Prophets of Jerusalem; and they strengthened the hands of the wicked, that no man should return from his evil doings.

On the other hand, if a religious, not out of contempt, but out of weakness or ignorance, commit a sin that is not against the vow of his profession, without giving scandal (for instance if he commit it in secret) he sins less grievously in the same kind of sin than a secular, because his sin if slight is absorbed as it were by his many good works, and if it be mortal, he more easily recovers from it. First, because he has a right intention towards God, and though it be intercepted for the moment, it is easily restored to its former state. Hence Origen commenting on Ps. 36. 24, When he shall fall he shall not be bruised, says (Hom. iv in Ps. 36):¹ "The wicked man, if he sin, repents not, and fails to make amends for his sin. But the just man knows how to make amends and recover himself; even as he who had said: 'I know not the man,' shortly afterwards when the Lord had looked on him, knew to shed most bitter tears, and he who from the roof had seen a woman and desired her knew to say: 'I have sinned and done evil before Thee.'² Secondly, he is assisted by his fellow-religious to rise again, according to Eccles. 4. 10. If one fall he shall be supported by the other: woe to him that is alone, for when he falleth he hath none to lift him up.

Reply Obj. 1. The words quoted refer to things done through weakness or ignorance, but not to those that are done out of contempt.

Reply Obj. 2. Josaphat also, to whom these words were addressed, sinned not out of contempt, but out of a certain weakness of human affection.

Reply Obj. 3. The just sin not easily out of contempt; but sometimes they fall into a sin through ignorance or weakness from which they easily arise. If, however, they go so far as to sin out of contempt, they become most wicked and incorrigible, according to the word of Jeremias (2. 20) Thou hast broken My yoke, thou hast burst My bands, and thou hast said: 'I will not serve.' For on every high hill, and under every green tree thou didst prostitute thyself. Hence Augustine says (Ep. lxxviii, ad Pleb. Hippon.):³ "From the time I began to serve God, even as I scarcely found better men than those who made progress in monasteries, so have I not found worse than those who in the monastery have fallen."

QUESTION CLXXXVII OF THOSE THINGS THAT ARE APPROPRIATE TO RELIGIOUS (In Six Articles)

WE must now consider the things that are appropriate to religious; and under this head there are six points of inquiry: (1) Whether it is lawful for them to teach, preach, and do like things? (2) Whether it is lawful for them to meddle in secular business? (3) Whether they are bound to manual labour? (4) Whether it is lawful for them to live on alms? (5) Whether it is lawful for them to beg? (6) Whether it is lawful for them to wear coarser clothes than other persons?

ARTICLE 1. Whether It Is Lawful for Religious to Teach, Preach, and the Like?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem unlawful for religious to teach, preach, and the like.

Objection 1. For it is said (VII. Q. 1, cap. Hoc nequaquam)⁴ in an ordinance of a synod of Constantinople:⁵ "The monastic life is one of subjection and discipleship, not of teaching, authority, or pastoral care." And Jerome says to Riparius and Desiderius (Contra Vigilant. vi):⁶ "A monk's duty is not to teach but to lament." Again Pope Leo says (Ep. cxx, ad Theodoret, cf. xvi, Q. 1, cap. Adjicimus):⁷ "Let none dare to preach save the priests of the Lord, be he monk or layman, and no matter what knowledge he may boast of having." Now it is not lawful to exceed the bounds of one's office or transgress the ordinance of the Church. Therefore it seems that it is unlawful for religious to teach, preach, and the like.

Obj. 2. Further, in an ordinance of the Council of Nicea (cf. XVI. Q. 1, cap. Placuit)⁸ it is laid down as follows: "It is our absolute and peremptory command addressed to all, that monks shall not hear confessions except of one another, as is right, that they shall not bury the dead except those dwelling with them in the monastery, or if by chance a brother happen to die while on a visit." But just as the above belong to the duty of clerics, so also do preaching and teaching. Therefore since "the business of a monk differs from that of a cleric," as Jerome says (Ep. i, ad Heliod.),¹ it would seem unlawful for religious to preach, teach, and the like.

Obj. 3. Further, Gregory says (Regist. v):² "No man can fulfil ecclesiastical duties and keep consistently to the monastic rule," and this is quoted xvi, q. 1, cap. 2.³ Now monks are bound to keep consistently to the monastic rule. Therefore it would seem that they cannot fulfil ecclesiastical duties, of which teaching and preaching are a part. Therefore apparently it is unlawful for them to preach, teach, and do similar things.

On the contrary, Gregory is quoted (xvi, q. 1, cap. 24)⁴ as saying: "By authority of this decree framed in virtue of our apostolic power and the duty of our office, be it lawful to monk priests who represent the apostles, to preach, baptize, give communion, pray for sinners, impose penance, and absolve from sin."

I answer that, A thing is declared to be unlawful to a person in two ways. First, because there is something in him contrary to that which is declared unlawful to him; thus to no man is it lawful to sin, because each man has in himself reason and an obligation to God's law, to which things sin is contrary. And in this way it is said to be unlawful for a person to preach, teach, or do like things, because there is in him something incompatible with these things, either by reason of a precept,—thus those who are irregular by ordinance of the Church may not be raised to the sacred orders—or by reason of sin, according to Ps. 49. 16, But to the sinner God hath said: Why dost thou declare My justice?

In this way it is not unlawful for religious to preach, teach, and do like things, both because they are bound neither by vow nor by precept of their rule to abstain from these things, and because they are not rendered less apt for these things by any sin committed, but on the contrary they are the more apt through having taken upon themselves the practice of holiness.

For it is foolish to say that a man is rendered less fit for spiritual duties through advancing himself in holiness; and consequently it is a foolish opinion of those who declare that the religious state is an obstacle to the fulfilment of such duties.⁵ The opinion of these persons is confuted by Pope Boniface IV. by the reasons given above.⁶ His words which are quoted (xvi, q. 1, cap. 25)⁷ are these: "There are some who without any dogmatic proof, and with extreme daring, inspired with a zeal rather of bitterness than of love, assert that monks though they be dead to the world and live to God, are unworthy of the power of the priestly office, and that they cannot confer penance, nor christen, nor absolve in virtue of the power divinely bestowed on them in the priestly office. But they are altogether deceived." He proves this first because it is not contrary to the rule; thus he continues: "For neither did the Blessed Benedict the saintly teacher of monks forbid this in any way," nor is it forbidden in other rules. Secondly, he refutes the above error from the usefulness of the monks, when he adds at the end of the same chapter: "The more perfect a man is, the more effective is he in these," namely in spiritual works.

Secondly, a thing is said to be unlawful for a man not on account of there being in him something contrary thereto, but because he lacks that which enables him to do it; thus it is unlawful for a deacon to say mass, because he is not in priestly orders, and it is unlawful for a priest to deliver judgment because he lacks the episcopal authority. Here, however, a distinction must be made. Because those things which are a matter of an order cannot be deputed to one who has not the order, while matters of jurisdiction can be deputed to those who have not ordinary jurisdiction; thus the delivery of a judgment is deputed by the bishop to a simple priest.

In this sense it is said to be unlawful for monks and other religious to preach, teach, and so forth, because the religious state does not give them the power to do these things. They can, however, do them if they receive orders, or ordinary jurisdiction, or if matters of jurisdiction be delegated to them.

⁵ St. Thomas seems to have in mind the adversaries of the Mendicant Orders, especially William of St. Amour (De Periculis Novissimorum Temporum) and Gerard of Abbeville (Quod., xlv, a. 1, 1269). Against the former St. Thomas wrote opusculum xix, Contra Impugnantes, and against the latter opusculum xviii, De Perf. Vitae Spir., Nicholas of Lisieux replied against Thomas with the work De Perf. Status Cleric., in Collectione xxiii Errorum. See Glorieux, Mil. Mandonnet (1, 51); RTAM (1934) p. 5; RTAM (1935) p. 129.

⁶ Boniface IV. See Richter and Friedberg, Decretum Magistri Gratiani, pt. II, causa xvi, q. 1, n. 166 (1, 767).

⁴ Gratian, Decretum, pt. II (RF 1, 767). Cf. Conc. Ne-mausensi, anno 1096, can. 3 (MA xx, 935).

Reply Obj. 1. It results from the words quoted that the fact of their being monks does not give monks the power to do these things, yet it does not involve in them anything contrary to the performance of these acts.

Reply Obj. 2. Again, this ordinance of the Council of Nicea forbids monks to claim the power of exercising those acts on the ground of their being monks, but it does not forbid those acts being delegated to them.

Reply Obj. 3. These two things are incompatible, namely, the ordinary cure of ecclesiastical duties, and the observance of the monastic rule in a monastery. But this does not prevent monks and other religious from being sometimes occupied with ecclesiastical duties through being deputed to them by superiors having ordinary cure, especially members of religious orders that are especially instituted for that purpose, as we shall say further on (Q. CLXXXVIII., A. 4).

ARTICLE 2. Whether It Is Lawful for Religious to Occupy Themselves With Secular Business?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem unlawful for religious to occupy themselves with secular business.

Objection 1. For in the above mentioned decree of Pope Boniface IV it is said (XVI, Q. 1, cap. Sunt nonnulli)¹ that "the Blessed Benedict bade them to be altogether free from secular business; and this is most explicitly prescribed by the apostolic doctrine and the teaching of all the Fathers, not only to religious, but also to all the canonical clergy," according to II Tim. 2. 4. No man being a soldier to God, entangleth himself with secular business. Now it is the duty of all religious to be soldiers to God. Therefore it is unlawful for them to occupy themselves with secular business.

Obj. 2. Further, The Apostle says (I Thess. 4. 11): That you use your endeavour to be quiet, and that you do your own business, which a gloss² explains thus,—“by refraining from other people’s affairs, so as to be the better able to attend to the amendment of your own life.” Now religious devote themselves in a special way to the amendment of their life. Therefore they should not occupy themselves with secular business.

Obj. 3. Further, Jerome, commenting on

Matt. 11. 8, Behold they that are clothed in soft garments are in the houses of kings, says: “Hence we gather that an austere life and severe preaching should avoid the palaces of kings and the mansions of the voluptuous.”³ But the needs of secular business induce men to frequent the palaces of kings. Therefore it is unlawful for religious to occupy themselves with secular business.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (Rom. 16. 1): I commend to you Phœbe our sister, and further on (verse 2), that you assist her in whatsoever business she shall have need of you.

I answer that, As stated above (Q. CLXXXVI, AA. 1, 7), the religious state is directed to the attainment of the perfection of charity, consisting principally in the love of God and secondarily in the love of our neighbour. Consequently that which religious intend chiefly and for its own sake is to give themselves to God. Yet if their neighbour be in need, they should attend to his affairs out of charity, according to Gal. 6. 2, Bear ye one another’s burdens: and so you shall fulfil the law of Christ, since through serving their neighbour for God’s sake, they are obedient to the divine love. Hence it is written (Jas. 1. 27): Religion clean and undefiled before God and the Father, is this: to visit the fatherless and widows in their tribulation, which means, according to a gloss,⁴ “to assist the helpless in their time of need.” We must conclude therefore that it is unlawful for both monks and clerics to carry on secular business from motives of avarice; but from motives of charity, and with their superior’s permission, they may occupy themselves with due moderation in the administration and direction of secular business. Hence it is said in the Decretals (Dist. lxxxviii, cap. 1):⁵ “The holy synod decrees that henceforth no cleric shall buy property or occupy himself with secular business, save with a view to the care of the fatherless, orphans, or widows, or when the bishop of the city commands him to take charge of the business connected with the Church.” And the same applies to religious as to clerics, because they are both debarred from secular business on the same grounds, as stated in the Article.

Reply Obj. 1. Monks are forbidden to occupy themselves with secular business from motives of avarice, but not from motives of charity.

Reply Obj. 2. To occupy oneself with secular business on account of another's need is not officiousness but charity.

Reply Obj. 3. To haunt the palaces of kings from motives of pleasure, glory, or avarice is not appropriate to religious, but there is nothing unseemly in their visiting them from motives of piety. Hence it is written (IV Kings 4. 13): Hast thou any business, and wilt thou that I speak to the king or to the general of the army? Likewise it is fitting for religious to go to the palaces of kings to rebuke and guide them, even as John the Baptist rebuked Herod, as related in Matt. 14. 4.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Religious Are Bound to Manual Labour?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that religious are bound to manual labor.

Objection 1. For religious are not exempt from the observance of precepts. Now manual labour is a matter of precept according to I Thess. 4. 11, Work with your own hands as we commanded you. Hence Augustine says (De Oper. Monach. 30):¹ "But who can allow these insolent men," namely religious that do no work, of whom he is speaking there, "who disregard the most salutary admonishment of the Apostle, not merely to be borne with as being weaker than others, but even to preach as though they were holier than others." Therefore it would seem that religious are bound to manual labour.

Obj. 2. Further A gloss² on II Thess. 3. 10, If any man will not work, neither let him eat, says: "Some say that this command of the Apostle refers to spiritual works, and not to the bodily labour of the farmer or craftsman"; and further on: "But it is useless for them to try to hide from themselves and from others the fact that they are unwilling not only to fulfil, but even to understand the useful admonishments of charity"; and again further on: "He wishes God's servants to employ themselves in corporal works that they may gain a livelihood." Now religious especially are called servants of God, because they give themselves entirely to the service of God, as Dionysius asserts (Eccl. Hier. vi).³ Therefore it would seem that they are bound to manual labour.

Obj. 3. Further, Augustine says (De Oper. Monach. 17):⁴ "I would like to know how they would occupy themselves, who are unwilling to work with their body. We occupy our time, say they, with prayers, psalms, reading, and the word of God." Yet these things are no excuse, and he proves this, as regards each in particular. For in the first place, as to prayer, he says: "One prayer of the obedient man is sooner granted than ten thousand prayers of the contemptuous," meaning that those are contemptuous and unworthy to be heard who work not with their hands. Secondly, as to the divine praises he adds: "Even while working with their hands they can easily sing hymns to God." Thirdly, with regard to reading, he goes on to say: "Those who say they are occupied in reading, do they not find there what the Apostle commanded? What sort of perverseness is this, to wish to read but not to obey what one reads?" Fourthly, he adds in reference to preaching (chap. 18): "If one has to speak, and is so busy that he cannot spare time for manual work, can all in the monastery do this? And since all cannot do this, why should all make this a pretext for being exempt? And even if all were able, they should do so by turns, not only so that the others may be occupied in other works, but also because it suffices that one speak while many listen." Therefore it would seem that religious should not desist from manual labour on account of spiritual works of this kind to which they devote themselves.

Obj. 4. Further, A gloss⁵ on Luke 12. 33, Sell what you possess, says: "Not only give your clothes to the poor, but sell what you possess, that having once for all renounced all your possessions for the Lord's sake, you may henceforth work with the labour of your hands, so as to have wherewith to live or to give alms." Now it belongs properly to religious to renounce all they have. Therefore it would seem likewise to belong to them to live and give alms through the labour of their hands.

Obj. 5. Further, Religious especially would seem to be bound to imitate the life of the apostles, since they profess the state of perfection. Now the apostles worked with their own hands, according to I Cor. 4. 12: We labour, working with our own hands. Therefore it would seem that religious are bound to manual labour.

On the contrary, Those precepts that are commonly enjoined upon all are equally binding on religious and seculars. But the precept of manual labour is enjoined upon all in common, as appears from II Thess. 3. 6, Withdraw yourselves from every brother walking disorderly, etc. (for by brother he signifies every Christian, according to I Cor. 7. 12, If any brother have a wife that believeth not). Now it is written in the same passage (II Thess. 3. 10): If any man will not work, neither let him eat. Therefore religious are not bound to manual labour any more than seculars are.

I answer that, Manual labour is directed to four things. First and principally to obtain food; hence it was said to the first man (Gen. 3. 19): In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, and it is written (Ps. 132. 2): For thou shalt eat the labours of thy hands. Secondly, it is directed to the removal of idleness from which arise many evils; hence it is written (Ecclus. 33. 28, 29): Send thy slave to work, that he be not idle, for idleness hath taught much evil. Thirdly, it is directed to the curbing of concupiscence, in so far as it is a means of afflicting the body; hence it is written (II Cor. 6. 5, 6): In labours, in watchings, in fastings, in chastity. Fourthly, it is directed to almsgiving, and so it is written (Eph. 4. 28): He that stole, let him now steal no more; but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may have something to give to him that suffereth need.

Accordingly, in so far as manual labour is directed to obtaining food, it comes under a necessity of precept in so far as it is necessary for that end, since that which is directed to an end derives its necessity from that end, being, in effect, so far necessary as the end cannot be obtained without it. Consequently he who has no other means of livelihood is bound to work with his hands, whatever his condition may be. This is signified by the words of the Apostle: If any man will not work, neither let him eat, as though to say: "The necessity of manual labour is the necessity of meat." So that if one could live without eating, one would not be bound to work with one's hands. The same applies to those who have no other lawful means of livelihood, since a man is understood to be unable to do what he cannot do lawfully. Therefore we find that the Apostle prescribed manual labour merely as a remedy for the sin of those who gained their livelihood by unlawful means. For the Apostle ordered manual labour first of all in order to avoid theft, as appears from Eph. 4. 28, He that stole, let him now steal no more; but rather let him labour, working with his hands. Secondly, to avoid the coveting of others' property, so that it is written (I Thess. 4. 11): Work with your own hands, as we commanded you, and that you walk hon- estly towards them that are without. Thirdly, to avoid the discreditable pursuits whereby some seek a livelihood. Hence he says (II Thess. 3. 10-12): When we were with you, this we declared to you: If any man will not work, neither let him eat. For we have heard that there are some among you who walk disorderly, working not at all, but curiously meddling (namely, as a gloss explains it,¹ "who make a living by meddling in unlawful things"). Now we charge them that are such, and beseech them . . . that working with silence, they would eat their own bread. Hence Jerome states in the preface to the second book of his commentary on the epistle to the Galatians² that the Apostle said this "not so much in his capacity of teacher as on account of the faults of the people."

It must, however, be observed that under manual labour are comprised all those human occupations whereby man can lawfully gain a livelihood, whether by using his hands, his feet, or his tongue. For watchmen, couriers, and the like who live by their labour, are understood to live by their handiwork, because, since the hand is the organ of organs, handiwork denotes all kinds of work by which a man may lawfully gain a livelihood.

In so far as manual labour is directed to the removal of idleness, or the affliction of the body, it does not come under a necessity of precept if we consider it in itself, since there are many other means besides manual labour of afflicting the body or of removing idleness, for the flesh is afflicted by fastings and watchings, and idleness is removed by meditation on the holy scriptures and by the divine praises. Hence a gloss³ on Ps. 118. 82, My eyes have failed for Thy word, says: "He is not idle who meditates on God's word; nor is he who works abroad any better than he who devotes himself to the study of knowing the truth." Consequently for these reasons religious are not bound to manual labour, as neither are seculars, except when they are so bound by the statutes of their order. Thus Jerome says (Ep. iv, ad Rustic. Monach.):⁴ "The Egyptian monasteries are accustomed to admit none unless they work or labour, not so much for the necessities of life, as for the welfare of the soul, lest it be led astray by wicked thoughts."

⁴ Epist., cxxv (PL 22, 1070); cf. Gratian, Decretum, pt. iii, d. v, can. 34 (RF 1, 1421).

But in so far as manual labour is directed to almsgiving, it does not come under the necessity of precept, save perhaps in some particular case, when a man is under an obligation to give alms, and has no other means of having the wherewithal to assist the poor: for in such a case religious would be bound as well as seculars to do manual labour.

Reply Obj. 1. This command of the Apostle is of natural law. Hence a gloss¹ on II Thess. 3. 6, That you withdraw yourselves from every brother walking disorderly, says, "otherwise than the natural order requires," and he is speaking of those who abstained from manual labour. Hence nature has provided man with hands instead of arms and clothes with which she has provided other animals, in order that with his hands he may obtain these and other necessities. From this it is clear that this precept, even as all the precepts of the natural law, is binding on both religious and seculars alike. Yet not everyone sins that works not with his hands, because those precepts of the natural law which regard the good of the many are not binding on each individual, but it suffices that one person apply himself to this business and another to that; for instance, that some be craftsmen, others husbandmen, others judges, and others teachers, and so forth, according to the words of the Apostle (I Cor. 12. 17), If the whole body were the eye, where would be the hearing? If the whole were the hearing, where would be the smelling?

Reply Obj. 2. This gloss is taken from Augustine's book, De Operibus Monachorum,² where he speaks against certain monks who declared it to be unlawful for the servants of God to work with their hands, on account of our Lord's saying (Matt. 6. 25): Be not solicitous for your life, what you shall eat. Nevertheless his words do not imply that religious are bound to work with their hands, if they have other means of livelihood. This is clear from his adding: "He wishes the servants of God to work with their bodies for their livelihood."³ Now this does not apply to religious any more than to seculars, which is evident for two reasons. First, on account of the way in which the Apostle expresses himself, by saying: That you withdraw yourselves from every brother walking disorderly (II Thess. 3. 6). For he calls all Christians brothers, since at that time religious orders were not as yet founded.

Secondly, because religious have no other obligations than what seculars have, except as required by the rule they profess. Therefore if their rule contain nothing about manual labour, religious are not otherwise bound to manual labour than seculars are.

Reply Obj. 3. A man may devote himself in two ways to all the spiritual works mentioned by Augustine in the passage quoted: in one way with a view to the common good, in another with a view to his private advantage. Accordingly those who devote themselves publicly to these spiritual works are thereby exempt from manual labour for two reasons: first, because they are obliged to be occupied exclusively with such works; secondly, because those who devote themselves to such works have a claim to be supported by those for whose advantage they work.

On the other hand, those who devote themselves to such works not publicly but privately at it were, ought not on that account to be exempt from manual labour, nor have they a claim to be supported by the offerings of the faithful, and it is of these that Augustine is speaking. For when he says: "They can sing divine hymns even while working with their hands, like the craftsmen who give tongue to fable telling without withdrawing their hands from their work," it is clear that he cannot refer to those who sing the canonical hours in the church, but to those who tell psalms or hymns as private prayers. Likewise what he says of reading and prayer is to be referred to the private prayer and reading which even lay people do at times, and not to those who perform public prayers in the church, or give public lectures in the schools. Hence he does not say: "Those who say they are occupied in teaching and instructing," but: "Those who say they are occupied in reading." Again he speaks of that preaching which is addressed, not publicly to the people, but to one or a few in particular by way of private admonishment. Hence he says expressly: "If one has to speak." For according to a gloss on I Cor. 2. 4, "Speech is addressed privately, preaching to many."⁴

Reply Obj. 4. Those who despise all for God's sake are bound to work with their hands when they have no other means of livelihood, or of almsgiving (should the case occur where almsgiving were a matter of precept), but not otherwise, as stated in the Article. It is in this sense that the gloss quoted is to be understood.

Reply Obj. 5. That the apostles worked with their hands was sometimes a matter of necessity, sometimes a work of supererogation. It was of necessity when they failed to receive a livelihood from others. Hence a gloss¹ on I Cor. 4. 12, We labour, working with our own hands, adds "because no man giveth to us." It was of supererogation, as appears from I Cor. 9. 12, where the Apostle says that he did not use the power he had of living by the Gospel. The Apostle had recourse to this supererogation for three motives. First, in order to deprive the false apostles of the pretext for preaching, for they preached merely for a temporal advantage; hence he says (II Cor. 11. 12): But what I do, that I will do that I may cut off the occasion from them, etc. Secondly, in order to avoid burdening those to whom he preached; hence he says (II Cor. 12. 13): What is there that you have had less than the other churches, but that I myself was not burthensome to you? Thirdly, in order to give an example of work to the idle; hence he says (II Thess. 3. 8, 9): We worked night and day . . . that we might give ourselves a pattern unto you, to imitate us. However, the Apostle did not do this in those places like Athens where he had facilities for preaching daily, as Augustine observes (De Oper. Monach. 18).²

Yet religious are not for this reason bound to imitate the Apostle in this matter, since they are not bound to all works of supererogation. Hence neither did the other apostles work with their hands.

ARTICLE 4. Whether It Is Lawful for Religious to Live on Alms?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem unlawful for religious to live on alms.

Objection 1. For the Apostle (I Tim. 5. 16) forbids those widows who have other means of livelihood to live on the alms of the Church, so that the Church may have sufficient for them that are widows indeed. And Jerome says to Pope Damasus³ that "those who have sufficient income from their parents and their own possessions, if they take what belongs to the poor they commit and incur the guilt of sacrilege, and by the abuse of such things they eat and drink judgment to themselves." Now religious if they be able-bodied can support themselves by the work of their hands. Therefore it would seem that they sin if they consume the alms belonging to the poor.

Obj. 2. Further, To live at the expense of the faithful is the stipend appointed to those who preach the Gospel in payment of their labour or work, according to Matt. 10. 10: The workman is worthy of his meat. Now it pertains not to religious to preach the Gospel, but chiefly to prelates who are pastors and teachers. Therefore religious cannot lawfully live on the alms of the faithful.

Obj. 3. Further, Religious are in the state of perfection. But it is more perfect to give than to receive alms, for it is written (Acts 20. 35): It is a more blessed thing to give, rather than to receive. Therefore they should not live on alms, but rather should they give alms of their handiwork.

Obj. 4. Further, It pertains to religious to avoid obstacles to virtue and occasions of sin. Now the receiving of alms offers an occasion of sin, and hinders an act of virtue; hence a gloss⁴ on II Thess. 3. 9, That we might give ourselves a pattern unto you, says: "He who through idleness eats often at another's table, must flatter the one who feeds him" It is also written (Exod. 23. 8): Neither shalt thou take bribes which . . . blind the wise, and pervert the words of the just, and (Prov. 22. 7): The borrower is servant to him that lendeth. This is contrary to religion, and so a gloss⁵ on II Thess. 3. 9, That we might give ourselves a pattern, etc., says, "Our religion calls men to liberty." Therefore it would seem that religious should not live on alms.

Obj. 5. Further, Religious especially are bound to imitate the perfection of the apostles; hence the Apostle says (Phil. 3. 15): Let us . . . as many as are perfect, be thus minded. But the Apostle was unwilling to live at the expense of the faithful, either in order to cut off the occasion from the false apostles as he himself says (II Cor. 11. 12), or to avoid giving scandal to the weak, as appears from I Cor. 9. 12. It would seem therefore that religious ought for the same reasons to refrain from living on alms. Hence Augustine says (De Oper. Monach. 28):⁶ "Cut off the occasion of disgraceful marketing whereby you lower yourselves in the esteem of others, and give scandal to the weak; and show men that you seek not an easy livelihood in idleness, but the kingdom of God by the narrow and strait way."

On the contrary, Gregory says (Dial. ii, 1):¹ "The Blessed Benedict after leaving his home and parents dwelt for three years in a cave, and while there lived on the food brought to him by a monk of Rome." Nevertheless, although he was able-bodied, we do not read that he sought to live by the labour of his hands. Therefore religious may lawfully live on alms.

I answer that, A man may lawfully live on what is his or due to him. Now that which is given out of liberality becomes the property of the person to whom it is given. Therefore religious and clerics whose monasteries or churches have received from the munificence of princes or of any of the faithful any endowment whatsoever for their support, can lawfully live on such endowment without working with their hands, and yet without doubt they live on alms. Therefore in like manner if religious receive movable goods from the faithful they can lawfully live on them. For it is absurd to say that a person may accept an alms of some great property but not bread or some small sum of money. Nevertheless since these gifts would seem to be bestowed on religious in order that they may have more leisure for religious works, in which the donors of temporal goods wish to have a share, the use of such gifts would become unlawful for them if they abstained from religious works, because in that case, so far as they are concerned, they would be thwarting the intention of those who bestowed those gifts.

A thing is due to a person in two ways. First, on account of necessity, which makes all things common, as Ambrose asserts (cf. Serm. de Temp. lxiv).² Consequently if religious be in need they can lawfully live on alms. Such necessity may occur in three ways. First, through weakness of body, the result being that they are unable to make a living by working with their hands. Secondly, because that which they gain by their handiwork is insufficient for their livelihood; hence Augustine says (De Oper. Monach. 17)³ that "the good works of the faithful should not leave God's servants who work with their hands without a supply of necessities, that when the hour comes for them to nourish their souls, so as to make it impossible for them to do these corporal works, they be not oppressed by want." Thirdly, because of the former mode of life of those who were unaccustomed to work with their hands; hence Augustine says⁴ that "if they had in the world the wherewithal easily to support this life without working, and gave it to the needy when they were converted to God, we must believe their weakness and bear with it. For those who have thus been delicately brought up are wont to be unable to bear the toil of bodily labour."

In another way a thing becomes due to a person through his affording others something whether temporal or spiritual, according to I Cor. 9. 11, If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great matter if we reap your carnal things? And in this sense religious may live on alms as being due to them in four ways. First, if they preach by the authority of the prelates. Secondly, if they be ministers of the altar, according to I Cor. 9. 13, 14, They that serve the altar partake with the altar. So also the Lord ordained that they who preach the Gospel should live by the Gospel. Hence Augustine says (De Oper. Monach. 21):⁵ "If they are preachers of the gospel, I allow, they have a claim to live at the charge of the faithful; if they be ministers of the altar and dispensers of the sacraments, this claim is no pretence but theirs by perfect right." The reason for this is because the sacrifice of the altar wherever it be offered is common to all the faithful. Thirdly, if they devote themselves to the study of Holy Writ to the common profit of the whole Church. Therefore Jerome says (Contra Vigil. v).⁶ "It is still the custom in Judea, not only among us but also among the Hebrews, for those who meditate on the law of the Lord day and night, and have no other share on earth but God alone, to be supported by the subscriptions of the synagogues and of the whole world." Fourthly, if they have endowed the monastery with the goods they possessed, they may live on the alms given to the monastery. Hence Augustine says (De Oper. Monach. 25)⁷ that "those who renouncing or distributing their means, whether ample or of any amount whatever, have desired with pious and salutary humility to be numbered among the poor of Christ, have a claim on the community and on brotherly love to receive a livelihood in return. They are to be commended indeed if they work with their hands, but if they be unwilling, who will dare to force them? Nor does it matter," as he goes on to say, "to which monasteries, or in what place any one of them has bestowed his goods on his needy brethren; for all Christians belong to one commonwealth."

On the other hand, in the default of any necessity, or of their affording any profit to others, it is unlawful for religious to wish to live in idleness on the alms given to the poor. Hence Augustine says (De Oper. Monach 22):¹ "Sometimes those who enter the profession of God's service come from a servile condition of life, from tilling the soil or working at some trade or lowly occupation. In their case it is not so clear whether they came with the purpose of serving God, or of evading a life of want and toil with a view to being fed and clothed in idleness, and furthermore to being honoured by those by whom they were accustomed to be despised and downtrodden. Such persons surely cannot excuse themselves from work on the score of bodily weakness, for their former mode of life is evidence against them." And he adds further on (25):² "If they be unwilling to work, neither let them rest. For if the rich humble themselves to piety, it is not that the poor may be exalted to pride; since it is altogether unseemly that in a life wherein senators become labourers, labourers should become idle, and that where the lords of the manor have come after renouncing their ease, the serfs should live in comfort."

Reply Obj. 1. These authorities must be understood as referring to cases of necessity, that is to say, when there is no other means of succouring the poor, for then they would be bound not only to refrain from accepting alms, but also to give what they have for the support of the needy.

Reply Obj. 2. Prelates are able to preach in virtue of their office, but religious may be able to do so in virtue of delegation; and thus when they work in the field of the Lord, they may make their living thereby, according to II Tim. 2. 6, The husbandman that laboureth must first partake of the fruits, which a gloss explains thus, "that is to say, the preacher, who in the field of the Church tills the hearts of his hearers with the plough of God's word."³ Those also who minister to the preachers may live by the gospel. Hence a gloss on Rom. 15. 27, If the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, they ought also in carnal things to minister to them, says, "namely, to the Jews who sent preachers from Jerusalem."⁴ There are moreover other reasons for which a person has a claim to live at the charge of the faithful, as stated in the Article.

Reply Obj. 3. Other things being equal, it is more perfect to give than to receive. Nevertheless to give or to give up all one's possessions for Christ's sake, and to receive a little for one's livelihood is better than to give to the poor part by part, as stated above (Q. CLXXXVI, A. 3, reply 6).

Reply Obj. 4. To receive gifts so as to increase one's wealth, or to accept a livelihood from another without having a claim to it, and without profit to others or being in need oneself, affords an occasion of sin. But this does not apply to religious, as stated above in the Article.

Reply Obj. 5. Whenever there is evident necessity for religious living on alms without doing any manual work, as well as an evident profit to be derived by others, it is not the weak who are scandalized, but those who are full of malice like the Pharisees, whose scandal our Lord teaches us to despise (Matt. 15. 12-14). If, however, these motives of necessity and profit be lacking, the weak might possibly be scandalized thereby; and this should be avoided. Yet the same scandal might be occasioned through those who live in idleness on the common revenues.

ARTICLE 5. Whether It Is Lawful for Religious To Beg?

We proceed this to the Fifth Article: It seems unlawful for religious to beg.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (De Oper. Monach. 28):⁵ "The most cunning foe has scattered on all sides a great number of hypocrites wearing the monastic habit, who go wandering about the country," and afterwards he adds: "They all ask, they all demand to be supported in their profitable penury, or to be paid for a pretended holiness." Therefore it would seem that the life of mendicant religious is to be condemned.

Obj. 2. Further, It is written (I Thess. 4. 11): That you . . . work with your own hands as we commanded you, and that you walk honestly towards them that are without: and that you want nothing of any man's; and a gloss on this passage says: "You must work and not be idle, because work is both honourable and a light to the unbeliever; and you must not covet that which belongs to another, and much less beg or take anything."¹ Again a gloss on II Thess. 3. 10, If any man will not work, etc., says: "He wishes the servants of God to work with the body, so as to gain a livelihood, and not be compelled by want to ask for necessities."² Now this is to beg. Therefore it would seem unlawful to beg while omitting to work with one's hands.

Obj. 3. Further, That which is forbidden by law and contrary to justice, is unbecoming to religious. Now begging is forbidden in the divine law, for it is written (Deut. 15. 4): There shall be no poor nor beggar among you, and (Ps. 36. 25): I have not seen the just forsaken, nor his seed seeking bread. Moreover an able-bodied mendicant is punished by civil law, according to the law Of able-bodied mendicants.³ Therefore it is unfitting for religious to beg.

Obj. 4. Further, "Shame is about an uncomely action," as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. ii, 15).⁴ Now Ambrose says (De Offic. i, 30)⁵ that "to be ashamed to ask is a sign of good birth." Therefore it is disgraceful to beg, and consequently this is unbecoming to religious.

Obj. 5. Further, According to our Lord's command it is especially becoming to preachers of the Gospel to live on alms, as stated above (A. 4). Yet it is not becoming that they should beg, since a gloss on II Tim. 2. 6, The husbandman, that laboureth, etc., says:⁶ "The Apostle wishes the evangelist to understand that to accept necessities from those among whom he labours is not mendicancy but a right." Therefore it would seem unbecoming for religious to beg.

On the contrary, It becomes religious to live in imitation of Christ. Now Christ was a mendicant, according to Ps. 39. 18, But I am a beggar and poor; where a gloss says:⁷ "Christ said this of Himself as bearing the 'form of a servant,'" and further on: "A beggar is one who entreats another, and a poor man is one who has not enough for himself." Again it is written (Ps. 69. 6): I am needy and poor; where a gloss says:⁸ "'Needy,' that is a suppliant; 'and poor,' that is, not having enough for myself, because I have no worldly wealth." And Jerome says in a letter:⁹ "Beware lest whereas thy Lord," that is Christ, "begged, thou amass other people's wealth." Therefore it becomes religious to beg.

I answer that, Two things may be considered in reference to mendicancy. The first is on the part of the act itself of begging, which has a certain abasement attaching to it, since of all men those would seem most abased who are not only poor, but are so needy that they have to receive their meat from others. In this way some deserve praise for begging out of humility, just as they abase themselves in other ways, as being the most efficacious remedy against pride which they desire to quench either in themselves or in others by their example. For just as a disease that arises from excessive heat is most efficaciously healed by things that excel in cold, so proneness to pride is most efficaciously healed by those things which savour most of abasement. Hence it is said in the Decretal on Penance (D. 11, cap. Si quis semel):¹⁰ "To condescend to the humblest duties, and to devote oneself to the lowliest service is an exercise of humility; for thus one is able to heal the disease of pride and human glory." Hence Jerome praises Fabiola (Ep. ad Ocean.)¹¹ for that "she desired to receive alms, having poured forth all her wealth for Christ's sake." The Blessed Alexis acted in like manner, for, having renounced all his possessions for Christ's sake he rejoiced in receiving alms even from his own servants. It is also related of the Blessed Arsenius in the Lives of the Fathers (v. 6)¹² that he gave thanks because he was forced by necessity to ask for alms. Hence it is enjoined to some people as a penance for grievous sins to go on a pilgrimage begging. Since, however, humility like the other virtues should not be without discretion, one should be discreet in becoming a mendicant for the purpose of humiliation, lest a man thereby incur the mark of covetousness or of anything else unbecoming.

Secondly, mendicancy may be considered on the part of that which one gets by begging: and thus a man may be led to beg by a twofold motive. First, by the desire to have wealth or meat without working for it, and such mendicancy is unlawful; secondly, by a motive of necessity or usefulness. The motive is one of necessity if a man has no other means of livelihood save begging, and it is a motive of usefulness if he wishes to accomplish something useful, and is unable to do so without the alms of the faithful. And so alms are besought for the building of a bridge, or church, or for any other work whatever that is conducive to the common good; thus scholars may seek alms that they may devote themselves to the study of wisdom. In this way mendicancy is lawful to religious no less than to seculars.

Reply Obj. 1. Augustine is speaking there explicitly of those who beg from motives of covetousness.

Reply Obj. 2. The first gloss speaks of begging from motives of covetousness, as appears from the words of the Apostle, while the second gloss speaks of those who without effecting any useful purpose, beg their livelihood in order to live in idleness. On the other hand, he lives not idly who in any way lives usefully.

Reply Obj. 3. This precept of the divine law does not forbid anyone to beg, but it forbids the rich to be so stingy that some are compelled by necessity to beg. The civil law imposes a penalty on able-bodied mendicants who beg from motives neither of utility nor of necessity.

Reply Obj. 4. Uncomeliness is twofold. One arises from lack of virtue (inhonestas), the other from an external defect; thus it is uncomely for a man to be sick or poor. Such uncomeliness of mendicancy does not pertain to sin, but it may pertain to humility, as stated in the Article.

Reply Obj. 5. Preachers have the right to be fed by those to whom they preach; yet if they wish to seek this by begging so as to receive it as a free gift and not as a right this will be a mark of greater humility.

ARTICLE 6. Whether It Is Lawful for Religious To Wear Coarser Clothes Than Others?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem unlawful for religious to wear coarser clothes than others.

Objection 1. For according to the Apostle (I Thess. 5. 22) we ought to refrain from all appearance of evil. Now coarseness of clothes has an appearance of evil, for our Lord said (Matt. 7. 15): Beware of false prophets who come to you in the clothing of sheep; and a gloss on Apoc. 6. 8, Behold a pale horse, says:¹ "The devil finding that he cannot succeed, neither by outward afflictions nor by manifest heresies, sends in advance false brethren, who under the guise of religion assume the characteristics of the black and red horses by corrupting the faith." Therefore it would seem that religious should not wear coarse clothes.

Obj. 2. Further, Jerome says to Nepotian:² "Avoid sombre," that is, black, "equally with glittering apparel. Fine and coarse clothes are equally to be shunned, for the one exhales pleasure, the other vainglory." Therefore, since vainglory is a graver sin than the use of things which give pleasure, it would seem that religious who should tend to perfection ought to avoid coarse rather than fine clothes.

Obj. 3. Further, Religious should aim especially at doing works of penance. Now in works of penance we should use not outward signs of sorrow, but rather signs of joy; for our Lord said (Matt. 6. 16): When you fast, be not, as the hypocrites, sad, and afterwards He added: But thou, when thou fastest, anoint thy head and wash thy face. Augustine commenting on these words (De Serm. Dom. in Monte, ii, 12).³ "In this chapter we must observe that not only the glare and pomp of outward things, but even the weeds of mourning may be a subject of ostentation, all the more dangerous as being a decoy under the guise of God's service." Therefore it seems that religious ought not to wear coarse clothes.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (Heb. 11. 37): They wandered about in sheep-skins, in goat-skins, and a gloss adds:⁴—"as Elias and others." Moreover it is said in the Decretal xxi, q. iv, cap. Omnis jactantia.⁵ "If any persons be found to deride those who wear coarse and religious apparel they must be reprov'd. For in the early times all those who were consecrated to God went about in common and coarse apparel."

I answer that, As Augustine says⁶ that in all external things, "it is not the use but the intention of the user that is at fault." In order to judge of this it is necessary to observe that coarse and homely apparel may be considered in two ways. First, as being a sign of a man's disposition or condition, because according to Eccles. 19. 27, the attire . . . of the man shows what he is. In this way coarseness of attire is sometimes a sign of sorrow. Hence those who are beset with sorrow are accustomed to wear coarser clothes, just as on the other hand in times of festivity and joy they wear finer clothes. Hence penitents make use of coarse apparel, for example, the king (Jonas 3. 6) who was clothed with sack-cloth, and Achab (III Kings 21. 27) who put hair-cloth upon his flesh.

Sometimes, however, it is a sign of the contempt of riches and worldly ostentation. Hence Jerome says to the monk Rusticus:¹ "Let your sombre attire indicate your purity of mind, your coarse robe prove your contempt of the world, yet so that your mind be not inflated withal, lest your speech belie your habit." In both these ways it is becoming for religious to wear coarse attire, since religion is a state of penance and of contempt of worldly glory.

But that a person wish to signify this to others arises from three motives. First, in order to humble himself; for just as a man's mind is uplifted by fine clothes, so it is humbled by lowly apparel. Hence speaking of Achab who put hair-cloth on his flesh, the Lord said to Elias: Hast thou seen Achab humbled before Me? (III Kings 21. 29). Secondly, in order to set an example to others; hence a gloss on Matt. 3. 4 (John) had his garments of camel's hair, says: "He who preaches penance is clothed in the habit of penance."² Thirdly, on account of vainglory; thus Augustine says (De Serm. Dom. in Monte, ii, 12)³ that "even the weeds of mourning may be a subject of ostentation."

Accordingly in the first two ways it is praiseworthy to wear humble apparel, but in the third way it is sinful.

Secondly, coarse and homely attire may be considered as the result of covetousness or negligence, and thus also it is sinful.

Reply Obj. 1. Coarseness of attire has not of itself the appearance of evil; indeed it has more the appearance of good, namely of the contempt of worldly glory. Hence it is that wicked persons hide their wickedness under coarse clothing. And so Augustine says (De Serm. Dom. in Monte, ii, 24)⁴ that "the sheep should not dislike their clothing for the reason that the wolves sometimes hide themselves under it."

Reply Obj. 2. Jerome is speaking there of the coarse attire that is worn on account of human glory.

Reply Obj. 3. According to our Lord's teaching men should do no deed of holiness for the sake of show; and this is especially the case when one does something strange. Hence Chrysostom says:⁵ "While praying a man should do nothing strange, so as to draw the gaze of others, either by shouting or striking his breast, or casting up his hands," because the very strangeness draws people's attention to him. Yet blame does not attach to all strange behaviour that draws people's attention, for it may be done well or ill. Hence Augustine says (De Serm. Dom. in Monte, ii, 12)⁶ that "in the practice of the Christian religion when a man draws attention to himself by unwonted squalor and shabbiness, since he acts thus voluntarily and not of necessity, we can gather from his other deeds whether his behaviour is motivated by contempt of excessive dress or by affectation." Religious, however, would especially seem not to act thus from affectation, since they wear a coarse habit as a sign of their profession whereby they profess contempt of the world.

QUESTION CLXXXVIII OF THE DIFFERENT KINDS OF RELIGIOUS LIFE (In Eight Articles)

WE must now consider the different kinds of religious life, and under this head there are eight points of inquiry: (1) Whether there are different kinds of religious life or only one? (2) Whether a religious order can be established for the works of the active life? (3) Whether a religious order can be directed to soldiering? (4) Whether a religious order can be established for preaching and the exercise of like works? (5) Whether a religious order can be established for the study of science? (6) Whether a religious order that is directed to the contemplative life is more excellent than one that is directed to the active life? (7) Whether religious perfection is diminished by possessing something in common? (8) Whether the religious life of solitaries is to be preferred to the religious life of those who live in community.

ARTICLE 1. Whether There Is Only One Religious Order?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that there is but one religious order.

Objection 1. For there can be no diversity in that which is possessed wholly and perfectly; therefore there can be only one first and sovereign good, as stated in the First Part (q. XI, a. 3). Now as Gregory says (Hom. viii in Ezech.),⁷ "when a man vows to Almighty God all that he has, all his life, all his knowledge, it is a holocaust," without which there is no religious life. Therefore it would seem that there are not many religious orders but only one.

⁵ Pseudo Chrysostom, Op. Imperf. in Matt., hom. xiii, on 5.5 (PG 56, 709). ⁶ PL 34, 1287. ⁷ Bk. II (PL 76, 1037).

Obj. 2. Further, Things which agree in essentials differ only accidentally. Now there is no religious order without the three essential vows of religion, as stated above (Q. CLXXXVI, AA. 6, 7). Therefore it would seem that religious orders differ not specifically, but only accidentally.

Obj. 3. Further, The state of perfection belongs both to religious and to bishops, as stated above (Q. CLXXXIV, A. 5). Now the episcopate is not diversified specifically, but is one wherever it may be; hence Jerome says to Bishop Evagrius:¹ "Wherever a bishop is, whether at Rome, or Gubbio, or Constantinople, or Reggio, he has the same excellence, the same priesthood." Therefore in like manner there is but one religious order.

Obj. 4. Further, Anything that may lead to confusion should be removed from the Church. Now it would seem that a diversity of religious orders might confuse the Christian people, as a Decretal states (Cap. Ne Nimia: de Relig. Dom.).² Therefore it seems that there ought not to be different religious orders.

On the contrary. It is written (Ps. 44. 10) that it pertains to the adornment of the queen that she is surrounded with variety.

I answer that, As stated above (Q. CLXXXVI, A. 7; Q. CLXXXVII, A. 2), the religious state is a training school wherein one aims by practice at the perfection of charity. Now there are various works of charity to which a man may devote himself, and there are also various kinds of exercise. Therefore religious orders may be differentiated in two ways. First, according to the different things to which they may be directed; thus one may be directed to the lodging of pilgrims, another to visiting or ransoming captives. Secondly, there may be various religious orders according to the diversity of practices; thus in one religious order the body is chastised by abstinence in food, in another by the practice of manual labour, scantiness of clothes, or the like.

Since, however, the end imports most in every matter, religious orders differ more especially according to their various ends than according to their various practices.

Reply Obj. 1. The obligation to devote oneself wholly to God's service is common to every religious order; hence religious do not differ in this respect, as though in one religious order a person retained some one thing of his own, and in another order some other thing. But the difference is in respect of the different things wherein one may serve God, and whereby a man may dispose himself to the service of God.

Reply Obj. 2. The three essential vows of religion pertain to the practice of religion as principles to which all other matters are reduced, as stated above (Q. CLXXXVI, A. 7, reply 2). But there are various ways of disposing oneself to the observance of each of them. For instance one disposes oneself to observe the vow of continence, by solitude of place, by abstinence, by mutual fellowship, and by many like means. Accordingly it is evident that the community of the essential vows is compatible with diversity of religious life, both on account of the different dispositions and on account of the different ends, as explained above in this Article.

Reply Obj. 3. In matters relating to perfection, the bishop stands in the position of agent, and the religious as passive, as stated above (Q. CLXXXIV, A. 7). Now the agent, even in natural things, the higher it is, is so much the more one, while the things that are passive are various. Hence with reason the episcopal state is one, while religious orders are many.

Reply Obj. 4. Confusion is opposed to distinction and order. Accordingly the multitude of religious orders would lead to confusion if different religious orders were directed to the same end and in the same way, without necessity or utility. Therefore to prevent this happening it has been wholesomely forbidden to establish a new religious order without the authority of the Sovereign Pontiff.

ARTICLE 2 Whether a Religious Order Should Be Established for the Works of the Active Life?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that no religious order should be established for the works of the active life.

Objection 1. For every religious order belongs to the state of perfection, as stated above (Q. CLXXXIV, A. 5). Now the perfection of the religious state consists in the contemplation of divine things. For Dionysius says (Eccles. Hier. vi)³ that "they are called servants of God by reason of their rendering pure service and subjection to God, and on account of the indivisible and singular life which unites them by holy reflections," that is, contemplations, "on invisible things, to the Godlike unity and the perfection beloved of God." Therefore it seems that no religious order should be established for the works of the active life.

¹ Epist., CXLVI (PL 22, 1194); cf. Gratian, Decretum, pt. 1, d. 93, can. 24 (RF 1, 328).

Obj. 2. Further, It seems that the same judgment applies to canons regular as to monks, according to Extrav. De Postul., cap. Ex parte,¹ and De Statu monach., cap. Quod Dei timorem,² for it is stated that "they are not considered to be separated from the fellowship of holy monks," and the same would seem to apply to all other religious. Now the monastic rule was established for the purpose of the contemplative life; therefore Jerome says to Paulinus (Ep. lviii).³ "If you wish to be what you are called, a monk, that is, a solitary, what business have you in a city?" The same is found stated in Extrav. De Renuntiatione, cap. Nisi cum pridem,⁴ and De Regular., cap. Licet quibusdam.⁵ Therefore it would seem that every religious order is directed to the contemplative life, and none to the active life.

Obj. 3. Further, The active life is concerned with the present world. Now all religious are said to renounce the world; therefore Gregory says (Hom. viii in Ezech.):⁶ "He who renounces this world, and does all the good he can, is like one who has gone out of Egypt and offers sacrifices in the wilderness." Therefore it would seem that no religious order can be directed to the active life.

On the contrary, It is written (James 1. 27): Religion clean and undefiled before God and the Father, is this: to visit the fatherless and widows in their tribulation. Now this belongs to the active life. Therefore religious life can be fittingly directed to the active life.

I answer that, As stated above (q. CLXXXVII, A. 2), the religious state is directed to the perfection of charity, which extends to the love of God and of our neighbour. Now the contemplative life which seeks to devote itself to God alone belongs directly to the love of God, while the active life, which ministers to our neighbour's needs, belongs directly to the love of one's neighbour. And just as out of charity we love our neighbour for God's sake, so the services we render our neighbour rebound to God, according to Matt. 25. 40, What you have done (Vulg.,—As long as you did it) to one of these My least brethren, you did it to Me. Consequently those services which we render our neighbour, in so far as we refer them to God, are described as sacrifices, according to Heb. 13. 16, Do not forget to do good and to impart, for by such sacrifices God's favour is obtained. And since it belongs properly to religion to offer sacrifice to God, as stated above (q. LXXXI, A. 1, reply 1), it follows that certain religious orders are fittingly directed to the works of the active life. Hence in the Conferences of the Fathers (Coll. xiv, 4)⁷ the Abbot Nesteros in distinguishing the various aims of religious orders says. "Some direct their intention exclusively to the hidden life of the desert and purity of heart, some are occupied with the instruction of the brethren and the care of the monasteries, while others delight in the service of the guest-house," that is, in hospitality.

Reply Obj. 1. Service and subjection rendered to God are not precluded by the works of the active life, whereby a man serves his neighbour for God's sake, as stated in the Article. Nor do these works preclude singularity of life; not that they involve man's living apart from his fellowmen, but in the sense that each man individually devotes himself to things pertaining to the service of God; and since religious occupy themselves with the works of the active life for God's sake, it follows that their action results from their contemplation of divine things. Hence they are not entirely deprived of the fruit of the contemplative life.

Reply Obj. 2. The same judgment applies to monks and to all other religious, as regards things common to all religious orders, for instance as regards their devoting themselves wholly to the divine service, their observance of the essential vows of religion, and their retraining from worldly business. But it does not follow that this likeness extends to other things that are proper to the monastic profession, and are directed especially to the contemplative life. Hence in the aforesaid Decretal, De Postulando, it is not stated absolutely that "the same judgment applies to canons regular as to monks," but that it applies "in matters already mentioned," namely that "they are not to act as advocates in lawsuits." Again the Decretal quoted, referring to the monastic state, after the statement that "canons regular are not considered to be separated from the fellowship of monks," goes on to say: "Nevertheless they obey an easier rule." Hence it is evident that they are not bound to all that monks are bound.

Reply Obj. 3. A man may be in the world in two ways: in one way by his bodily presence, in another way by the bent of his mind. Hence our Lord said to His disciples (John 15. 19): I have chosen you out of the world, and yet speaking of them to His Father He said (ibid. 17. 11): These are in the world, and I come to Thee. Although, then, religious who are occupied with the works of the active life are in the world as to the presence of the body, they are not in the world as regards their bent of mind, because they are occupied with external things, not as seeking anything of the world, but merely for the sake of serving God; for they . . . use this world, as if they used it not, to quote I Cor. 7. 31. Hence (James 1. 27) after it is stated that religion clean and undefiled . . . is . . . to visit the fatherless and widows in their tribulation, it is added, and to keep one's self unspotted from this world, namely to avoid being attached to worldly things.

ARTICLE 3. Whether a Religious Order Can Be Directed to Soldiering?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that no religious order can be directed to soldiering.

Objection 1. For all religious orders belong to the state of perfection. Now our Lord said with reference to the perfection of Christian life (Matt. 5. 39): I say to you not to resist evil; but if one strike thee on the right cheek, turn to him also the other, which is inconsistent with the duties of a soldier. Therefore no religious order can be established for soldiering.

Obj. 2. Further, The bodily encounter of the battlefield is more grievous than the encounter in words that takes place between counsel at law. Yet religious are forbidden to plead at law, as appears from the Decretal De Postulando quoted above (A. 2, obj. 2). Therefore much less may a religious order be established for soldiering.

Obj. 3. Further, The religious state is a state of penance, as we have said above (Q. CLXXXVII, A. 6). Now according to the code of laws soldiering is forbidden to penitents; for it is said in the Decretal De Pœnit., Dist. v, cap. 3:¹ "It is altogether opposed to the rules of the Church, to return to worldly soldiering after doing penance." Therefore it is unfitting for any religious order to be established for soldiering.

Obj. 4. Further, No religious order may be established for an unjust aim. But as Isidore says (Etym. xviii),² a just war is one that is waged by order of the emperor. Since then religious are private individuals, it would seem unlawful for them to wage war; and consequently no religious order may be established for this purpose.

On the contrary, Augustine says to Boniface (Ep. clxxxix):³ "Beware of thinking that none of those can please God who handle warlike weapons. Of such was holy David to whom the Lord gave great testimony." Now religious orders are established in order that men may please God. Therefore nothing hinders the establishing of a religious order for the purpose of soldiering.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 2), a religious order may be established not only for the works of the contemplative life, but also for the works of the active life, in so far as they are concerned in helping our neighbour and in the service of God, but not in so far as they are directed to a worldly aim. Now the occupation of soldiering may be directed to the assistance of our neighbour, not only as regards private individuals, but also as regards the defence of the whole commonwealth. Hence it is said of Judas Machabeus (I Mach. 3. 2, 3) that he (Vulg.,—they) fought with cheerfulness the battle of Israel, and he got his people great honour. It can also be directed to the upkeep of divine worship, and hence (ibid. 21) Judas is stated to have said: We will fight for our lives and our laws, and further on (13. 3) Simon said: You know what great battles I and my brethren, and the house of my father, have fought for the laws and the sanctuary.

Hence a religious order may be fittingly established for soldiering, not indeed for any worldly purpose, but for the defence of divine worship and public safety, or also of the poor and oppressed, according to Ps. 81. 4: Rescue the poor, and deliver the needy out of the hand of the sinner.

Reply Obj. 1. Not to resist evil may be understood in two ways. First, in the sense of forgiving the wrong done to oneself, and thus it may pertain to perfection, when it is expedient to act thus for the spiritual welfare of others. Secondly, in the sense of tolerating patiently the wrongs done to others; and this pertains to imperfection, or even to vice, if one be able to resist the wrongdoer in a becoming manner.

³ PL 33, 855; (Cf. Gratian, Decretum, pt. II, causa XXIII, Q. 1, can. 3 (RF 1, 892)).

¹ Gratian, pt. II, causa XXXIII, Q. 3 (RF 1, 1240).

Hence Ambrose says (De Offic. i, 27).¹ "The courage whereby a man in battle defends his country against barbarians, or protects the weak at home, or his friends against robbers is full of justice, even as our Lord says in the passage quoted, . . . thy goods, ask them not again."² If, however, a man were not to demand the return of that which belongs to another, he would sin if it were his business to do so; for it is praiseworthy to give away one's own, but not another's property. And much less should the things of God be neglected, for as Chrysostom says,³ "it is most wicked to overlook the wrongs done to God."

Reply Obj. 2. It is inconsistent with any religious order to act as counsel at law for a worldly end, but it is not inconsistent to do so at the orders of one's superior and in favour of one's monastery, as stated in the same Decretal or for the defence of the poor and widows. Therefore it is said in the Decretals (Dist. lxxxviii, cap. 1):⁴ "The holy synod has decreed that henceforth no cleric is to buy property or occupy himself with secular business, save with a view to the care of the fatherless . . . and widows." Likewise to be a soldier for the sake of some worldly purpose is contrary to all religious life, but this does not apply to those who are soldiers for the sake of God's service.

Reply Obj. 3. Worldly soldiering is forbidden to penitents, but the soldiering which is directed to the service of God is imposed as a penance on some people, as in the case of those upon whom it is enjoined to take arms in defence of the Holy Land.

Reply Obj. 4. The establishment of a religious order for the purpose of soldiering does not imply that the religious can wage war on their own authority; but they can do so only on the authority of the sovereign or of the Church.

ARTICLE 4. Whether a Religious Order Can Be Established for Preaching or Hearing Confessions?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that no religious order may be established for preaching, or hearing confessions.

Objection 1. For it is said (vii, q. 1, cap. Hoc nequaquam):⁵ "The monastic life is one

² Luke 6, 30: Of him that taketh away thy goods, ask them not again. Cf. Matt. 5, 40.

³ Pseudo-Chrysostom, op. imperf. in Matt., hom. v, on 4.10 (PG 56, 668). ⁴ Gratian, pt. 1 (RF 1, 306).

⁵ Gratian, Decretum, pt. 11, causa vii, q. 1, can. 45 (RF 1, 585).

of subjection and discipleship, not of teaching, authority, or pastoral care." and the same apparently applies to religious. Now preaching and hearing confessions are the actions of a pastor and teacher. Therefore a religious order should not be established for this purpose.

Obj. 2. Further, The purpose for which a religious order is established would seem to be something most proper to the religious life, as stated above (AA. 2, 3). Now the aforesaid actions are not proper to religious but to bishops. Therefore a religious order should not be established for the purpose of such actions.

Obj. 3. Further, It seems unfitting that the authority to preach and hear confessions should be committed to an unlimited number of men; and there is no fixed number of those who are received into a religious order. Therefore it is unfitting for a religious order to be established for the purpose of the aforesaid actions.

Obj. 4. Further, Preachers have a right to receive their livelihood from the faithful of Christ, according to I Cor. 9. If then the office of preaching be committed to a religious order established for that purpose, it follows that the faithful of Christ are bound to support an unlimited number of persons, which would be a heavy burden on them. Therefore a religious order should not be established for the exercise of these actions.

Obj. 5. Further, The organization of the Church should be in accordance with Christ's institution. Now Christ sent first the twelve apostles to preach, as related in Luke 9., and afterwards He sent the seventy-two disciples, as stated in Luke 10. Moreover, according to the gloss of Bede⁶ on And after these things (Luke 10, 1), "the apostles are represented by the bishops, the seventy-two disciples by the lesser priests," that is, the parish priests. Therefore in addition to bishops and parish priests, no religious order should be established for the purpose of preaching and hearing confessions.

On the contrary, In the Conferences of the Fathers (Coll. xiv, 4)⁷ Abbot Nestoros, speaking of the various kinds of religious orders, says: "Some choosing the care of the sick, others devoting themselves to the relief of the afflicted and oppressed, or applying themselves to teaching, or giving alms to the poor, have been most highly esteemed on account of their devotion and piety." Therefore just as a religious order may be established for the care of the sick, so also may one be established for teaching the people by preaching and like works.

⁶ Glossa ordin. (v, 151E); Bede, PL 92, 461.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 2), it is fitting for a religious order to be established for the works of the active life, in so far as they are directed to the good of our neighbour, the service of God, and the upkeep of divine worship. Now the good of our neighbour is advanced by things pertaining to the spiritual welfare of the soul rather than by things pertaining to the supplying of bodily needs, in proportion to the excellence of spiritual over corporal things. Hence it was stated above (Q. xxxii, A. 3) that spiritual works of mercy surpass corporal works of mercy. Moreover this is more pertinent to the service of God, to Whom no sacrifice is more acceptable than zeal for souls, as Gregory says (Hom. xii in Ezech.).¹ Furthermore, it is a greater thing to employ spiritual arms in defending the faithful against the errors of heretics and the temptations of the devil, than to protect the faithful by means of bodily weapons. Therefore it is most fitting for a religious order to be established for preaching and similar works pertaining to the salvation of souls.

Reply Obj. 1. He who works by virtue of another acts as an instrument. And "a minister is like an animated instrument," as the Philosopher says.² Hence if a man preach or do something similar by the authority of his superiors, he does not rise above the degree of discipleship or subjection, which is appropriate to religious.

Reply Obj. 2. Some religious orders are established for soldiering, to wage war not indeed on their own authority, but on that of the sovereign or of the Church who are able to wage war by virtue of their office, as stated above (A. 3, Reply 4). In the same way certain religious orders are established for preaching and hearing confessions, not indeed by their own authority, but by the authority of the higher and lower superiors, to whom these things belong by virtue of their office. Consequently to be subject to one's superiors in such a ministry is proper to a religious order of this kind.

Reply Obj. 3. Bishops do not allow these religious severally and indiscriminately to preach or hear confessions, but according to the discretion of the religious superiors, or according to their own appointment.

Reply Obj. 4. The faithful are not bound by law to contribute to the support of other than their ordinary prelates, who receive the tithes and offerings of the faithful for that purpose, as well as other ecclesiastical revenues. But if some men are willing to minister to the faithful by exercising the aforesaid acts gratuitously, and without demanding payment as of right, the faithful are not burdened thereby because their temporal contributions can be liberally repaid by those men, nor are they bound by law to contribute, but by charity, and yet not so that they be burdened thereby and others eased, as stated in II Cor. 8. 13. If, however, none be found to devote themselves gratuitously to services of this kind, the ordinary prelate is bound, if he cannot suffice by himself, to seek other suitable persons and support them himself.

Reply Obj. 5. The seventy-two disciples are represented not only by the parish priests, but by all those of lower order who in any way assist the bishops in their office. For we do not read that our Lord appointed the seventy-two disciples to certain fixed parishes, but that He sent them two and two before His face into every city and place whither He Himself was to come. It was fitting, however, that in addition to the ordinary prelates others should be chosen for these duties on account of the multitude of the faithful, and the difficulty of finding a sufficient number of persons to be appointed to each locality, just as it was necessary to establish religious orders for military service, on account of the secular princes being unable to cope with unbelievers in certain countries.

ARTICLE 5. Whether a Religious Order Should Be Established for the Purpose of Study?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that a religious order should not be established for the purpose of study.

Objection 1. For it is written (Ps. 70. 15, 16): Because I have not known letters (Douay,—learning), I will enter into the powers of the Lord, that is, "Christian virtue," according to a gloss.³ Now the perfection of Christian virtue seems to pertain especially to religious. Therefore it is not for them to apply themselves to the study of letters.

Obj. 2. Further. That which is a source of dissent is unbecoming to religious, who are gathered together in the unity of peace. Now study leads to dissent; hence also different schools of thought arose among the philosophers. And so Jerome in his commentary on the epistle to Titus i. 5, and shouldst ordain . . . in every city, says:⁴ "Before a diabolical instinct brought study into religion, and people said: I am of Paul, I of Apollo, I of Cephas," etc. Therefore it would seem that no religious order should be established for the purpose of study.

Obj. 3. Further, Those who profess the Christian religion should profess nothing in common with the Gentiles. Now among the Gentiles were some who professed philosophy, and even now some secular persons are known as professors of certain sciences. Therefore the study of letters does not become religious.

On the contrary, Jerome in his letter to Paulinus¹ urges him to acquire learning in the monastic state, saying: "Let us learn on earth those things the knowledge of which will remain in heaven," and further on: "Whatever you seek to know, I will endeavor to know with you."

I answer that, As stated above (AA. 2, 3), religion may be ordered to the active and to the contemplative life. Now chief among the works of the active life are those which are directly ordered to the salvation of souls, such as preaching and the like. Accordingly the study of letters is becoming to religious in three ways. First, as regards that which is proper to the contemplative life, to which the study of learning helps in a twofold manner. In one way by helping directly to contemplate, namely by enlightening the intellect. For the contemplative life of which we are now speaking is directed chiefly to the consideration of divine things, as stated above (Q. CLXXX, A. 4), to which consideration man is directed by study; for which reason it is said in praise of the righteous (Ps. 1, 2) that he shall meditate day and night on the law of the Lord, and (Ecclus. 39. 1): The wise man will seek out the wisdom of all the ancients, and will be occupied in the prophets. In another way the study of letters is a help to the contemplative life indirectly, by removing the obstacles to contemplation, namely the errors which in the contemplation of divine things frequently beset those who are ignorant of the scriptures. Thus we read in the Confessions of the Fathers (Coll. x, 3)² that the Abbot Serapion through simplicity fell into the error of the Anthropomorphites, who thought that God had a human shape. Hence Gregory says (Moral. vi, 37)³ that "some through seeking in contemplation more than they are able to grasp, fall away into perverse doctrines, and by failing to be the humble disciples of truth become the masters of error." Hence it is written (Eccles. 2. 3): I thought in my heart to withdraw my flesh from wine, that I might turn my mind to wisdom and might avoid folly.

Secondly, the study of letters is necessary to religious institutions for preaching and other like works; therefore the Apostle (Tit. 1. 9), speaking of bishops to whose office these acts belong, says: Embracing that faithful word which is according to doctrine, that he may be able to exhort in sound doctrine and to convince the gainsayers. Nor does it matter that the apostles were sent to preach without having studied letters, because, as Jerome says in his letter to Paulinus,⁴ "whatever others acquire by exercise and daily meditation in God's law, was taught them by the Holy Ghost."

Thirdly, the study of letters is becoming to religious as regards that which is common to all religious orders. For it helps us to avoid the lusts of the flesh; therefore Jerome says to the monk Rusticus:⁵ "Love the science of the Scriptures and thou shalt have no love for carnal vice." For it turns the mind away from lustful thoughts, and tames the flesh on account of the toil that study entails according to Ecclus. 31. 1, Watching for riches consumeth the flesh. It also helps to remove the desire of riches, and therefore it is written (Wisd. 7. 8): I . . . esteemed riches nothing in comparison with her, and (I Mach. 12. 9): We needed none of these things, namely assistance from without, having for our comfort the holy books that are in our hands. It also helps to teach obedience, and so Augustine says (De Oper. Monach. 17):⁶ "What sort of perverseness is this, to wish to read, but not to obey what one reads?" Hence it is clearly fitting that a religious order be established for the study of letters.

Reply Obj. 1. This commentary of the gloss is an exposition of the Old Law of which the Apostle says (II Cor. 3. 6): The letter killeth. Hence not to know letters is to disapprove of the circumcision of the letter and other carnal observances.

Reply Obj. 2. Study is directed to knowledge which, without charity, puffeth up, and consequently leads to dissent, according to Prov. 13. 10, Among the proud there are always dissensions; but, with charity, it edifieth and begets concord. Hence the Apostle after saying (I Cor. 1. 5): You are made rich . . . in all utterance and in all knowledge, adds (verse 10):

³ PL 75, 761.

⁴ Epist., LIII (PL 22, 543).

⁵ Epist., CXXV (PL 22, 1078).

⁶ PL 40, 565.

That you all speak the same thing, and that there be no schisms among you. But Jerome is not speaking here of the study of letters, but of the study of dissensions which heretics and schismatics have brought into the Christian religion.

Reply Obj. 3. The philosophers professed the study of letters in the matter of secular learning; but it becomes religious to devote themselves chiefly to the study of letters in reference to the doctrine that is according to godliness (Tit. 1. 1). It becomes not religious, whose whole life is devoted to the service of God, to seek for other learning, save in so far as it is referred to the sacred doctrine. Hence Augustine says at the end of his work On Music:¹ "Whilst we think that we should not overlook those whom heretics delude by the deceitful assurance of reason and knowledge, we are slow to advance in the consideration of their methods. Yet we should not be praised for doing this, were it not that many holy sons of their most loving mother the Catholic Church had done the same under the necessity of confounding heretics."

ARTICLE 6. Whether a Religious Order That Is Devoted to the Contemplative Life Is More Excellent Than One That Is Given to the Active Life?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It seems that a religious order which is devoted to the contemplative life is not more excellent than one which is given to the active life.

Objection 1. For it is said (Extrav. de Regular. et Transeunt. ad Relig., cap. Licet),² "Even as a greater good is preferred to a lesser, so the common profit takes precedence of private profit; and in this case teaching is rightly preferred to silence, responsibility to contemplation, work to rest." Now the religious order which is directed to the greater good is better. Therefore it would seem that those religious orders that are directed to the active life are more excellent than those which are directed to the contemplative life.

Obj. 2. Further, Every religious order is directed to the perfection of charity, as stated above (AA. 1, 2). Now a gloss on Heb. 12. 4, For you have not yet resisted unto blood, says:³ "In this life there is no more perfect love than that to which the holy martyrs attained, who fought against sin unto blood." Now to fight unto blood is becoming those religious who are directed to military service, and yet this pertains to the active life. Therefore it would seem that religious orders of this kind are the most excellent.

Obj. 3. Further, It seems that the stricter a religious order is, the more excellent it is. But there is no reason why certain religious orders directed to the active life should not be of stricter observance than those directed to the contemplative life. Therefore they are more excellent.

On the contrary, Our Lord said (Luke 10. 42) that the best part was Mary's, by whom the contemplative life is signified.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1), the difference between one religious order and another depends chiefly on the end, and secondarily on the exercise. And since one thing cannot be said to be more excellent than another save in respect of that in which it differs from it, it follows that the excellence of one religious order over another depends chiefly on their ends, and secondarily on their respective exercises. Nevertheless each of these comparisons is considered in a different way. For the comparison with respect to the end is absolute, since the end is sought for its own sake; but the comparison with respect to exercise is relative, since exercise is sought not for its own sake, but for the sake of the end. Hence a religious order is preferable to another if it be directed to an end that is absolutely more excellent either because it is a greater good or because it is directed to more goods. If, however, the end be the same, the excellence of one religious order over another depends secondarily, not on the amount of exercise, but on the proportion of the exercise to the end in view. Therefore in the Conferences of the Fathers (Coll. ii, 2)⁴ Blessed Antony is quoted as preferring discretion whereby a man moderates all his actions, to fastings, watchings, and all such observances.

Accordingly we must say that the work of the active life is twofold. One proceeds from the fulness of contemplation, such as teaching and preaching. Therefore Gregory says (Hom. v in Ezech.)⁵ that the words of Ps. 144. 7, They shall publish the memory of . . . Thy sweetness, refer "to perfect men returning from their contemplation." And this work is more excellent than simple contemplation. For even as it is better to enlighten than merely to shine, so is it better to give to others the fruits of one's contemplation than merely to contemplate. The other work of the active life consists entirely in outward occupation, for instance almsgiving, receiving guests, and the like, which are less excellent than the works of contemplation, except in cases of necessity, as stated above (Q. CLXXXII, A. 1).

² Decretal. Gregor., ix, bk. iii, tit. 31, chap. 18 (RF II, 575).

⁴ Cassian (PL 40, 525).

⁵ Bk. 11 (PL 76, 820).

Accordingly the highest place in religious orders is held by those which are directed to teaching and preaching, which, moreover, are nearest to the episcopal perfection, even as in other things "the end of that which is first is in conjunction with the beginning of that which is second," as Dionysius states (Div. Nom. vii).¹ The second place belongs to those which are directed to contemplation, and the third to those which are occupied with external actions. Moreover, in each of these degrees it may be noted that one religious order excels another through being directed to a higher action in the same genus; thus among the works of the active life it is better to ransom captives than to receive guests, and among the works of the contemplative life prayer is better than study. Again one will excel another if it be directed to more of these actions than another, or if it have statutes more adapted to the attainment of the end in view.

Reply Obj. 1. This Decretal refers to the active life as directed to the salvation of souls.

Reply Obj. 2. Those religious orders that are established for the purpose of military service aim more directly at shedding the enemy's blood than at the shedding of their own, which latter belongs more properly to martyrs. Yet there is no reason why religious of this description should not acquire the merit of martyrdom in certain cases, and in this respect stand higher than other religious; even as in some cases the works of the active life take precedence of contemplation.

Reply Obj. 3. Strictness of observances, as the Blessed Antony remarks in the Conferences of the Fathers (Coll. ii, 2)² is not the chief object of commendation in a religious order; and it is written (Isa. 58, 5): Is this such a fast as I have chosen, for a man to afflict his soul for a day? Nevertheless it is adopted in religious life as being necessary for taming the flesh, which if done without discretion, is liable to make us fail altogether, as the Blessed Antony observes.³ Therefore a religious order is not more excellent through having stricter observances, but because its observances are directed by greater discretion to the end of religion. Thus the taming of the flesh is more efficaciously directed to continence by means of abstinence in meat and drink, which pertain to hunger and thirst, than by the privation of clothing, which pertains to cold and nakedness, or by bodily labour.

ARTICLE 7. Whether Religious Perfection Is Diminished By Possessing Something in Common?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It would seem that religious perfection is diminished by possessing something in common.

Objection 1. For our Lord said (Matt. 19, 21): If thou wilt be perfect, go sell all (Vulg. —what) thou hast and give to the poor. Hence it is clear that to lack worldly wealth belongs to the perfection of Christian life. Now those who possess something in common do not lack worldly wealth. Therefore it would seem that they do not quite reach to the perfection of Christian life.

Obj. 2. Further, The perfection of the counsels requires that one should be without worldly solicitude; therefore the Apostle in giving the counsel of virginity said (I Cor. 7, 32): I would have you to be without solicitude. Now it belongs to the solicitude of the present life that certain people keep something to themselves for the morrow, and this solicitude was forbidden His disciples by our Lord (Matt. 6, 34) saying: Be not . . . solicitous for to-morrow. Therefore it would seem that the perfection of Christian life is diminished by having something in common.

Obj. 3. Further, Possessions held in common belong in some way to each member of the community; therefore Jerome (Ep. lx., ad Heliod.)⁴ says in reference to certain people "They are richer in the monastery than they had been in the world; though serving the poor Christ they have wealth, which they had not while serving the rich devil; the Church rejects them now that they are rich, who in the world were beggars." But it is derogatory to religious perfection that one should possess wealth of one's own. Therefore it is also derogatory to religious perfection to possess anything in common.

Obj. 4. Further, Gregory (Dial. iii, 14)⁵ relates of a very holy man named Isaac, that "when his disciples humbly signified that he should accept the possessions offered to him for the use of the monastery, he being solicitous for the safeguarding of his poverty, held firmly to his opinion, saying, 'A monk who seeks earthly possessions is no monk at all'; and this refers to possessions held in common, and which were offered him for the common use of the monastery. Therefore it would seem destructive of religious perfection to possess anything in common.

Obj. 5. Further, Our Lord in prescribing religious perfection to His disciples, said (Matt. 10. 9, 10): Do not possess gold, nor silver, nor money in your purses, nor scrip for your journey. By these words, as Jerome says in his commentary,¹ "He reproves those philosophers who are commonly called Bactroperatæ² who as despising the world and valuing all things at naught carried their pantry about with them." Therefore it would seem derogatory to religious perfection that one should keep something whether for oneself or for the common use.

On the contrary, Prosper says (De Vita Contempl.)³ and it is quoted in the Decretals:⁴ "It is sufficiently clear both that for the sake of perfection one should renounce having anything of one's own, and that the possession of revenues, which are of course common property, is no hindrance to the perfection of the Church."

I answer that, As stated above (Q. CLXXXIV, A. 3; Q. CLXXXV, A. 6, reply 1), perfection consists, essentially, not in poverty, but in following Christ according to the saying of Jerome (in his commentary on Matt. 19. 27, and have followed Thee):⁵ "Since it is not enough to leave all, Peter adds that which is perfect, namely, 'We have followed Thee.' " Poverty, however, is like an instrument or exercise for the attainment of perfection. Hence in the Conferences of the Fathers (Coll. i, 7)⁶ the abbot Moses says: "Fastings, watchings, meditating on the Scriptures, poverty, and privation of all one's possessions are not perfection, but means of perfection." Now the privation of one's possessions, or poverty, is a means of perfection, since by doing away with riches we remove certain obstacles to charity; and these are chiefly three. The first is the cares which riches bring with them; therefore our Lord said (Matt. 13. 22): That which was sown (Vulg.—He that received the seed) among thorns, is he that heareth the word, and the care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, chokeeth up the word. The second is the love of riches, which increases with the possession of wealth; therefore Jerome says (in his commentary on Matt. 19. 24, It is easier for a camel)⁷ that "since it is difficult to despise riches when we have them, our Lord did not say: It is impossible for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven, but: It is difficult." The third is vainglory or elation which results from riches, according to Ps. 48. 7, They that trust in their own strength, and glory in the multitude of their riches.

Accordingly the first of these three cannot be altogether separated from riches whether great or small. For man must take a certain amount of care in acquiring or keeping external things. But so long as external things are sought or possessed only in a small quantity, and as much as is required for a mere livelihood, such care does not hinder one much, and consequently is not inconsistent with the perfection of Christian life. For our Lord did not forbid all care, but only such as is excessive and hurtful; therefore Augustine, commenting on Matt. 6. 25, Be not solicitous for your life, what you shall eat, says,⁸ "In saying this He does not forbid them to procure these things in so far as they needed them, but to be intent on them, and for their sake to do whatever they are bidden to do in preaching the Gospel." Yet the possession of much wealth increases the weight of care, which is a great distraction to man's mind and hinders him from giving himself wholly to God's service. The other two, however, namely the love of riches and taking pride or glorying in riches, result only from an abundance of wealth.

Nevertheless it makes a difference in this matter if riches, whether abundant or moderate, be possessed in private or in common. For the care that one takes of one's own wealth pertains to love of self, whereby a man loves himself in temporal matters; but the care that is given to things held in common pertains to the love of charity which seeketh not her own, but looks to the common good. And since religion is directed to the perfection of charity, and charity is perfected in the love of God extending to contempt of self, it is contrary to religious perfection to possess anything in private. But the care that is given to common goods may pertain to charity, although it may prove an obstacle to some higher act of charity, such as divine contemplation or the instructing of one's neighbour.

Hence it is evident that to have excessive riches in common, whether in movable or in immovable property, is an obstacle to perfection, though not absolutely incompatible with it. But it is not an obstacle to religious perfection to have enough external things, whether movables or immovables, as suffice for a livelihood, if we consider poverty in relation to the common end of religious orders, which is to devote oneself to the service of God. But if we consider poverty in relation to the special end of any religious order, then this end being presupposed, a greater or lesser degree of poverty is adapted to that religious order; and each religious order will be the more perfect in respect of poverty according as it professes a poverty more adapted to its end. For it is evident that for the purpose of the outward and bodily works of the active life a man needs the assistance of outward things, whereas few are required for contemplation. Hence the Philosopher says¹ that "many things are needed for action, and the more so the greater and nobler the actions are. But the contemplative man requires no such things for the exercise of his act: he needs only the necessities; other things are an obstacle to his contemplation." Accordingly it is clear that a religious order directed to the bodily actions of the active life, such as soldiering or the lodging of guests, would be imperfect if it lacked common riches; but those religious orders which are directed to the contemplative life are the more perfect according as the poverty they profess burdens them with less care for temporal things. And the care of temporal things is so much a greater obstacle to religious life as the religious life requires a greater care of spiritual things.

Now it is manifest that a religious order established for the purpose of contemplating and of giving to others the fruits of one's contemplation by teaching and preaching requires greater care of spiritual things than one that is established for contemplation only. Therefore it becomes a religious order of this kind to embrace a poverty that burdens one with the least amount of care. Again it is clear that to keep what one has acquired at a fitting time for one's necessary use involves the least burden of care. Therefore a threefold degree of poverty corresponds to the three aforesaid degrees of religious life. For it is fitting that a religious order which is directed to the bodily actions of the active life should have an abundance of riches in common; that the common possession of a religious order directed to contemplation should be more moderate, unless the said religious be bound, either themselves or through others, to give hospitality or to assist the poor; and that those who aim at giving the fruits of their contemplation to others should have their life most exempt from external cares, this being accomplished by their laying up the necessities of life procured at a fitting time. This, our Lord, the Founder of poverty, taught by His example. For He had a purse which He entrusted to Judas, and in which were kept the things that were offered to Him, as related in John 12. 6.

Nor should it be argued that Jerome (Comment. in Matt. 17)² says: "If anyone object that Judas carried money in the purse, we answer that He deemed it unlawful to spend the property of the poor on His own uses," namely by paying the tax, because among those poor His disciples held a foremost place, and the money in Christ's purse was spent chiefly on their needs. For it is stated (John 4. 8) that His disciples were gone into the city to buy meats, and (John 13. 29) that the disciples thought, because Judas had the purse, that Jesus had said to him: Buy those things which we have need of for the festival day, or that he should give something to the poor. From this it is evident that to keep money by, or any other common property for the support of religious of the same order, or of any other poor, is in accordance with the perfection which Christ taught by His example. Moreover, after the resurrection, the disciples from whom all religious orders took their origin kept the price of the lands, and distributed it according as each one had need (Acts 4. 34. 35).

Reply Obj. 1. As stated above (Q. CLXXXIV, A. 3), this saying of our Lord does not mean that poverty itself is perfection, but that it is the means of perfection. Indeed, as shown above (Q. CLXXXVI, A. 8), it is the least of the three chief means of perfection, since the vow of continence excels the vow of poverty, and the vow of obedience excels them both. Since, however, the means are sought not for their own sake, but for the sake of the end, a thing is better not for being a greater instrument, but for being more adapted to the end. Thus a physician does not heal the more, the more medicine he gives, but the more the medicine is adapted to the disease. Accordingly it does not follow that a religious order is the more perfect according as the poverty it professes is more perfect, but according as its poverty is more adapted to the end both common and special.

Granted even that the religious order which exceeds others in poverty be more perfect in so far as it is poorer, this would not make it more perfect absolutely. For possibly some other religious order might surpass it in matters relating to continence, or obedience, and thus be more perfect absolutely, since to excel in better things is to be better absolutely.

Reply Obj. 2. Our Lord's words (Matt. 6. 34), Be not solicitous for to-morrow, do not mean that we are to keep nothing for the morrow; for the Blessed Antony shows the danger of so doing, in the Conferences of the Fathers (Coll. ii, 2),¹ where he says: "It has been our experience that those who have attempted to practise the privation of all means of livelihood, so as not to have the wherewithal to procure themselves food for one day, have been deceived so unawares that they were unable to finish properly the work they had undertaken." And, as Augustine says (De Oper. Monach. 23),² "if this saying of our Lord, 'Be not solicitous for to-morrow,' means that we are to lay nothing by for the morrow, those who shut themselves up for many days from the sight of men, and apply their whole mind to a life of prayer, will be unable to provide themselves with these things." Again he adds afterwards: "Are we to suppose that the more holy they are, the less do they resemble the birds?" And further on: "For if it be argued from the Gospel that they should lay nothing by, they answer rightly: Why then did our Lord have a purse, wherein He kept the money that was collected? Why, in days long gone by, when famine was imminent, was grain sent to the holy fathers? Why did the apostles thus provide for the needs of the saints?" Accordingly the saying: Be not solicitous for to-morrow, according to Jerome in his commentary on this passage,³ is to be rendered thus: "It is enough that we think of the present; the future being uncertain, let us leave it to God";—according to Chrysostom,⁴ "It is enough to endure the toil for necessary things, labour not in excess for unnecessary things";—according to Augustine (De Serm. Dom. in Monte, ii, 17):⁵

"When we do any good action, we should bear in mind not temporal things which are denoted by the morrow, but eternal things."

Reply Obj. 3. The saying of Jerome applies where there are excessive riches, possessed in private as it were, or by the abuse of which even the individual members of a community wax proud and wanton. But they do not apply to moderate wealth, set by for the common use, merely as a means of livelihood of which each one stands in need. For it amounts to the same that each one makes use of things pertaining to the necessities of life, and that these things be set by for the common use.

Reply Obj. 4. Isaac refused to accept the offer of possessions because he feared lest this should lead him to have excessive wealth, the abuse of which would be an obstacle to religious perfection. Hence Gregory adds (ibid.): "He was as afraid of forfeiting the security of his poverty as the rich miser is careful of his perishable wealth." It is not, however, related that he refused to accept such things as were necessary for the upkeep of community life.

Reply Obj. 5. The Philosopher says⁶ that bread, wine, and the like are natural riches, while money is artificial riches. Hence it is that certain philosophers declined to make use of money, and employed other things, living according to nature. Therefore Jerome shows (ibid.) by the words of our Lord, Who equally forbade both, that it comes to the same to have money and to possess other things necessary for life. And though our Lord commanded those who were sent to preach not to carry these things on the way, He did not forbid them to be possessed in common. How these words of our Lord should be understood has been shown above (Q. CLXXXV, A. 6, reply 2; Part I-II, Q. CVIII, A. 2, reply 3).

ARTICLE 8. Whether the Religious Life of Those Who Live in Community Is More Perfect Than That of Those Who Lead a Solitary Life?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It would seem that the religious life of those who live in community is more perfect than that of those who lead a solitary life.

Objection 1. For it is written (Eccles. 4. 9): It is better . . . that two should be together, than one; for they have the advantage of their society. Therefore the religious life of those who live in community would seem to be more perfect.

⁶ Politics, I, 9 (1257^a 25; ^b 10).

⁴ Pseudo-Chrysostom, op. Imperf. in Matt. (PG 56 724). ⁵ PL 34, 1294.

Obj. 2. Further, It is written (Matt. 18. 20): Where there are two or three gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them. But nothing can be better than the fellowship of Christ. Therefore it would seem better to live in community than in solitude.

Obj. 3. Further, The vow of obedience is more excellent than the other religious vows; and humility is most acceptable to God. Now obedience and humility are better observed in company than in solitude; for Jerome says to the monk Rusticus (Ep. cxxv).¹ "In solitude pride quickly takes man unawares, he sleeps as much as he will, he does what he likes"; while he says when instructing one who lives in community, these words: "You may not do what you will, you must eat what you are bidden to eat, you may possess so much as you receive, you must obey one you prefer not to obey, you must be a servant to your brethren, you must fear the superior of the monastery as God, love him as a father."² Therefore it would seem that the religious life of those who live in community is more perfect than that of those who lead a solitary life.

Obj. 4. Further, Our Lord said (Luke 11. 33): No man lighteth a candle and putteth it in a hidden place, nor under a bushel. Now those who lead a solitary life would seem to be in a hidden place, and to be doing no good to any man. Therefore it would seem that their religious life is not more perfect.

Obj. 5. Further, That which is in accord with man's nature is apparently more pertinent to the perfection of virtue. But man is naturally a social animal, as the Philosopher says.³ Therefore it would seem that to lead a solitary life is not more perfect than to lead a community life.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Oper. Monach. 23)⁴ that "those are holier who keep themselves aloof from the approach of all, and give their whole mind to a life of prayer."

I answer that, Solitude, like poverty, is not the essence of perfection, but a means to it. Hence in the Conferences of the Fathers (Coll. i, 7)⁵ the Abbot Moses says that "solitude," even as fasting and other like things, "is a sure means of acquiring purity of heart." Now it is evident that solitude is a means adapted not to action but to contemplation, according to Osee 2. 14, I . . . will lead her into solitude (Douay,—the wilderness); and I will speak to her heart. Therefore it is not suitable to those religious orders that are directed to the works whether corporal or spiritual of the active life, except perhaps for a time, after the example of Christ, Who as Luke relates (6. 12), went out into a mountain to pray; and He passed the whole night in the prayer of God.

On the other hand, it is suitable to those religious orders that are directed to contemplation. It must, however, be observed that what is solitary should be self-sufficing by itself. Now such a thing is one that lacks nothing, and this pertains to the idea of a perfect thing. Therefore solitude befits the contemplative who has already attained to perfection. This happens in two ways:—in one way by the gift only of God, as in the case of John the Baptist, who was filled with the Holy Ghost even from his mother's womb (Luke 1. 11), so that he was in the desert even as a boy; in another way by the practice of virtuous action, according to Heb. 5. 14: Strong meat is for the perfect; for them who by custom have their senses exercised to the discerning of good and evil.

Now man is assisted in this practice by the fellowship of others in two ways. First, as regards his intellect, to the effect of his being instructed in that which he has to contemplate; therefore Jerome says to the monk Rusticus (loc. cit.): "It pleases me that you have the fellowship of holy men, and teach not yourself." Secondly, as regards the affections, seeing that man's noisome affections are restrained by the example and reproof which he receives from others; for as Gregory says (Moral. xxx, 23),⁶ commenting on the words, To whom I have given a house in the wilderness (Job 39. 6), "What profits solitude of the body, if solitude of the heart be lacking?" Hence a social life is necessary for the practice of perfection. Now solitude befits those who are already perfect; therefore Jerome says to the monk Rusticus (loc. cit.): "Do we condemn the solitary life? Not at all; indeed we have often commended it. But we wish the soldiers who pass from the monastic school to be such as not to be deterred by the hard noviciate of the desert, and such as have given proof of their conduct for a considerable time."

Accordingly, just as that which is already perfect surpasses that which is being schooled in perfection, so the life of the solitaries, if duly practised, surpasses the community life. But if it be undertaken without the aforesaid practice, it is fraught with very great danger, unless the grace of God supply that which others acquire by practice, as in the case of the Blessed Antony and the Blessed Benedict.

Reply Obj. 1. Solomon shows that two are better than one on account of the help which one affords the other either in lifting him up, or in warning him, or giving him spiritual heat (Eccles. 4. 10, 11). But those who have already attained to perfection do not require this help.

Reply Obj. 2. According to I John 4. 16, He that abideth in charity abideth in God and God in him. Therefore just as Christ is in the midst of those who are united together in the fellowship of brotherly love, so does He dwell in the heart of the man who devotes himself to divine contemplation through love of God.

Reply Obj. 3. Actual obedience is required of those who need to be schooled according to the direction of others in the attainment of perfection; but those who are already perfect are sufficiently led by the spirit of God so that they need not to obey others actually. Nevertheless they have obedience in the preparedness of the mind.

Reply Obj. 4. As Augustine says,¹ "no one is forbidden to seek the knowledge of truth, for this pertains to a praiseworthy leisure." That a man be placed on a candlestick, does not concern him but his superiors, and "if this burden is not placed on us," as Augustine goes on to say,² "we must devote ourselves to the contemplation of truth," for which purpose solitude is most helpful. Nevertheless, those who lead a solitary life are most useful to mankind. Hence, referring to them, Augustine says (De Morib. Eccl. xxxi):³ "They dwell in the most lonely places, content to live on water and the bread that is brought to them from time to time, enjoying colloquy with God to whom they have adhered with a pure mind. To some they seem to have renounced human intercourse more than is right; but these understand not how much such men profit us by the spirit of their prayers, what an example to us is the life of those whom we are forbidden to see in the body."

Reply Obj. 5. A man may lead a solitary life for two motives. One is because he is unable, as it were, to bear with human fellowship on account of his uncouthness of mind; and this is beast-like. The other is with a view to adhering wholly to divine things; and this is superhuman. Hence the Philosopher says⁴ that "he who associates not with others is either a beast or a god," that is, a godly man.

QUESTION CLXXXIX OF THE ENTRANCE INTO RELIGIOUS LIFE (In Ten Articles)

WE must now consider the entrance into religious life. Under this head there are ten points of inquiry: (1) Whether those who are not practised in the observance of the commandments should enter religion? (2) Whether it is lawful for a person to be bound by vow to enter religion? (3) Whether those who are bound by vow to enter religion are bound to fulfil their vow? (4) Whether those who vow to enter religion are bound to remain there in perpetuity? (5) Whether children should be received into religion? (6) Whether one should be withheld from entering religion through deference to one's parents? (7) Whether parish priests or archdeacons may enter religion? (8) Whether one may pass from one religious order to another? (9) Whether one ought to induce others to enter religion? (10) Whether serious deliberation with one's relations and friends is requisite for entrance into religion?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Those Who Are Not Practised in Keeping the Commandments Should Enter Religion?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It seems that none should enter religion but those who are practised in the observance of the commandments.

Objection 1. For our Lord gave the counsel of perfection to the young man who said that he had kept the commandments from his youth (Matt. 19. 20). Now all religious orders originate from Christ. Therefore it would seem that none should be allowed to enter religion but those who are practised in the observance of the commandments.

Obj. 2. Further, Gregory says (Hom. iii in Ezech.):⁵ "No one comes suddenly to the summit; but he must make a beginning of a good life in the smallest matters, so as to accomplish great things." Now the great things are the counsels which pertain to the perfection of life, while the lesser things are the commandments which belong to common justice. Therefore it would seem that one ought not to enter religion for the purpose of keeping the counsels unless one be already practised in the observance of the precepts.

Obj. 3. Further, The religious state, like the holy orders, has a place of eminence in the Church. Now, as Gregory writes to Syagrius, a bishop of Gaul (Regist. ix Ep. cvi),¹ and it is quoted in the Decretals,² "order should be observed in ascending to orders. For he seeks a fall who aspires to mount to the summit by overpassing the steps. And we are well aware that walls when built receive not the weight of the beams until the new fabric is rid of its moisture, lest if they should be burdened with weight before they are seasoned they bring down the whole building." Therefore it would seem that one should not enter religion unless one be practised in the observance of the precepts.

Obj. 4. Further, A gloss on Ps. 130. 2, As a child that is weaned is towards his mother, says.³ "First we are conceived in the womb of Mother Church, by being taught the rudiments of faith. Then we are nourished as it were in her womb, by progressing in those same elements. Afterwards we are brought forth to the light by being regenerated in baptism. Then the Church bears us as it were in her hands and feeds us with milk, when after baptism we are instructed in good works and are nourished with the milk of simple doctrine while we progress; until having grown out of infancy we leave our mother's milk for a father's control, that is to say, we pass from simple doctrine, by which we are taught the Word made flesh, to the Word that was in the beginning with God." Afterwards he goes on to say: "For those who are just baptized on Holy Saturday are borne in the hands of the Church as it were and fed with milk until Pentecost, during which time nothing arduous is prescribed, no fasts, no rising at midnight. Afterwards they are confirmed by the Paraclete Spirit, and being weaned so to speak, begin to fast and keep other difficult observances. Many, like the heretics and schismatics, have perverted this order by being weaned before the time. Hence they have come to naught." Now this order is apparently perverted by those who enter religion, or induce others to enter religion, before they are practised in the easier observance of the commandments. Therefore they would seem to be heretics or schismatics.

³ Glossa ordin. (III, 284A); Glossa Lombardi (PL 191, 1172).

Obj. 5. Further, One should proceed from that which precedes to that which follows after. Now the commandments precede the counsels, because they are more universal, for the implication of the one by the other is not convertible, since whoever keeps the counsels keeps the commandments, but the converse does not hold. Seeing then that the right order requires one to pass from that which comes first to that which comes after, it follows that one ought not to pass to the observance of the counsels in religion without being first of all practised in the observance of the commandments.

On the contrary, Matthew the publican who was not practised in the observance of the commandments was called by our Lord to the observance of the counsels. For it is stated (Luke 5. 28) that leaving all things he . . . followed Him. Therefore it is not necessary for a person to be practised in the observance of the commandments before passing to the perfection of the counsels.

I answer that, As shown above (Q. CLXXXVIII, A. 1), the religious state is a spiritual exercising for the attainment of the perfection of charity. This is accomplished through the removal of the obstacles to perfect charity by religious observances; and these obstacles are those things which attach man's affections to earthly things. Now the attachment of man's affections to earthly things is not only an obstacle to the perfection of charity, but sometimes leads to the loss of charity when through turning inordinately to temporal goods man turns away from the immutable good by sinning mortally. Hence it is evident that the observances of the religious state, while removing the obstacles to perfect charity, remove also the occasions of sin; for instance, it is clear that fasting, watching, obedience, and the like withdraw man from sins of gluttony and lust and all other manner of sins.

Consequently it is right that not only those who are practised in the observance of the commandments should enter religion in order to attain to yet greater perfection, but also those who are not practised, in order the more easily to avoid sin and attain to perfection.

Reply Obj. 1. Jerome commenting on Matt. 19. 20, All these have I kept, says:⁴ "The young man lies when he says: All these have I kept from my youth. For if he had fulfilled this one of the commandments: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, why did he go away sad when he heard: Go, sell all that thou hast and give to the poor?" But this means that he lied as to the perfect observance of this commandment. Hence Origen says (Tract. viii, super Matt.)¹ that "it is written in the Gospel according to the Hebrews that when our Lord had said to him: 'Go, sell all thou hast,' the rich man began to scratch his head; and that our Lord said to him: How sayest thou: I have fulfilled the law and the prophets, seeing that it is written in the law: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself? Behold many of thy brethren, children of Abraham, are clothed in filth, and die of hunger, whilst thy house is full of all manner of good things, and nothing whatever hath passed thence to them. And thus our Lord reproves him saying: If thou wilt be perfect, go, etc. For it is impossible to fulfil the commandment which says, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, and to be rich, especially to have such great wealth." This also refers to the perfect fulfilment of this precept. On the other hand, it is true that he kept the commandments imperfectly and in a general way. For perfection consists chiefly in the observance of the precepts of charity, as stated above (Q. CLXXXIV, A. 3). Therefore in order to show that the perfection of the counsels is useful both to the innocent and to sinners, our Lord called not only the innocent youth but also the sinner Matthew. Yet Matthew obeyed His call, and the youth obeyed not, because sinners are converted to the religious life more easily than those who presume on their innocency. It is to the former that our Lord says (Matt. 21. 31): The publicans and the harlots shall go into the kingdom of God before you.

Reply Obj. 2. The highest and the lowest place can be taken in three ways. First, in reference to the same state and the same man; and thus it is evident that no one comes to the summit suddenly, since every man that lives rightly, progresses during the whole course of his life, so as to arrive at the summit. Secondly, in comparison with various states, and thus he who desires to reach a higher state need not begin from a lower state; for instance, if a man wish to be a cleric he need not first of all be practised in the life of a layman. Thirdly, in comparison with different persons; and in this way it is clear that one man begins straightway not only from a higher state, but even from a higher degree of holiness, than the highest degree to which another man attains throughout his whole life. Hence Gregory says (Dial. ii, 1):² "All are agreed that the boy Benedict began at a high degree of grace and perfection in his daily life."

Reply Obj. 3. As stated above (Q. CLXXXIV, AA. 6, 8) holiness is a prerequisite to holy orders, but the religious state is a school for the attainment of holiness. Hence the burden of orders should be laid on the walls when these are already seasoned with holiness, whereas the burden of religion seasons the walls, that is men, by drawing out the damp of vice.

Reply Obj. 4. It is manifest from the words of this gloss that it is chiefly a question of the order of doctrine, in so far as one has to pass from easy matter to that which is more difficult. Hence it is clear from what follows that the statement that certain heretics and schismatics have perverted this order refers to the order of doctrine. For it continues thus: "But he says that he has kept these things," namely the aforesaid order, "binding himself by an oath. Thus I was humble not only in other things but also in knowledge, for 'I was humbly minded'; because I was first of all fed with milk, which is the Word made flesh, so that I grew up to partake of the bread of angels, namely the Word that is in the beginning with God." The example which is given in proof, of the newly baptized not being commanded to fast until Pentecost, shows that no difficult things are to be laid on them as an obligation before the Holy Ghost inspires them inwardly to take upon themselves difficult things of their own choice. Hence after Pentecost and the receiving of the Holy Ghost the Church observes a fast. Now the Holy Ghost (according to Ambrose in his commentary on Luke 1. 15, He shall be filled with the Holy Ghost)³ "is not confined to any particular age; He ceases not when men die, He is not excluded from the maternal womb." Gregory also in a homily for Pentecost (xxx in Ev.)⁴ says: "He fills the boy harpist and makes him a psalmist; He fills the boy abstainer and makes him a wise judge"⁵ and afterwards he adds: "No time is needed to learn whatsoever He will, for He teaches the mind by the merest touch." Again it is written (Eccles. 8. 8), It is not in man's power to stop the Spirit, and the Apostle admonishes us (I Thess. 5. 19): Extinguish not the Spirit, and (Acts 7. 51) it is said against certain persons: You always resist the Holy Ghost.

Reply Obj. 5. There are certain chief precepts which are the ends, so to say, of the commandments and counsels. These are the precepts of charity, and the counsels are directed to them, not that these precepts cannot be observed without keeping the counsels, but that the keeping of the counsels conduces to the better observance of the precepts. The other precepts are secondary and are directed to the precepts of charity, in such a way that unless one observe them it is altogether impossible to keep the precepts of charity.

Accordingly in the intention the perfect observance of the precepts of charity precedes the counsels, and yet sometimes it follows them in point of time. For such is the order of the end in relation to things directed to the end. But the observance in a general way of the precepts of charity together with the other precepts is compared to the counsels as the common to the proper, because one can observe the precepts without observing the counsels, but not vice versa. Hence the common observance of the precepts precedes the counsels in the order of nature; but it does not follow that it precedes them in point of time, for a thing is not in the genus before being in one of the species. But the observance of the precepts apart from the counsels is directed to the observance of the precepts together with the counsels, just as an imperfect to a perfect species, even as the irrational to the rational animal. Now the perfect is naturally prior to the imperfect, since nature as Boëthius says (De Consol. iii, 10)¹ begins with perfect things. And yet it is not necessary for the precepts first of all to be observed without the counsels, and afterwards with the counsels, just as it is not necessary for one to be an ass before being a man, or married before being a virgin. In like manner it is not necessary for a person first of all to keep the commandments in the world before entering religion; especially as the worldly life does not dispose one to religious perfection, but is rather an obstacle to it.

ARTICLE 2. Whether One Ought To Be Bound by Vow To Enter Religion?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It seems that one ought not to be bound by vow to enter religion.

Objection 1. For in making his profession a man is bound by the religious vow. Now before profession a year of probation is allowed, according to the rule of the Blessed Benedict (cap. 58),² and according to the decree of Innocent III. (cap. Nullus, de Regular. et Tran- seunt, etc.),³ who moreover forbade anyone to be bound to the religious life by profession before completing the year of probation. Therefore it would seem that much less ought anyone while yet in the world to be bound by vow to enter religion.

Obj. 2. Further, Gregory says,⁴ and it is quoted in the Decretals,⁵ that Jews "should be persuaded to be converted, not by compulsion but of their own free will." Now one is compelled to fulfil what one has vowed. Therefore no one should be bound by vow to enter religion.

Obj. 3. Further, No one should give another an occasion of falling; therefore it is written (Exod. 21. 33, 34): If a man open a pit . . . and an ox or an ass fall into it, the owner of the pit shall pay the price of the beasts. Now through being bound by vow to enter religion it often happens that people fall into despair and various sins. Therefore it would seem that one ought not to be bound by vow to enter religion.

On the contrary, It is written (Ps. 75. 12): Vow ye, and pay to the Lord your God; and a gloss says⁶ that "some vows concern the individual, such as vows of chastity, virginity, and the like." Consequently Holy Scripture invites us to vow these things. But Holy Scripture invites us only to that which is better. Therefore it is better to bind oneself by vow to enter religion.

I answer that, As stated above (q. LXXXVIII, A. 6), when we were treating of vows, one and the same work done in fulfilment of a vow is more praiseworthy than if it be done apart from a vow, both because to vow is an act of religion, which has a certain pre-eminence among the virtues, and because a vow strengthens a man's will to do good; and just as a sin is more grievous through proceeding from a will obstinate in evil, so a good work is more praiseworthy through proceeding from a will confirmed in good by means of a vow. Therefore it is in itself praiseworthy to bind oneself by vow to enter religion.

Reply Obj. 1. The religious vow is twofold. One is the solemn vow which makes a man a monk or a brother in some other religious order. This is called the profession, and such a vow should be preceded by a year's probation, as the Objection proves. The other is the simple vow which does not make a man a monk or a religious, but only binds him to enter religion, and such a vow need not be preceded by a year's probation.

Reply Obj. 2. The words quoted from Gregory must be understood as referring to absolute violence. But the compulsion arising from the obligation of a vow is not absolute necessity, but a necessity of end, because after such a vow one cannot attain to the end of salvation unless one fulfil that vow. Such a necessity is not to be avoided; indeed, as Augustine says to Armentarius and Paulina (Ep. cxxvii),¹ "happy is the necessity that compels us to better things."

Reply Obj. 3. The vow to enter religion is a strengthening of the will for better things, and consequently, considered in itself, instead of giving a man an occasion of falling, withdraws him from it. But if one who breaks a vow falls more grievously, this does not derogate from the goodness of the vow, as neither does it derogate from the goodness of Baptism that some sin more grievously after being baptized.

ARTICLE 3 Whether One Who Is Bound by a Vow To Enter Religion Is Under an Obligation of Entering Religion?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that one who is bound by the vow to enter religion is not under an obligation of entering religion.

Objection 1. For it is said in the Decretals (xvii, q. ii, cap. 1):² "Gonsaldus, a priest under pressure of sickness and emotional fervour, promised to become a monk. He did not, however, bind himself to a monastery or abbot; nor did he commit his promise to writing, but he renounced his benefice in the hands of a notary; and when he was restored to health he refused to become a monk." And afterwards it is added "We adjudge and by apostolic authority we command that the aforesaid priest be admitted to his benefice and sacred duties, and that he be allowed to retain them in peace." Now this would not be if he were bound to enter religion. Therefore it would seem that one is not bound to keep one's vow of entering religion.

Obj. 2. Further, No one is bound to do what is not in his power. Now it is not in a person's power to enter religion, since this depends on the consent of those whom he wishes to join. Therefore it would seem that a man is not obliged to fulfil the vow by which he bound himself to enter religion.

Obj. 3. Further, A less useful vow cannot remit a more useful one. Now the fulfilment of a vow to enter religion might hinder the fulfilment of a vow to take up the cross in defence of the Holy Land; and the latter apparently is the more useful vow, since thereby a man obtains the forgiveness of his sins. Therefore it would seem that the vow by which a man has bound himself to enter religion is not necessarily to be fulfilled.

On the contrary, It is written (Eccles. 5. 3): If thou hast vowed anything to God, defer not to pay it, for an unfaithful and foolish promise displeaseth him; and a gloss on Ps. 75. 12, Vow ye, and pay to the Lord your God, says:³ "To vow depends on the will; but after the vow has been taken the fulfilment is of obligation."

I answer that, As stated above (q. lxxxviii, a. 1), when we were treating of vows, a vow is a promise made to God in matters concerning God. Now, as Gregory says in his letter to Boniface:⁴ "If among men of good faith contracts are wont to be absolutely irrevocable, how much more shall the breaking of this promise given to God be deserving of punishment!" Therefore a man is under an obligation to fulfil what he has vowed, provided this be something pertaining to God.

Now it is evident that entrance into religion pertains very much to God, since thereby man devotes himself entirely to the divine service, as stated above (q. clxxxvi, a. 1). Hence it follows that he who binds himself to enter religion is under an obligation to enter religion according as he intends to bind himself by his vow, so that if he intend to bind himself absolutely, he is obliged to enter as soon as he can, through the cessation of a lawful impediment; but if he intend to bind himself to a certain fixed time, or under a certain fixed condition, he is bound to enter religion when the time comes or the condition is fulfilled.

Reply Obj. 1. This priest had made not a solemn, but a simple vow. Hence he was not a monk in effect, so as to be bound by law to dwell in a monastery and renounce his cure. However, in the court of conscience one ought to advise him to renounce all and enter religion.

² Cf. Gratian, Decretum, pt. II, xxvii, q. 1, can. 2 (RF I, 1048); see Innocent I, Epist., II, can. 13 (MA III, 1036), or chap. 14 (PL 20, 479).

² Gratian, pt. II (RF I, 813).

Hence (Extrav., De Voto et Voti Redemptione, cap. Per tuas)¹ the Bishop of Grenoble, who had accepted the episcopate after vowing to enter religion, without having fulfilled his vow, is counselled that "if he wish to heal his conscience he should renounce the government of his see and pay his vows to the Most High."

Reply Obj. 2. As stated above (Q. LXXXVIII, A. 3, reply 2), when we were treating of vows, he who has bound himself by vow to enter a certain religious order is bound to do what is in his power in order to be received in that order; and if he intend to bind himself absolutely to enter the religious life, if he be not admitted to one he is bound to go to another; but if he intend to bind himself only to one particular order, he is bound only according to the measure of the obligation to which he has engaged himself.

Reply Obj. 3. The vow to enter religion being perpetual is greater than the vow of pilgrimage to the Holy Land, which is a temporal vow; and as Alexander III. says,² "he who exchanges a temporary service for the perpetual service of religion is in no way guilty of breaking his vow." Moreover it may be reasonably stated that also by entrance into religion a man obtains remission of all his sins. For if by giving alms a man may at once satisfy for his sins, according to Dan. 4. 24, Redeem thou thy sins with alms, much more does it suffice to satisfy for all his sins that a man devote himself wholly to the divine service by entering religion, for this surpasses all manner of satisfaction, even that of public penance, according to the Decretals (XXXIII, Q. 1, cap. Admonere)³ just as a holocaust exceeds a sacrifice, as Gregory declares (Hom. viii in Ezech.)⁴ Hence we read in the Lives of the Fathers (VI., 1. No. 9)⁵ that by entering religion one receives the same grace as by being baptized. And yet even if one were not thereby absolved from all debt of punishment, nevertheless the entrance into religion is more profitable than a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, which, as regards the advancement in good, is preferable to absolution from punishment.

ARTICLE 4. Whether He Who Has Vowed To Enter Religion Is Bound To Remain in Religion in Perpetuity?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that he who has vowed to enter religion is bound in perpetuity to remain in religion.

Objection 1. For it is better not to enter religion than to leave after entering, according to II Pet. 2. 21, It had been better for them not to have known the way of justice, than after they have known it to turn back, and Luke 9. 62, No man putting his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God. But he who bound himself by the vow to enter religion, is under the obligation to enter, as stated above (A. 3). Therefore he is also bound to remain for always.

Obj. 2. Further, Everyone is bound to avoid that which gives rise to scandal, and is a bad example to others. Now by leaving after entering religion a man gives a bad example and is an occasion of scandal to others, who are thereby withdrawn from entering or incited to leave. Therefore it seems that he who enters religion in order to fulfil a vow which he had previously taken, is bound to remain evermore.

Obj. 3. Further, The vow to enter religion is accounted a perpetual vow; hence it is preferred to temporal vows, as stated above (A. 3, reply 3; Q. LXXXVIII, A. 12, reply 1). But this would not be so if a person after vowing to enter religion were to enter with the intention of leaving. It seems, therefore, that he who vows to enter religion is bound also to remain in perpetuity.

On the contrary, the vow of profession, for the reason that it binds a man to remain in religion for evermore, prerequisites a year of probation; but this is not required previously to the simple vow whereby a man binds himself to enter religion. Therefore it seems that he who vows to enter religion is not for that reason bound to remain there in perpetuity.

I answer that, The obligation of a vow proceeds from the will, because to vow is an act of the will according to Augustine (super Ps. 75).⁶ Consequently the obligation of a vow extends as far as the will and intention of the person who takes the vow. Accordingly if in vowing he intend to bind himself not only to enter religion, but also to remain there evermore, he is bound to remain in perpetuity. If, on the other hand, he intend to bind himself to enter religion for the purpose of trial, while retaining the freedom to remain or not remain, it is clear that he is not bound to remain. If, however, in vowing he thought merely of entering religion, without thinking of being free to leave, or of remaining in perpetuity, it would seem that he is bound to enter religion according to the form prescribed by common law, which is that those who enter should be given a year's probation. Therefore he is not bound to remain for ever.

⁶ PL 36, 967; cf. Epist., CXXVII, PL 33, 487, this text is quoted also by Albert the Great, In Sent., IV, d. 38, A. 1 (BO XXX, 396); cf. Wm. of Auxerre, Summa Aurea, pt. IV, tr. 22, chap. 1, Q. 1 (230vb), Bonaventure, In Sent., IV, d. 38, A. 1, Q. 2, arg. 1 (QR IV, 816); Glossa Lombardi (PL 191, 709).

Reply Obj. 1. It is better to enter religion with the purpose of making a trial than not to enter at all, because by so doing one disposes oneself to remain always. Nor is a person accounted to turn or to look back save when he omits to do that which he engaged to do; otherwise whoever does a good work for a time would be unfit for the kingdom of God unless he did it always, which is evidently false.

Reply Obj. 2. A man who has entered religion gives neither scandal nor bad example by leaving, especially if he do so for a reasonable motive; and if others are scandalized, it will be passive scandal on their part, and not active scandal on the part of the person leaving, since in doing so, he has done what was lawful, and expedient on account of some reasonable motive, such as sickness, weakness, and the like.

Reply Obj. 3. He who enters with the purpose of leaving immediately does not seem to fulfil his vow, since this was not his intention in vowing. Hence he must change that purpose, at least so as to wish to try whether it is good for him to remain in religion, but he is not bound to remain for evermore.

ARTICLE 5. Whether Children Should Be Received in Religion?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that children ought not to be received in religion.

Objection 1. Because it is said (Extrav., De Regular. et Transeunt. ad Relig., cap. 1):¹ "No one should be tonsured unless he be of legal age and willing." But children, it seems, are not of legal age, nor have they a will of their own, not having perfect use of reason. Therefore it seems that they ought not to be received in religion.

Obj. 2. Further, The state of religion would seem to be a state of repentance; hence religion is derived from religare (to bind) or from reeligere (to choose again), as Augustine says.²

But repentance does not befit children. Therefore it seems that they should not enter religion.

Obj. 3. Further, The obligation of a vow is like that of an oath. But children under the age of fourteen ought not to be bound by oath (Decret. xxii, q. v, cap. Pueri and cap. Honestum).³ Therefore it would seem that neither should they be bound by vow.

Obj. 4. Further, It seems to be unlawful to bind a person to an obligation that can be justly cancelled. Now if any persons of unripe age bind themselves to religion they can be withdrawn by their parents or guardians. For it is written in the Decretals (xx, q. ii, cap. 2)⁴ that "if a maid under twelve years of age shall take the sacred veil of her own accord, her parents or guardians, if they choose, can at once declare the deed null and void." It is therefore unlawful for children, especially of unripe age, to be admitted or bound to religion.

On the contrary, Our Lord said (Matt. 19, 14): Suffer the little children, and forbid them not to come to Me. Expounding these words Origen says (Tract. xv in Matt.)⁵ that the disciples of Jesus before they have been taught the conditions of justice rebuke those who offer children and babes to Christ, but our Lord urges His disciples to stoop to the service of children. We must therefore take note of this, lest deeming ourselves to excel in wisdom we despise the Church's little ones, as though we were great, and forbid the children to come to Jesus.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 2, reply 1) the religious vow is twofold. One is the simple vow consisting in a mere promise made to God, and proceeding from the interior deliberation of the mind. Such a vow derives its efficacy from the divine law. Nevertheless it may encounter a twofold obstacle. First, through lack of deliberation, as in the case of the insane, whose vows are not binding, as stated in Extrav., De Regular. et Transeunt. ad Relig., cap. Sicut tenor.⁶ The same applies to children who have not reached the required use of reason, so as to be capable of guile, which use boys attain, as a rule, at about the age of fourteen, and girls at the age of twelve, this being what is called the age of puberty, although in some it comes earlier and in others it is delayed, according to the various dispositions of nature. Secondly, the efficacy of a simple vow encounters an obstacle if the person who makes a vow to God is not his own master; for instance, if a slave, though having the use of reason, vows to enter religion, or even is ordained, without the knowledge of his master; for his master can annul this, as stated in the Decretals (Dist. LIV, cap. Si servus).¹ And since boys and girls under the age of puberty are naturally in their father's power as regards the disposal of their manner of life, their father may either cancel or approve their vow, if it please him to do so, as it is expressly said with regard to a woman (Num. 30. 4).

Accordingly if before reaching the age of puberty a child makes a simple vow, not yet having full use of reason, he is not bound in virtue of the vow; but if he has the use of reason before reaching the age of puberty, he is bound, so far as he is concerned, by his vow; yet this obligation may be removed by his father's authority, under whose control he still remains, because the ordinance of the law whereby one man is subject to another considers what happens in the majority of cases. If, however, the child has passed the age of puberty, his vow cannot be annulled by the authority of his parents, though if he has not the full use of reason, he would not be bound in the sight of God.

The other is the solemn vow which makes a man a monk or a religious. Such a vow is subject to the ordinance of the Church, on account of the solemnity attached to it. And since the Church considers what happens in the majority of cases, a profession made before the age of puberty, however much the person who makes profession may have the use of reason, or be capable of guile, does not take effect so as to make him a religious. Nevertheless, although they cannot be professed before the age of puberty, they can, with the consent of their parents, be received into religion to be educated there; thus it is related of John the Baptist (Luke 1. 80) that the child grew and was strengthened in spirit, and was in the deserts. Hence, as Gregory states (Dial. ii, 3),² "the Roman nobles began to give their sons to the blessed Benedict to be nurtured for Almighty God"; and this is most fitting, according to Lament. 3. 27, It is good for a man when he has borne the yoke from his youth. It is for this reason that by common custom children are made to apply themselves to those duties or arts with which they are to pass their lives.

Reply Obj. 1. The legal age for receiving the tonsure and taking the solemn vow of religion is the age of puberty, when a man is able to make use of his own will; but before the age of puberty it is possible to have reached the lawful age to receive the tonsure and be educated in a religious house.

Reply Obj. 2. The religious state is chiefly directed to the attainment of perfection, as stated above (Q. CLXXXVI, A. 1, reply 4); and accordingly it is befitting to children, who are easily drawn to it. But as a consequence it is called a state of repentance, since occasions of sin are removed by religious observances, as stated above (Q. CLXXXVI, A. 1, reply 4).

Reply Obj. 3. Even as children are not bound to take oaths (as the canon states), so are they not bound to take vows. If, however, they bind themselves by vow or oath to do something, they are bound in God's sight if they have the use of reason, but they are not bound in the sight of the Church before reaching the age of fourteen.

Reply Obj. 4. A woman who has not reached the age of puberty is not rebuked (Num. 30. 4) for taking a vow without the consent of her parents. Hence it is evident that she does not sin in vowing. But we are given to understand that she binds herself by vow, so far as she is concerned, without prejudice to her parents' authority.

ARTICLE 6. Whether One Ought To Be Withdrawn from Entering Religion through Deference to One's Parents?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that one ought to be withdrawn from entering religion through deference to one's parents.

Objection 1. For it is not lawful to omit that which is of obligation in order to do that which is of free choice. Now deference to one's parents comes under an obligation of the precept concerning the honouring of our parents (Exod. 20. 12); hence the Apostle says (I Tim. 5. 4): If any widow have children or grandchildren, let her learn first to govern her own house, and to make a return of duty to her parents. But the entrance to religion is of free choice. Therefore it would seem that one ought not to omit deference to one's parents for the sake of entering religion.

Obj. 2. Further, the subjection of a son to his father seems to be greater than that of a slave to his master, since sonship is natural, while slavery results from the curse of sin, as appears from Gen. 9. 25. Now a slave cannot set aside the service of his master in order to enter religion or take holy orders, as stated in the Decretals (Dist. Lrv., cap. Si servus).¹ Much less therefore can a son set aside the deference due to his father in order to enter religion.

Obj. 3. Further, A man is more indebted to his parents than to those to whom he owes money. Now persons who owe money to anyone cannot enter religion. For Gregory says (Regist. viii, Indict. i, Ep. 5)² and it is quoted in the Decretals,³ that "those who are engaged in public business must by no means be admitted into a monastery, when they seek admittance, unless first of all they withdraw from public traffic." Therefore it seems that much less may children enter religion in despite of their duty to their parents.

On the contrary, It is related (Matt. 4. 22) that James and John left their nets and father, and followed our Lord. "By this," says Hilary (Can. iii in Matt.)⁴ "we learn that we who intend to follow Christ are not bound by the cares of the secular life, and by the ties of home."

I answer that, As stated above (Q. CI. A. 2, reply 2) when we were treating of piety, parents as such have the character of a principle, and therefore it belongs to them as such to have the care of their children. Hence it is unlawful for a person having children to enter religion so as altogether to set aside the care for their children, namely without providing for their education. For it is written (I Tim. 5. 8) that if any man have not care of his own . . . he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel.

However it accidentally belongs to parents to be assisted by their children, in so far, that is, as they are placed in a condition of necessity. Consequently we must say that when their parents are in such need that they cannot fittingly be supported otherwise than by the help of their children, these latter may not lawfully enter religion in despite of their duty to their parents. If, however, the parents' necessity be not such as to stand in great need of their children's assistance, the latter may, in despite of the duty they owe their parents, enter religion even against their parents' command, because after the age of puberty every freeman enjoys freedom in things concerning the disposition of his state of life, especially in such as belong to the service of God, and we should more obey the Father of spirits that we may live, as says the Apostle (Heb. 12. 9), than obey our parents. Hence as we read (Matt. 8. 22; Luke 9. 62) our Lord rebuked the disciple who was unwilling to follow him at once on account of his father's burial, for there were others who could see to this, as Chrysostom remarks (Hom. xxvii in Matt.).⁵

Reply Obj. 1. The commandment of honouring our parents extends not only to bodily but also to spiritual service, and to the paying of deference. Hence even those who are in religion can fulfil the commandment of honouring their parents, by praying for them and by revering and assisting them, as becomes religious, since even those who live in the world honour their parents in different ways as befits their condition.

Reply Obj. 2. Since slavery was imposed in punishment of sin, it follows that by slavery man forfeits something which otherwise would belong to him, namely the free disposal of his person, for a slave, as regards what he is, belongs to his master. On the other hand, the son, through being subject to his father, is not hindered from freely disposing of his person by transferring himself to the service of God, which is most conducive to man's good.

Reply Obj. 3. He who is under a certain fixed obligation cannot lawfully set it aside so long as he is able to fulfil it. Therefore if a person is under an obligation to give an account to someone or to pay a certain fixed debt, he cannot lawfully evade this obligation in order to enter religion. If, however, he owes a sum of money, and has not wherewithal to pay the debt, he must do what he can, namely by surrendering his goods to his creditor. According to civil law (Lib. Ob. Es)⁶ money lays an obligation not on the person of a freeman, but on his property, because the person of a freeman is above all valuation in money. Hence, after surrendering his property, he may lawfully enter religion, nor is he bound to remain in the world in order to earn the means of paying the debt. On the other hand, he does not owe his father a special debt, except as may arise in a case of necessity, as stated above.

ARTICLE 7. Whether Parish Priests May Lawfully Enter Religion?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It would seem that parish priests cannot lawfully enter religion.

¹ Gratian, pt. I, can. 20 (RF I, 213).

² PL 77, 910.

³ Gratian, pt. I, d. LIII, can. 1 (RF I, 206).

⁴ PL 9, 931.

⁶ Codex, bk. IV, tit. x, leg. 12.

Objection 1. For Gregory says (Past. iii)¹ that he who undertakes the cure of souls, "receives an awful warning in the words: 'My son, if thou be surety for thy friend, thou hast engaged fast thy hand to a stranger'" (Prov. 6. 1); and he goes on to say, "because to be surety for a friend is to take charge of the soul of another on the surety of one's own behaviour." Now he who is under an obligation to a man for a debt cannot enter religion, unless he pay what he owes, if he can (A. 6, obj. 3). Since then a priest is able to work for the care of souls, to which obligation he has pledged his soul, it would seem unlawful for him to lay aside the care of souls in order to enter religion.

Obj. 2. Further, What is lawful to one is likewise lawful to all. But if all priests having care of souls were to enter religion, the people would be left without a pastor's care, which would be unfitting. Therefore it seems that parish priests cannot lawfully enter religion.

Obj. 3. Further, Chief among the acts to which religious orders are directed are those whereby a man gives to others the fruit of his contemplation. Now such acts are appropriate to parish priests and archdeacons, to whom it pertains by virtue of their office to preach and hear confessions. Therefore it would seem unlawful for a parish priest or archdeacon to pass over to religion.

On the contrary, It is said in the Decretals (xix, q. ii, cap. Due sunt leges.):² "If a man, while governing the people in his church under the bishop and leading a secular life, is inspired by the Holy Ghost to desire to work out his salvation in a monastery or under some canonical rule, even though his bishop withstand him, we authorize him to go freely."

I answer that, As stated above (A. 3, reply 3; q. lxxxviii, A. 12, reply 1), the obligation of a perpetual vow stands before every other obligation. Now it belongs properly to bishops and religious to be bound by perpetual vow to devote themselves to the divine service, while parish priests and archdeacons are not, as bishops are, bound by a perpetual and solemn vow to retain the care of souls. Therefore bishops cannot lay aside their bishopric for any pretext whatever, without the authority of the Roman Pontiff (Extrav., De Regular. et Trans-eunt., ad Relig., cap. Licet.);³ archdeacons and parish priests however are free to renounce in the hands of the bishop the care entrusted to them, without the Pope's special permission, who alone can dispense from perpetual vows. Therefore it is evident that archdeacons and parish priests may lawfully enter religion.

Reply Obj. 1. Parish priests and archdeacons have bound themselves to the care of their subjects as long as they retain their archdeaconry or parish, but they did not bind themselves to retain their archdeaconry or parish forever.

Reply Obj. 2. As Jerome says (Contra Vigil. vi, Multa in Orbe):⁴ "Although they," namely religious, "are sorely smitten by thy poisonous tongue, about whom you argue, saying: 'If all shut themselves up and live in solitude, who will go to church? who will convert worldlings? who will be able to urge sinners to virtue?' If this holds true, if all are fools with thee, who can be wise? Nor will virginity be commendable, for if all be virgins, and none marry, the human race will perish. Virtue is rare, and is not desired by many." It is therefore evident that this is a foolish fear; thus might a man fear to draw water lest the river run dry.

ARTICLE 8. Whether It Is Lawful To Pass from One Religious Order to Another?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It seems unlawful to pass from one religious order to another, even a stricter one.

Objection 1. For the Apostle says (Heb. 10. 25): Not forsaking our assembly, as some are accustomed; and a gloss observes:⁵ "Those namely who yield through fear of persecution, or who presuming on themselves withdraw from the company of sinners or of the imperfect, that they may appear to be righteous." Now those who pass from one religious order to another more perfect one would seem to do this. Therefore it seems that this is unlawful.

Obj. 2. Further, The profession of monks is stricter than that of canons regular (Extrav., De Statu Monach. and Canon Reg., cap. Quod Dei timorem.)⁶ But it is unlawful for anyone to pass from the state of canon regular to the monastic state. For it is said in the Decretals (xix, q. iii, 2):⁷ "We ordain and without any exception forbid any professed canon regular to become a monk, unless (which God forbid) he have fallen into public sin." Therefore it would seem unlawful for anyone to pass from one religious order to another of higher rank.

³ Decretal Gregor., ix, bk. iii, tit. xxxi, chap. 18 (RF ii, 576).

Obj. 3. Further, A person is bound to fulfil what he has vowed, as long as he is able lawfully to fulfil it; thus if a man has vowed to observe continence, he is bound, even after contracting marriage by words in the present tense, to fulfil his vow so long as the marriage is not consummated, because he can fulfil the vow by entering religion. Therefore if a person may lawfully pass from one religious order to another he will be bound to do so if he vowed it previously while in the world. But this would seem objectionable, since in many cases it might give rise to scandal. Therefore a religious may not pass from one religious order to another stricter one.

On the contrary, It is said in the Decretals (xx, q. iv, 1):¹ "If holy virgins design for the good of their soul to pass to another monastery on account of a stricter life, and decide to remain there, the holy synod allows them to do so"; and the same would seem to apply to any religious. Therefore one may lawfully pass from one religious order to another.

I answer that. It is not commendable to pass from one religious order to another apart from the case of great usefulness or necessity: both because this frequently gives scandal to those who remain; and because, other things being equal, it is easier to make progress in a religious order to which one is accustomed than in one to which one is not habituated. Hence in the Conferences of the Fathers (Coll. xiv, 5)² Abbot Nesteros says: "It is best for each one that he should, according to the resolve he has made, hasten with the greatest zeal and care to reach the perfection of the work he has undertaken, and in no way forsake the profession he has chosen." And further on he adds (cap. 6) by way of reason: "For it is impossible that one and the same man should excel in all the virtues at once, since if he endeavour to practise them equally, he will of necessity, while trying to attain them all, end in acquiring none of them perfectly," because the various religious orders excel in respect of various works of virtue.

Nevertheless one may commendably pass from one religious order to another for three reasons. First, through zeal for a more perfect religious life, which excellence depends, as stated above (q. CLXXXVIII, A. 6), not merely on severity, but chiefly on the end to which a religious order is directed, and secondarily on the discretion whereby the observances are proportionate to the due end. Secondly, on account of a religious order falling away from the perfection it ought to have; for instance, if in a more severe religious order, the religious begin to live less strictly, it is commendable for one to pass even to a less severe religious order if the observance is better. Hence in the Conferences of the Fathers (Coll. xix, 3, 5)³ Abbot John says of himself that he had passed from the solitary life, in which he was professed, to a less severe life, namely of those who lived in community, because the hermitical life had begun to fall into decline and laxity. Thirdly, on account of sickness or weakness, the result of which sometimes is that one is unable to keep the ordinances of a more severe religious order, though able to observe those of a less strict religion.

There may be, however, a difference in these three cases. For in the first case one ought, on account of humility, to seek permission, which however, cannot be denied, provided it be certain that this other religion is more severe. And if there be a doubt about this, one should ask one's superior to decide (Extrav., De Regular. et Transeunt, ad Relig. cap. Licet).⁴ In like manner the superior's decision should be sought in the second case. In the third case it is also necessary to have a dispensation.

Reply Obj. 1. Those who pass to a stricter religious order, do so not out of presumption that they may appear just, but out of devotion, that they may become more just.

Reply Obj. 2. Religious orders whether of monks or of canons regular are ordered to the works of the contemplative life. Chief among these are those which are performed in the divine mysteries, and these are the direct object of the orders of canons regular, the members of which are essentially religious clerics. On the other hand, monastic religious are not essentially clerics, according to the Decretals (Causa xvi, q. 1, cap. Nemo potest and cap. Alia causa).⁵ Hence although monastic orders are more severe, it would be lawful, supposing the members to be lay monks, to pass from the monastic order to an order of canons regular, according to the statement of Jerome to the monk Rusticus:⁶ "So live in the monastery as to deserve to become a cleric"; but not conversely, as expressed in the Decretal quoted.⁷ If, however, the monks be clerics devoting themselves to the sacred ministry, they have this in common with canons regular coupled with greater severity, and consequently it will be lawful to pass from an order of canons regular to a monastic order, provided however that one seek the superior's permission (XIX, Q. III, cap. Statuimus ii).¹

Reply Obj. 3. The solemn vow whereby a person is bound to a less strict order is more binding than the simple vow whereby a person is bound to a stricter order. For if after taking a simple vow a person were to be married, his marriage would not be invalid, as it would be after taking a solemn vow. Consequently a person who is professed in a less severe order is not bound to fulfil a simple vow he has taken on entering a more severe order.

ARTICLE 9. Whether One Ought To Induce Others To Enter Religion?

We proceed thus to the Ninth Article: It seems that no one ought to induce others to enter religion.

Objection 1. For the blessed Benedict prescribes in his Rule (cap. 58)² that "those who seek to enter religion must not easily be admitted, but spirits must be tested whether they be of God"; and Cassian has the same instruction (De Inst. Canob. iv, 3).³ Much less therefore is it lawful to induce anyone to enter religion.

Obj. 2. Further, Our Lord said (Matt. 23. 15): Woe to you . . . because you go round about the sea and the land to make one proselyte and when he is made you make him the child of hell twofold more than yourselves. Now thus would seem to do those who induce persons to enter religion. Therefore this would seem blameworthy.

Obj. 3. Further, No one should induce another to do what is to his prejudice. But those who are induced to enter religion sometimes take harm from it, for sometimes they are under obligation to enter a stricter religion. Therefore it would not seem praiseworthy to induce others to enter religion.

On the contrary, It is written (Exod. 26. 3 seqq.): Let one curtain draw the other. Therefore one man should draw another to God's service.

I answer that, Those who induce others to enter religion not only do not sin, but merit a great reward. For it is written (James 5. 20): He who causeth a sinner to be converted from the error of his way, shall save his soul from death, and shall cover a multitude of sins; and (Dan. 12. 3): They that instruct many to justice shall be as stars for all eternity.

Nevertheless such inducement may be affected by a threefold lack of order. First, if one person force another by violence to enter religion, and this is forbidden in the Decretals (xx, Q. III, cap. Præsens).⁴ Secondly, if one person persuade another simoniacally to enter religion, by giving him presents: and this is forbidden in the same Decretal (Q. II, cap. Quam pios).⁵ But this does not apply to the case where one provides a poor person with necessities by educating him in the world for the religious life; or when without any compact one gives a person little presents for the sake of good fellowship. Thirdly, if one person entices another by lies: for it is to be feared that the person thus enticed may turn back on finding himself deceived, and thus the last state of that man may become worse than the first (Luke 11. 26).

Reply Obj. 1. Those who are induced to enter religion have still a time of probation in which they make a trial of the hardships of religion, so that they are not easily admitted to the religious life.

Reply Obj. 2. According to Hilary (Can. xxiv in Matt.)⁶ this saying of our Lord was a forecast of the wicked endeavours of the Jews, after the preaching of Christ, to draw Gentiles or even Christians to observe the Jewish ritual, thereby making them doubly children of hell, because, namely, they were not forgiven the former sins which they committed while adherents of Judaism, and furthermore they incurred the guilt of Jewish perfidy; and thus interpreted these words have nothing to do with the case in point. According to Jerome, however, in his commentary on this passage of Matthew,⁷ the reference is to the Jews even at the time when it was yet lawful to keep the legal observances, in so far as he whom they converted to Judaism "from paganism, was merely misled; but when he saw the wickedness of his teachers, he returned to his vomit, and becoming a pagan deserved a greater punishment for his treachery." Hence it is manifest that it is not blameworthy to draw others to the service of God or to the religious life, but only when one gives a bad example to the person converted whence he becomes worse.

Reply Obj. 3. The lesser is included in the greater. Therefore a person who is bound by vow or oath to enter a lesser order may be lawfully induced to enter a greater one, unless there be some special obstacle, such as ill-health, or the hope of making greater progress in the lesser order. On the other hand, one who is bound by vow or oath to enter a greater order cannot be lawfully induced to enter a lesser order, except for some special and evident cause, and then with the superior's dispensation.

ARTICLE 10. Whether It Is Praiseworthy To Enter Religion Without Taking Counsel of Many, and Previously Deliberating for a Long Time?

We proceed thus to the Tenth Article: It would not seem praiseworthy to enter religion without taking counsel of many, and previously deliberating for a long time.

Objection 1. For it is written (1 John 4. 1): Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits if they be of God. Now sometimes a man's purpose of entering religion is not of God, since it often comes to nothing through his leaving the religious life, . . . it is written (Acts 5. 39): If this counsel be of God, you cannot overthrow it. Therefore it would seem that one ought to make a searching inquiry before entering religion.

Obj. 2. Further, It is written (Prov. 25. 9): Treat thy cause with thy friend. Now a man's cause would seem to be especially one that concerns a change in his state of life. Therefore it seems that one ought not to enter religion without discussing the matter with one's friends.

Obj. 3. Further, Our Lord (Luke 14. 28) in making a comparison with a man who has a mind to build a tower, says that he doth first sit down and reckon the charges that are necessary, whether he have wherewithal to finish it, lest he become an object of mockery, for that this man began to build and was not able to finish. Now the wherewithal to build the tower, as Augustine says (Ep. ad Lætum, ccxliii),¹ "is nothing less than that each one should renounce all his possessions." Yet it happens sometimes that many cannot do this, nor keep other religious observances; and in figure of this it is stated (1 Kings 17. 39) that David could not walk in Saul's armour, for he was not used to it. Therefore it would seem that one ought not to enter religion without long deliberation beforehand and taking counsel of many.

On the contrary, It is stated (Matt. 4. 20) that upon our Lord's calling them, Peter and

Andrew immediately leaving their nets, followed Him. Hence Chrysostom says (Hom. xiv in Matt.)² "Such obedience as this does Christ require of us, that we delay not even for a moment."

I answer that, Long deliberation and the advice of many are required in great matters of doubt, as the Philosopher says,³ while advice is unnecessary in matters that are certain and fixed. Now with regard to entering religion three points may be considered. First, the entrance itself into religion, considered by itself; and thus it is certain that entrance into religion is a greater good, and to doubt about this is to disparage Christ Who gave this counsel. Hence Augustine says (De Verb. Dom. vii, 2):⁴ "The East, that is Christ, calleth thee, and thou turnest to the West, namely mortal and fallible man." Secondly, the entrance into religion may be considered in relation to the strength of the person who intends to enter. And here again there is no room for doubt about the entrance to religion, since those who enter religion trust not to be able to stay by their own power, but by the assistance of the divine power, according to Isa. 40. 31, They that hope in the Lord shall renew their strength, they shall take wings as eagles, they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint. Yet if there be some special obstacle (such as bodily weakness, a burden of debts, or the like) in such cases a man must deliberate and take counsel with such as are likely to help and not hinder him. Hence it is written (Ecclus. 37. 12): *Treat with a man without religion concerning holiness, with an unjust man concerning justice;*⁵ meaning that one should not do so; hence the text goes on (verses 14, 15), Give no heed to these in any matter of counsel, but be continually with a holy man. In these matters, however, one should not take long deliberation. Therefore Jerome says (Ep. ad Paulin. ciii):⁶ "Hasten, I pray thee, cut off rather than loosen the rope that holds the boat to the shore." Thirdly, we may consider the way of entering religion, and which order one ought to enter, and about such matters also one may take counsel of those who will not stand in one's way.

Reply Obj. 1. The saying: Try the spirits, if they be of God, applies to matters admitting of doubt whether the spirit be of God; thus those who are already in religion may doubt whether he who offers himself to religion be led by the spirit of God, or be moved by hypocrisy. Therefore they must try the postulant whether he be moved by the divine spirit. But for him who seeks to enter religion there can be no doubt but that the purpose of entering religion to which his heart has given birth is from the spirit of God, for it is His spirit that leads man into the land of uprightness (Ps. 142. 10).

Nor does this prove that it is not of God that some turn back, since not all that is of God is incorruptible; otherwise corruptible creatures would not be of God, as the Manicheans hold, nor could some who have grace from God lose it, which is also heretical. But God's counsel whereby He makes even things corruptible and changeable, is imperishable according to Isa. 46. 10, My counsel shall stand and all My will shall be done. Hence the purpose of entering religion needs not to be tried whether it be of God, because it requires no further demonstration, as a gloss says¹ on I Thess. 5. 21, Prove all things.

Reply Obj. 2. Even as the flesh lusteth against the spirit (Gal. 5. 17), so too carnal friends often thwart our spiritual progress, according to Mic. 7. 6, A man's enemies are they of his own household. Therefore Cyril expounding Luke 9. 61, Let me first take my leave of them that are at my house, says:² "By asking first to take leave of them that were at his house, he shows he was somewhat of two minds. For to communicate with his neighbours, and consult those who are unwilling to relish righteousness, is an indication of weakness and turning back. Hence he hears our Lord say: 'No man putting his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God,' because he looks back who seeks delay in order to go home and confer with his kinsfolk."

Reply Obj. 3. The building of the tower signifies the perfection of Christian life, and the renunciation of one's possessions is the wherewithal to build this tower. Now no one doubts or deliberates about wishing to have the wherewithal, or whether he is able to build the tower if he have the wherewithal, but what does come under deliberation is whether one has the wherewithal. Again it is not necessarily a matter of deliberation whether one ought to renounce all that one has, or whether by so doing one may be able to attain to perfection, while it is a matter of deliberation whether that which he is doing amounts to the renunciation of all that he has, since unless he does renounce (which is to have the wherewithal) he cannot, as the text goes on to state, be Christ's disciple, and this is to build the tower. The misgiving of those who hesitate as to whether they may be able to attain to perfection by entering religion is shown by many examples to be unreasonable. Hence Augustine says:³ "On that side whither I had set my face, and whither I trembled to go, there appeared to me the chaste dignity of continency, . . . honestly alluring me to come and doubt not, and stretching forth to receive and embrace me, her holy hands full of multitudes of good examples. There were so many young men and maidens here, a multitude of youth and every age, grave widows and aged virgins. . . . And she smiled at me with a persuasive mockery as though to say: 'Canst not thou what these youths and these maidens can? Or can they either in themselves, and not rather in the Lord their God? . . . Why standest thou in thyself, and so standest not? Cast thyself upon Him; fear not, He will not withdraw Himself that thou shouldst fall. Cast thyself fearlessly upon Him: He will receive and will heal thee.'"

The example quoted of David is not to the point, because the arms of Saul, as a gloss on the passage observes,⁴ are "the sacraments of the Law, as being burdensome"; religion however is the sweet yoke of Christ, for as Gregory says (Moral. iv),⁵ "what burden does He lay on the shoulders of the mind, Who commands us to shun all troublesome desires, Who warns us to turn aside from the rough paths of this world?"

To those indeed who take this sweet yoke upon themselves He promises the refreshment of the divine enjoyment and the eternal rest of their souls; to which may He who made this promise bring us, Jesus Christ our Lord, Who is over all things God blessed for ever. Amen.

THIRD PART

PROLOGUE

BECAUSE our Saviour the Lord Jesus Christ, in order to save His people from their sins (Matt. 1. 21), as the angel announced, showed to us in His own Person the way of truth, whereby we may attain to the bliss of eternal life by rising again, it is necessary in order to complete the work of theology that after considering the last end of human life, and the virtues and vices, there should follow the consideration of the Saviour of all, and of the benefits bestowed by Him on the human race.

Concerning this we must consider (1) the Saviour Himself; (2) the sacraments by which we attain to our salvation (Q. LX); (3) the end of immortal life to which we attain by the resurrection (Supp. Q. LXIX).

Concerning the first, a twofold consideration arises: the first, about the mystery of the Incarnation itself, whereby God was made man for our salvation; the second, about such things as were done and suffered by our Saviour—that is, God incarnate (Q. XXVII).

TREATISE ON THE INCARNATION

QUESTION I

OF THE FITNESS OF THE INCARNATION

(In Six Articles)

CONCERNING the first, three things present themselves for consideration: first, the fitness of the Incarnation of Christ; secondly, the mode of union of the Word Incarnate (Q. 11); thirdly, what follows this union (Q. XVI).

Under the first head there are six points of inquiry: (1) Whether it was fitting for God to become incarnate? (2) Whether it was necessary for the restoration of the human race? (3) Whether if there had been no sin God would have become incarnate? (4) Whether He became incarnate primarily to take away original sin rather than actual? (5) Whether it was fitting for God to become incarnate from the beginning of the world? (6) Whether His Incarnation ought to have been deferred to the end of the world?

ARTICLE 1. Whether It Was Fitting That God Should Become Incarnate?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that it was not fitting for God to become incarnate.

Objection 1. Since God from all eternity is the very essence of goodness, it was best for Him to be as He had been from all eternity. But from all eternity He had been without flesh. Therefore it was most fitting for Him not to be united to flesh. Therefore it was not fitting for God to become incarnate.

Obj. 2. Further, it is not fitting to unite things that are infinitely apart, even as it would not be a fitting union if one were "to paint a figure in which the neck of a horse was joined to the head of a man."¹ But God and flesh are infinitely apart, since God is most simple, and flesh is most composite,—especially human flesh. Therefore it was not fitting that God should be united to human flesh.

Obj. 3. Further, a body is as distant from the highest spirit as evil is from the highest good. But it was wholly unfitting that God, Who is the highest good, should assume evil. Therefore it was not fitting that the highest uncreated spirit should assume a body.

Obj. 4. Further, it is not becoming that He Who surpassed the greatest things should be contained in the least, and that He upon Whom rests the care of great things should leave them for lesser things. But the whole universe of things cannot contain God Who takes care of the whole world. Therefore it would seem unfitting that "He should be hid under the frail body of a babe in swathing bands, in comparison with Whom the whole universe is accounted as little; and that this Prince should quit His throne for so long, and transfer the government of the whole world to so frail a body," as Volusianus writes to Augustine.²

On the contrary, It would seem most fitting that by visible things the invisible things of God should be made known, for to this end was the whole world made, as is clear from the word of the Apostle (Rom. 1. 20): For the invisible things of God . . . are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made. But, as Damascene says in the beginning of the third book,³ by the mystery of the Incarnation are made known at once the goodness, the wisdom, the justice, and the power or might of God—"His goodness, for He did not despise the weakness of His own handiwork; His justice, since, on man's defeat, He caused the tyrant to be overcome by none other than man, and yet He did not snatch men forcibly from death; His wisdom, for He found a suitable discharge for a most heavy debt; His power, or infinite might, for there is nothing greater than for God to become man." Therefore it was fitting for God to become incarnate.

I answer that, To each thing, that is fitting which belongs to it by reason of its very nature; thus, to reason is proper to man, since this belongs to him because he is rational by nature. But the very nature of God is the essence of goodness, as is clear from Dionysius.⁴ Hence, what belongs to the nature of goodness befits God. But it belongs to the nature of goodness to communicate itself to others, as is plain from Dionysius.⁵ Hence it belongs to the nature of the highest good to communicate itself in the highest manner to the creature, and this is brought about chiefly by "His so joining created nature to Himself that one Person is made up of these three—the Word, a soul and flesh," as Augustine says.⁶ Hence it is manifest that it was fitting that God should become incarnate.

Reply Obj. 1. The mystery of the Incarnation was not effected through God being changed in any way from the unchanging state in which He had been from eternity, but through His having united Himself to the creature in a new way, or rather through having united it to Himself. But it is fitting that a creature which by nature is changeable should not always be in the same way. And therefore, as the creature began to be, although it had not been before, so likewise, not having been previously united to God in Person, it was afterwards united to Him.

Reply Obj. 2. To be united to God in unity of person was not fitting to human flesh, according to its natural endowments, since it was above its dignity; nevertheless, it was fitting that God, by reason of His infinite goodness, should unite it to Himself for man's salvation.

Reply Obj. 3. Every mode of being wherein any creature whatsoever differs from the Creator has been established by God's wisdom, and is ordained to God's goodness. For God, Who is uncreated, immutable, and incorporeal, produced mutable and corporeal creatures for His own goodness. And so also the evil of punishment was established by God's justice for God's glory. But evil of fault is committed by withdrawing from the art of the Divine wisdom and from the order of the Divine goodness. And therefore it could be fitting to God to assume a nature created, mutable, corporeal, and subject to penalty, but it did not become Him to assume the evil of fault.

Reply Obj. 4. As Augustine replies:⁷ "The Christian doctrine nowhere holds that God was so joined to human flesh as either to desert or lose, or to transfer and as it were, contract within this frail body, the care of governing the universe. This is the thought of men unable to see anything but corporeal things. . . . God is great not in mass, but in might. Hence the greatness of His might feels no straits in narrow surroundings. Nor, if the passing word of a man is heard at once by many, and wholly by each, is it incredible that the abiding Word of God should be everywhere at once?" Hence nothing unfitting arises from God becoming incarnate.

ARTICLE 2. Whether It Was Necessary for the Restoration of the Human Race That the Word of God Should Become Incarnate?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that it was not necessary for the restoration of the human race that the Word of God should become incarnate.

Objection 1. For since the Word of God is perfect God, as has been said (Part I. q. iv, aa 1 and 2), no power was added to Him by the assumption of flesh. Therefore, if the incarnate Word of God restored human nature, He could also have restored it without taking on flesh.

Obj. 2. Further, for the restoration of human nature, which had fallen through sin, it would seem that nothing more is required than that man should satisfy for sin. Now man can satisfy, as it would seem, for sin; for God ought not to require from man more than man can do, and since He is more inclined to be merciful than to punish, as He lays the penalty of the act of sin to man's charge, so He ought to credit him with the recompense of the contrary act. Therefore it was not necessary for the restoration of human nature that the Word of God should become incarnate.

Obj. 3. Further, to revere God pertains especially to man's salvation; hence it is written (Mal. 1. 6): If, then, I be a father, where is my honour? and if I be a master, where is my fear? But men revere God the more by considering Him as elevated above all, and far beyond man's senses, hence (Ps. 112. 4) it is written: The Lord is high above all nations, and His glory above the heavens; and farther on: Who is as the Lord our God? which relates to reverence. Therefore it would seem unfitting to man's salvation that God should be made like us by assuming flesh.

On the contrary, What frees the human race from perdition is necessary for the salvation of man. But the mystery of the Incarnation is such, according to John 3. 16: God so loved the world as to give His only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him may not perish, but may have life everlasting. Therefore it was necessary for man's salvation that God should become incarnate.

I answer that, A thing is said to be necessary for a certain end in two ways. First, when the end cannot be without it, as food is necessary for the preservation of human life. Secondly, when the end is attained better and more conveniently, as a horse is necessary for a journey. In the first way it was not necessary that God should become incarnate for the restoration of human nature. For God of His omnipotent power could have restored human nature in many other ways. But in the second way it was necessary that God should become incarnate for the restoration of human nature. Hence Augustine says:¹ "We shall also show that other ways were not wanting to God, to Whose power all things are equally subject, but that there was not a more fitting way of healing our misery."

Now this may be viewed with respect to the furtherance of man in good. First, with regard to faith, which is made more certain by believing God Himself Who speaks; hence Augustine says:² "In order that man might journey more trustfully toward the truth, the Truth itself, the Son of God, having assumed human nature, established and founded faith." Secondly, with regard to hope, which is thereby greatly lifted up; hence Augustine says:³ "Nothing was so necessary for raising our hope as to show us how deeply God loved us. And what could afford us a stronger proof of this than that the Son of God should become a partner with us of human nature?" Thirdly, with regard to charity, which is greatly enkindled by this; hence Augustine says:⁴ "What greater cause is there of the Lord's coming than to show God's love for us?" And he afterwards adds: "If we have been slow to love, at least let us hasten to love in return." Fourthly, with regard to right doing, in which He set us an example; hence Augustine says in a sermon:⁵ "Man who might be seen was not to be followed; but God was to be followed, Who could not be seen. And therefore God was made man, that He Who might be seen by man, and Whom man might follow, might be shown to man." Fifthly, with regard to the full participation of the Divinity, which is the true happiness of man and end of human life; and this is bestowed upon us by Christ's humanity, for Augustine says in a sermon:¹ "God was made man, that man might be made God."

So also was this useful for our withdrawal from evil. First, because man is taught by it not to prefer the devil to himself, nor to honour him who is the author of sin; hence Augustine says:² "Since human nature is so united to God as to become one person, let not these proud spirits dare to prefer themselves to man because they have no bodies." Secondly, because we are thereby taught how great is man's dignity, lest we should sully it with sin; hence Augustine says:³ "God has proved to us how high a place human nature holds amongst creatures, since He appeared to men as a true man." And Pope Leo says in a sermon on the Nativity:⁴ "Learn, O Christian, thy worth; and being made a partner of the Divine nature, refuse to return by evil deeds to your former worthlessness." Thirdly, because, in order to do away with man's presumption, "the grace of God is commended in Jesus Christ, though no merits of ours went before," as Augustine says.⁵ Fourthly, because "man's pride, which is the greatest stumbling-block to our clinging to God, can be convinced and cured by humility so great," as Augustine says in the same place. Fifthly, in order to free man from the thralldom of sin, which, as Augustine says,⁶ "ought to be done in such a way that the devil should be overcome by the justice of the man Jesus Christ," and this was done by Christ satisfying for us. Now a mere man could not have satisfied for the whole human race, and God was not bound to satisfy; hence it was needful for Jesus Christ to be both God and man. And so Pope Leo says in the same sermon:⁷ "Weakness is assumed by strength, lowliness by majesty, in order that one and the same Mediator of God and men might die in one and rise in the other—for this was our fitting remedy. Unless He was true God, He would not have brought a remedy; and unless He was true man, He would not have set an example."

And there are very many other advantages which accrued, above the apprehension of man's senses.

Reply Obj. 1. This argument has to do with the first kind of necessity, without which we cannot attain to the end.

Reply Obj. 2. Satisfaction may be said to be sufficient in two ways. First, perfectly, in so far as it is completely sufficient, being adequate to make good the fault committed, and in this way the satisfaction of a mere man cannot be sufficient for sin, both because the whole of human nature has been corrupted by sin, whereas the goodness of any person or persons could not make up adequately for the harm done to the whole of the nature, and also because a sin committed against God has a kind of infinity from the infinity of the Divine majesty, because the greater the person we offend, the more grievous the offence. Hence for adequate satisfaction it was necessary that the act of the one satisfying should have an infinite efficacy, as being of God and man.

Secondly, man's satisfaction may be termed sufficient, imperfectly—that is, in the acceptance of him who is content with it, even though it is not adequate, and in this way the satisfaction of a mere man is sufficient. And because everything imperfect presupposes some perfect thing, by which it is sustained, hence it is that the satisfaction of every mere man has its efficacy from the satisfaction of Christ.

Reply Obj. 3. By taking flesh, God did not lessen His majesty, and in consequence did not lessen the reason for reverencing Him, which is increased by the increase of knowledge of Him. But, on the contrary, because He wished to draw near to us by taking flesh, He drew us to know Him the more.

ARTICLE 3. Whether, If Man Had Not Sinned, God Would Have Become Incarnate?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that if man had not sinned, God would still have become incarnate.

Objection 1. For as long as the cause endures the effect continues. But as Augustine says:⁸ "Many other things are to be considered in the Incarnation of Christ besides absolution from sin," and these were discussed above (A.2). Therefore if man had not sinned, God would have become incarnate.

Obj. 2. Further, it belongs to the omnipotence of the Divine power to perfect His works, and to manifest Himself by some infinite effect. But no mere creature can be called an infinite effect, since it is finite of its very essence. Now, it seems that in the work of the Incarnation alone is an infinite effect of the Divine power manifested in a special manner, by which power things infinitely distant are united, since it has been brought about that man is God. And in this work especially the universe would seem to be perfected, according as the last creature—namely, man—is joined to the first principle—namely, God. Therefore, even if man had not sinned God would have become incarnate.

Obj. 3. Further, human nature has not been made more capable of grace by sin. But after sin it is capable of the grace of union, which is the greatest grace. Therefore, if man had not sinned, human nature would have been capable of this grace, nor would God have withheld from human nature any good it was capable of. Therefore, if man had not sinned, God would have become incarnate.

Obj. 4. Further, God's predestination is eternal. But it is said of Christ (Rom. 1. 4): Who was predestinated the Son of God in power. Therefore, even before sin it was necessary that the Son of God should become incarnate, in order to fulfil God's predestination.

Obj. 5. Further, the mystery of the Incarnation was revealed to the first man, as is plain from Gen. 2. 23: This now is bone of my bones, etc., which the Apostle says is a great sacrament . . . in Christ and in the Church, as is plain from Eph. 5. 32. But man could not be fore-conscious of his fall, for the same reason that the angels could not, as Augustine proves.¹ Therefore, even if man had not sinned, God would have become incarnate.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Verb. Apost. viii, 2),² expounding what is set down in Luke 19. 10, For the Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost: "Therefore, if man had not sinned, the Son of Man would not have come." And on I Tim. 1. 15, Christ Jesus came into this world to save sinners, a gloss says:³ "There was no cause of Christ's coming into the world except to save sinners. Take away diseases, take away wounds, and there is no need of medicine."

I answer that, There are different opinions about this question. For some say⁴ that even if man had not sinned the Son of Man would have become incarnate. Others assert the contrary,⁵ and it seems that our assent ought rather to be given to this opinion.

For such things as spring from God's will, alone, and beyond the creature's due, can be made known to us only through being revealed in the Sacred Scripture, in which the Divine Will is made known to us. Hence, since everywhere in the Sacred Scripture the sin of the first man is assigned as the reason of the Incarnation, it is more in accordance with this to say that the work of the Incarnation was ordained by God as a remedy for sin, so that, had sin not existed, the Incarnation would not have been. And yet the power of God is not limited to this; even had sin not existed, God could have become incarnate.

Reply Obj. 1. All the other causes which are assigned in the preceding article have to do with a remedy for sin. For if man had not sinned, he would have been imbued with the light of Divine wisdom, and would have been perfected by God with the rectitude of justice in order to know and carry out everything needful. But because man, on deserting God, had fallen to the level of corporeal things, it was necessary that God should take flesh, and by corporeal things should afford him the remedy of salvation. Hence, on John 1. 14, And the Word was made flesh, St. Augustine says:⁶ "Flesh had blinded thee, flesh heals thee; for Christ came and destroyed the vices of the flesh by the flesh."

Reply Obj. 2. The infinity of Divine power is shown in the mode of production of things from nothing. Again, it suffices for the perfection of the universe that the creature be ordered in a natural manner to God as to an end. But that a creature should be united to God in person exceeds the limits of the perfection of nature.

Reply Obj. 3. A double capability may be remarked in human nature: one, in respect to the order of natural power, and this is always fulfilled by God, Who apportions to each according to its natural capability; the other in respect to the order of the Divine power, which all creatures implicitly obey; and the capability we speak of pertains to this. But God does not fulfil all such capabilities, otherwise God could do only what He has done in creatures, and this is false, as stated above (Part I, Q. xxv, A. 5; Q. cv, A. 6). But there is no reason why human nature should not have been raised to something greater after sin. For God allows evils to happen in order to bring a greater good from them; hence it is written (Rom. 5. 20): Where sin abounded, grace did more abound. Hence, too, in the blessing of the Paschal candle, we say:¹ "O happy fault, that merited such and so great a Redeemer!"

Reply Obj. 4. Predestination presupposes the foreknowledge of future things; and hence, as God predestines the salvation of anyone to be brought about by the prayers of others, so also He predestined the work of the Incarnation to be the remedy of human sin.

Reply Obj. 5. Nothing prevents an effect from being revealed to one to whom the cause is not revealed. Hence, the mystery of the Incarnation could be revealed to the first man without his being fore-conscious of his fall. For not everyone who knows the effect knows the cause.

ARTICLE 4. Whether God Became Incarnate Primarily in Order To Take Away Actual Sin, Rather Than To Take Away Original Sin?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that God became incarnate primarily as a remedy for actual sins rather than for original sin.

Objection 1. For the more grievous the sin, the more it runs counter to man's salvation, for which God became incarnate. But actual sin is more grievous than original sin, for the lightest punishment is due to original sin, as Augustine says (Contra Julian. v, 11).² Therefore the Incarnation of Christ is chiefly directed to taking away actual sins, rather than the taking away of original sin.

Obj. 2. Further, pain of sense is not due to original sin, but merely pain of loss, as has been shown (Part I-II, Q. LXXXVII, A. 5). But Christ came to suffer the pain of sense on the Cross in satisfaction for sins—and not the pain of loss, for He did not lack either the beatific vision or the enjoyment of it. Therefore He came chiefly in order to take away actual sin rather than original sin.

Obj. 3. Further, as Chrysostom says (De Compunctione Cordis, ii, 3):³ "This must be the mind of the faithful servant, to account the benefits of his Lord which have been bestowed on all alike as though they were bestowed on himself alone. For as if speaking of himself alone, Paul writes to the Galatians (2. 20): Christ . . . loved me and delivered Him- self for me." But our individual sins are actual sins, for original sin is the common sin. Therefore we ought to have this conviction, to believe that He has come chiefly for actual sins.

On the contrary, It is written (John 1. 29): Behold the Lamb of God, behold Him Who taketh away the sins (Vulg., sin) of the world.

I answer that, It is certain that Christ came into this world not only to take away that sin which is handed on originally to posterity, but also in order to take away all sins subsequently added to it; not that all are taken away (and this is from men's fault, since they do not adhere to Christ, according to John 3. 19: The light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than the light), but because He offered what was sufficient for blotting out all sins. Hence it is written (Rom. 5. 15-16): But not as the offence, so also the gift. . . . For judgment indeed was by one unto condemnation, but grace is of many offences unto justification.

Moreover, the more grievous the sin, the more particularly did Christ come to blot it out. But "greater" is said in two ways: in one way intensively, as a more intense whiteness is said to be greater, and in this way actual sin is greater than original sin, for it has more of the nature of voluntariness, as has been shown (Part I-II, Q. LXXXI, A. 1). In another way a thing is said to be greater extensively, as whiteness on a greater surface is said to be greater; and in this way original sin, whereby the whole human race is infected, is greater than any actual sin, which is proper to one person. And in this respect Christ came principally to take away original sin, since "the good of the race is a more Divine thing than the good of an individual," as is said in the Ethics.⁴

Reply Obj. 1. This argument looks to the intensive greatness of sin.

Reply Obj. 2. In the future award the pain of sense will not be meted out to original sin. Yet the penalties such as hunger, thirst, death, and the like, which we suffer sensibly in this life flow from original sin. And hence Christ, in order to satisfy fully for original sin, wished to suffer sensible pain, that He might consume death and the like in Himself.

Reply Obj. 3. Chrysostom says:⁵ "The Apostle used these words not as if wishing to diminish Christ's gifts, ample as they are, and spreading throughout the whole world, but that he might account himself alone the occasion of them. For what does it matter that they are given to others, if what are given to you are as complete and perfect as if none of them were given to another than yourself?" And hence, although a man ought to account Christ's gifts as given to himself, yet he ought not to consider them not to be given to others. And thus we do not exclude that He came chiefly to wipe away the sin of the whole nature rather than the sin of one person. But that sin of the nature is as perfectly healed in each one as if it were healed in him alone. Hence, on account of the union of charity, what is vouchsafed to all ought to be accounted his own by each one.

ARTICLE 5. Whether It Was Fitting That God Should Become Incarnate in the Beginning of the Human Race?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that it was fitting that God should become incarnate in the beginning of the human race.

Objection 1. For the work of the Incarnation sprang from the immensity of Divine charity, according to Eph. 2. 4, 5: But God (Who is rich in mercy), for His exceeding charity where-with He loved us . . . even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together in Christ. But charity does not tarry in bringing assistance to a friend who is suffering need, according to Prov. 3. 28: Say not to thy friend: Go, and come again, and to-morrow I will give to thee, when thou canst give at present. Therefore God ought not to have put off the work of the Incarnation, but ought thereby to have brought relief to the human race from the beginning.

Obj. 2. Further, it is written (I Tim. 1. 15): Christ Jesus came into this world to save sinners. But more would have been saved had God become incarnate at the beginning of the human race; for in the various centuries very many, through not knowing God, perished in their sin. Therefore it was fitting that God should become incarnate at the beginning of the human race.

Obj. 3. Further, the work of grace is not less ordered than the work of nature. But nature takes its rise from the perfect, as Boëthius says.¹ Therefore the work of grace ought to have been perfect from the beginning. But in the work of the Incarnation we see the perfection of grace, according to John 1. 14: The Word was made flesh, and afterwards it is added: Full of grace and truth. Therefore Christ ought to have become incarnate at the beginning of the human race.

On the contrary, It is written (Gal. 4. 4): But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, upon which a gloss says² that "the fulness of the time is when it was decreed by God the Father to send His Son." But God has prescribed everything by His wisdom. Therefore God became incarnate at the most fitting time, and it was not fitting that God should become incarnate at the beginning of the human race.

I answer that, Since the work of the Incarnation is principally ordained to the restoration of the human race by blotting out sin, it is manifest that it was not fitting for God to become incarnate at the beginning of the human race before sin. For medicine is given only to the sick. Hence Our Lord Himself says (Matt. 9. 12, 13): They that are in health need not a physician, but they that are ill. . . . For I am not come to call the just, but sinners.

Nor was it fitting that God should become incarnate immediately after sin. First, on account of the manner of man's sin, which had come of pride; hence man was to be liberated in such a manner that he might be humbled, and see how he stood in need of a deliverer. Hence on the words in Gal. 3. 19, Being ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator, a gloss says:³ "With great wisdom was it so ordered by God that the Son of Man should not be sent immediately after man's fall. For first of all God left man under the natural law, with freedom of choice, in order that he might know the powers of his nature; and when he failed in them, he received the law; whereupon, by the fault not of the law, but of his nature, the disease gained strength; so that having recognized his infirmity he might cry out for a physician, and beseech the aid of grace."

Secondly, on account of the order of furtherance in good, whereby we proceed from imperfection to perfection. Hence the Apostle says (I Cor. 15. 46, 47): Yet that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; afterwards that which is spiritual. . . . The first man was of the earth, earthly; the second man from heaven, heavenly.

Thirdly, on account of the dignity of the incarnate Word, for on the words (Gal. 4. 4), But when the fulness of the time was come, a gloss says:⁴ "The greater the judge who was coming, the more numerous was the band of heralds who ought to have preceded him."

Fourthly, lest the fervour of faith should cool by the length of time, for the charity of many will grow cold at the end of the world. Hence (Luke 18. 8) it is written: But yet the Son of Man, when He cometh, shall He find think you faith on earth?

Reply Obj. 1. Charity does not put off bringing assistance to a friend, always bearing in mind the circumstances as well as the state of the persons. For if the physician were to give the medicine at the very outset of the ailment, it would do less good, and would hurt rather than benefit. And hence the Lord did not bestow upon the human race the remedy of the Incarnation in the beginning, lest they should despise it through pride, if they did not already recognize their disease.

Reply Obj. 2. Augustine replies to this (De Sex Quest Pagan., Ep. cii), saying (Q 2)¹ that "Christ wished to appear to man and to have His doctrine preached to them when and where He knew those were who would believe in Him. But in such times and places as His Gospel was not preached He foresaw that not all, indeed, but many would so bear themselves towards His preaching as not to believe in His corporeal presence, even were He to raise the dead." But the same Augustine, taking exception to this reply in his book (De Perseverantia, ix),² says: "How can we say the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon would not believe when such great wonders were wrought in their midst, or would not have believed had they been wrought, when God Himself bears witness that they would have done penance with great humility if these signs of Divine power had been wrought in their midst?" And he adds in answer.³ "Hence, as the Apostle says (Rom 9. 16), 'it is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy'; Who [succours whom He will of] those who, as He foresaw, would believe in His miracles if wrought amongst them, [while others] He succours not, having judged them in His predestination secretly yet justly. Therefore let us unshrinkingly believe His mercy to be with those who are set free, and His truth with those who are condemned."

Reply Obj. 3. Perfection is prior to imperfection, both in time and nature, in things that are different (for what brings others to perfection must itself be perfect); but in one and the same thing, imperfection is prior in time though posterior in nature. And thus the eternal perfection of God precedes in duration the imperfection of human nature, but the latter's ultimate perfection in union with God follows.

ARTICLE 6. Whether the Incarnation Ought To Have Been Put Off Till the End of the World?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that the work of the Incarnation ought to have been put off till the end of the world.

Objection 1. For it is written (Ps. 91. 11): My old age in plentiful mercy—that is, "in the last days," as a gloss says.⁴ But the time of the Incarnation is especially the time of mercy, according to Ps. 101. 14: For it is time to have mercy on it. Therefore the Incarnation ought to have been put off till the end of the world.

Obj. 2. Further, as has been said (A. 5, reply 3), in the same subject perfection is subsequent in time to imperfection. Therefore what is most perfect ought to be the very last in time. But the highest perfection of human nature is in the union with the Word, because in Christ it hath pleased the Father that all the fulness of the Godhead should dwell, as the Apostle says (Col. 1. 19, and 2. 9). Therefore the Incarnation ought to have been put off till the end of the world.

Obj. 3. Further, what can be done by one ought not to be done by two. But the one coming of Christ at the end of the world was sufficient for the salvation of human nature. Therefore it was not necessary for Him to come beforehand in His Incarnation, and hence the Incarnation ought to have been put off till the end of the world.

On the contrary, It is written (Habac 3. 2): In the midst of the years Thou shalt make it known. Therefore the mystery of the Incarnation which was made known to the world ought not to have been put off till the end of the world.

I answer that, As it was not fitting that God should become incarnate at the beginning of the world, so also it was not fitting that the Incarnation should be put off till the end of the world. And this is shown first from the union of the Divine and human nature. For, as it has been said (A. 5, reply 3), perfection precedes

³ De Dono Persev., xi (PL 45, 1007).

⁴ Glossa Lombardi (PL 191, 859); cf. Glossa interl. (III, 226v).

imperfection in time in one way, and contrariwise in another way imperfection precedes perfection. For in that which is made perfect from being imperfect imperfection precedes perfection in time, whereas in that which is the efficient cause of perfection, perfection precedes imperfection in time. Now in the work of the Incarnation both concur; for by the Incarnation human nature is raised to its highest perfection, and in this way it was not becoming that the Incarnation should take place at the beginning of the human race. And the Word incarnate is the efficient cause of the perfection of human nature, according to John 1. 16: Of His fulness we have all received, and hence the work of the Incarnation ought not to have been put off till the end of the world. But the perfection of glory to which human nature is to be finally raised by the Word Incarnate will be at the end of the world.

Secondly, from the effect of man's salvation; for, as is said Qq. Vet. et Nov. Test., qu. 83,¹ "it is in the power of the Giver to have pity when, or as much as, He wills. Hence He came when He knew it was fitting to succour, and when His boons would be welcome. For when by the feebleness of the human race men's knowledge of God began to grow dim and their morals to change, He was pleased to choose Abraham as a standard of the restored knowledge of God and of holy living; and later on when reverence grew weaker, He gave the law to Moses in writing; and because the gentiles despised it and would not submit themselves to it, and they who received it would not keep it, being touched with pity, God sent His Son, to grant to all remission of their sin and to offer them, justified, to God the Father." But if this remedy had been put off till the end of the world, all knowledge and reverence of God and all uprightness of morals would have been swept away from the earth.

Thirdly, this appears fitting to the manifestation of the Divine power, which has saved men in several ways,—not only by faith in some future thing, but also by faith in something present and past.

Reply Obj. 1. This gloss has in view the mercy of God, which leads us to glory. Nevertheless, if it is referred to the mercy shown the human race by the Incarnation of Christ, we must reflect that, as Augustine says (Retract. i, 26),² the time of the Incarnation may be compared to the youth of the human race, "on account of the strength and fervour of faith, which works by love"; and to old age—that is, the sixth age—"on account of the number of centuries, for Christ came in the sixth age." And "although youth and old age cannot be together in a body, yet they can be together in a soul, the former on account of ardor, the latter on account of sobriety." And hence Augustine says elsewhere (Qq. lxxxiii, qu. 44)³ that "it was not becoming that the Master by Whose imitation the human race was to be formed to the highest virtue should come from heaven, save in the time of youth." But in another work (De Gen. cont. Manich. i, 23)⁴ he says that Christ came in the sixth age—that is, in the old age—of the human race.

Reply Obj. 2. The work of the Incarnation is to be viewed not as merely the term of a movement from imperfection to perfection, but also as a principle of perfection in human nature, as has been said.

Reply Obj. 3. As Chrysostom says⁵ on John 3. 17, "For God sent not His Son into the world to judge the world": "There are two comings of Christ: the first, for the remission of sins; the second, to judge the world. For if He had not done so, all would have perished together, since all have sinned and need the glory of God." Hence it is plain that He ought not to have put off the coming in mercy till the end of the world.

QUESTION II

OF THE MODE OF UNION OF THE WORD INCARNATE (In Twelve Articles)

Now we must consider the mode of union of the Incarnate Word; and, first, the union itself; secondly, the Person assuming (Q. III.); thirdly, the nature assumed (Q. IV.).

Under the first head there are twelve points of inquiry: (1) Whether the union of the Word Incarnate took place in the nature? (2) Whether it took place in the Person? (3) Whether it took place in the suppositum or hypostasis? (4) Whether the Person or hypostasis of Christ is composite after the Incarnation? (5) Whether any union of body and soul took place in Christ? (6) Whether the human nature was united to the Word accidentally? (7) Whether the union itself is something created? (8) Whether it is the same as assumption? (9) Whether the union of the two natures is the greatest union? (10) Whether the union of the two natures in Christ was brought about by grace? (11) Whether any merits preceded it? (12) Whether the grace of union was natural to the man Christ?

ARTICLE 1. Whether the Union of the Incarnate Word Took Place in One Nature?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that the Union of the Word Incarnate took place in one nature.

Objection 1. For Cyril says¹ (he is quoted in the acts of the Council of Chalcedon, part ii, act. 1):² "We must understand not two natures, but one incarnate nature of the Word of God"; and this could not be unless the union took place in the nature. Therefore the union of the Word Incarnate took place in the nature.

Obj. 2. Further, Athanasius says in his Creed³ that, "as the rational soul and the flesh together are one man, so God and man together are one Christ." Now the rational soul and flesh together form one human nature. Therefore the union took place in the nature.

Obj. 3. Further, of two natures one is not denominated by the other unless they are to some extent mutually changed. But the Divine and human natures in Christ are denominated one by the other; for Cyril says (loc. cit.) that "the Divine nature is incarnate," and Gregory Nazianzen says (Ep. i. ad Cledon.)⁴ that "the human nature is deified," as appears from Damascene (De Fide Orthod. iii. 6, 11, 17).⁵ Therefore from two natures one seems to have resulted.

On the contrary, It is said in the declaration of the Council of Chalcedon:⁶ "We confess that in these latter times the only-begotten Son of God appeared in two natures, without mingling, without change, without division, without separation—the distinction of natures not having been taken away by the union." Therefore the union did not take place in the nature.

I answer that, To make this question clear we must consider what is nature. Now it is to be observed that the word nature comes from nativity. Hence this word was used first of all to signify the begetting of living beings, which is called birth or sprouting forth, the word natura meaning, as it were, nascitura. Afterwards this word nature was taken to signify the principle of this begetting; and because in living things the principle of generation is an intrinsic principle, this word nature was further employed to signify any intrinsic principle of motion; thus the Philosopher says⁷ that "nature is the principle of motion in that in which it is per se and not accidentally." Now this principle is either form or matter. Hence sometimes form is called nature, and sometimes matter. And because the end of natural generation, in that which is generated, is the essence of the species, which the definition signifies, this essence of the species is called the nature. And thus Boëthius defines nature (De Duab. Nat.):⁸ "Nature is what informs a thing with its specific difference"—that is, which perfects the specific definition. Therefore we are now speaking of nature as it signifies the essence, or the "what-it-is," or the quiddity of the species.

Now if we take nature in this way it is impossible that the union of the Incarnate Word took place in the nature. For one thing is made of two or more in three ways. First, from two complete things which remain in their perfection. This can only happen to those things whose form is composition, order, or figure, just as a heap is made up of many stones brought together without any order, but solely with juxtaposition, and a house is made of stones and beams arranged in order, and fashioned to a figure. And in this way some said⁹ the union was by manner of mingling (confusio) (which is without order) or by manner of commensuration (which is with order). But this cannot be. First, because neither composition nor order nor figure is a substantial form, but accidental; and hence it would follow that the union of the Incarnation was not essential (per se), but accidental, which will be disproved later on (A. 6). Secondly, because thereby we should not have an absolute unity, but relative only, for there remain several things actually. Thirdly, because the form of such things is not a nature, but rather an art, as the form of a house, and thus one nature would not be constituted in Christ, as they wish.

Secondly, one thing is made up of several things, which are perfect but changed, as a mixture is made up of its elements; and in this way some have said that the union of the Incarnation was brought about by manner of combination.¹ But this cannot be. First, because the Divine Nature is altogether immutable, as has been said (Part I, Q. IX, AA. 1 and 2), and hence neither can it be changed into something else, since it is incorruptible, nor can anything else be changed into it, for it cannot be generated. Secondly, because what is mixed is of the same species with none of the elements; for flesh differs in species from any of its elements. And thus Christ would be of the same nature neither with His Father nor with His mother. Thirdly, because there can be no mixture of things widely apart, for the species of one of them is absorbed—for example, if we were to put a drop of water in a flagon of wine. And hence, since the Divine Nature infinitely exceeds the human nature, there could be no mixture, but the Divine Nature alone would remain.

Thirdly, a thing is made up of things not mixed nor changed, but which are imperfect, just as man is made up of soul and body, and likewise as one body of various members. But this cannot be said of the mystery of the Incarnation. First, because both natures, that is, the Divine and the human, are perfect—each in its kind. Secondly, because the Divine and human natures cannot constitute anything after the manner of quantitative parts, as the members make up the body, for the Divine Nature is incorporeal; nor after the manner of form and matter, for the Divine Nature cannot be the form of anything, especially of anything corporeal, since it would follow that the species resulting therefrom would be communicable to several, and thus there would be several Christs. Thirdly, because Christ would exist neither in human nature nor in the Divine Nature, since any difference added varies the species, as unity varies number, as it is said.²

Reply Obj. 1. This authority of Cyril is expounded in the Fifth Synod (that is, Constantinople II, coll. viii, can. 8)³ thus: "If anyone proclaiming one nature of the Word of God to be incarnate does not receive it as the Fathers taught—namely, that from the Divine and human natures (a union in subsistence having taken place) one Christ results,—but endeavours from these words to introduce one nature or substance of the Divinity and flesh of Christ:

—let such a one be anathema." Hence the sense is not that from two natures one results, but that the Nature of the Word of God united flesh to Itself in the Person.

Reply Obj. 2. From the soul and body a double unity—namely, of nature and person—results in each of us; of nature according as the soul is united to the body, and formally perfects it, so that one nature springs from the two as from act and potency or from matter and form. But the likeness is not in this sense, for the Divine Nature cannot be the form of a body, as was proved (Part I, Q. III, A. 8). Unity of person results from them, however, since there is a single someone subsisting in flesh and soul, and in this lies the likeness, for the one Christ subsists in the Divine and human natures.

Reply Obj. 3. As Damascene says,⁴ the Divine Nature is said to be incarnate because "It is united to flesh personally," and not that It is changed into the nature of flesh. So likewise the flesh is said to be deified, as he also says (ibid. 17),⁵ not by change, but by union with the Word, its natural properties still remaining, and hence it may be considered as deified because it becomes the flesh of the Word of God, but not that it becomes God.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the Union of the Incarnate Word Took Place in the Person?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that the union of the Incarnate Word did not take place in the person.

Objection 1. For the Person of God is not distinct from His Nature, as we said (Part I, Q. XXXIX, A. 1). If, therefore, the union did not take place in the nature, it follows that it did not take place in the person.

Obj. 2. Further, Christ's human nature has no less dignity than ours. But personality belongs to dignity, as was stated above (Part I, Q. XXIX, A. 3, reply 2). Hence, since our human nature has its proper personality, much more reason was there that Christ's should have its proper personality.

Obj. 3. Further, as Boëthius says (De Duab. Nat.),⁶ "a person is an individual substance of rational nature." But the Word of God assumed an individual human nature, for "universal human nature does not exist of itself, but is the object of pure thought," as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 11).⁷ Therefore the human nature of Christ has its personality. Hence it does not seem that the union took place in the person.

On the contrary, We read in the Council of Chalcedon (Part ii, act. 5):¹ "We confess that Our Lord Jesus Christ is not parted or divided into two persons, but is one and the same Only-Begotten Son and Word of God." Therefore the union took place in the person.

I answer that, Person has a different meaning from nature. For nature, as has been said (A. 1), designates the essence of the species which is signified by the definition. And if nothing was found to be added to what belongs to the notion of the species, there would be no need to distinguish the nature from the suppositum of the nature, which is the individual subsisting in this nature, because every individual subsisting in a nature would be altogether one with its nature. Now in certain subsisting things we happen to find what does not belong to the notion of the species—namely, accidents and individuating principles, which appears chiefly in such things as are composed of matter and form. Hence in such as these the nature and the suppositum really differ; not indeed as if they were wholly separate, but because the suppositum includes the nature itself of the species, and in addition certain other things outside the notion of the species. Hence the suppositum is taken to be a whole which has the nature as its formal part to perfect it; and consequently in such beings as are composed of matter and form the nature is not predicated of the suppositum, for we do not say that this man is his manhood. But if there is a thing in which there is nothing outside the species or its nature (as in God), the suppositum and the nature are not really distinct in it, but only in our way of thinking, because it is called nature according as it is an essence, and a suppositum according as it is subsisting. And what is said of a suppositum is to be applied to a person in rational or intellectual creatures, for a person is nothing else than "an individual substance of rational nature," according to Boëthius.²

Therefore, whatever is found in a person is united to it in person, whether it belongs to its nature or not. Hence, if the human nature is not united to God the Word in person, it is not united to Him in any way; and thus belief in the Incarnation is altogether done away with, and Christian faith wholly overturned.

Therefore, since the Word has a human nature united to Him, which does not however belong to His Divine Nature, it follows that the union took place in the Person of the Word, and not in the nature.

Reply Obj. 1. Although in God Nature and Person are not really distinct, yet they have distinct meanings, as was said above, because person signifies after the manner of something subsisting. And because human nature is so united to the Word that the Word subsists in it, and not so that His Nature receives from it any addition or change, it follows that the union of human nature to the Word of God took place in the person, and not in the nature.

Reply Obj. 2. Personality pertains of necessity to the dignity of a thing and to its perfection so far as it pertains to the dignity and perfection of that thing to exist by itself (which is understood by the word person). Now it is a greater dignity to exist in something nobler than oneself than to exist by oneself. Hence the human nature of Christ has a greater dignity than ours from this very fact that in us, being as it were existent by itself, it has its own personality, but in Christ it exists in the Person of the Word. Thus to perfect the species belongs to the dignity of a form, yet the sensitive part in man, on account of its union with the nobler form which perfects the species, is more noble than in brutes, where it is itself the form which perfects.

Reply Obj. 3. "The Word of God did not assume human nature in general, but 'in atomo'" —that is, in an individual—as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 11),³ for otherwise every man would be the Word of God, even as Christ was. Yet we must bear in mind that not every individual in the genus of substance, even in rational nature, is a person, but that alone which exists by itself, and not that which exists in some more perfect thing. Hence the hand of Socrates, although it is a kind of individual, is not a person, because it does not exist by itself, but in something more perfect—namely, in the whole. And hence, too, this is signified by a person being defined as an individual substance, for the hand is not a complete substance, but part of a substance. Therefore, although this human nature is a kind of individual in the genus of substance, it has not its own personality, because it does not exist separately, but in something more perfect—namely, in the Person of the Word. Therefore the union took place in the person.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the Union of the Word Incarnate Took Place in the Suppositum or Hypostasis?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that the union of the Word Incarnate did not take place in the suppositum or hypostasis.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (Enchir. xxv, xxxviii):¹ "Both the Divine and human substance are one Son of God; but they are one thing (aliud) by reason of the Word and another thing (aliud) by reason of the man." And Pope Leo says in his letter to Flavian (Lp. xxviii):² "One of these is glorious with miracles, the other succumbs under injuries." But one (aliud) and the other (aliud) differ in suppositum. Therefore the union of the Word Incarnate did not take place in the suppositum.

Obj. 2. Further, "hypostasis is nothing more than a particular substance," as Boëthius says (De Duab. Nat.).³ But it is plain that in Christ there is another particular substance beyond the hypostasis of the Word—namely, the body and the soul and the composite of these. Therefore there is another hypostasis in Him besides the hypostasis of the Word.

Obj. 3. Further, the hypostasis of the Word is not included in any genus or species, as is plain from Part I, Q. III, A. 5; Q. XXX, A. 4, reply 3. But Christ, according as He is made man, is contained under the species of man; for Dionysius says (Div. Nom. 1):⁴ "Within the limits of our nature He came, Who far surpasses the whole order of nature supersubstantially." Now nothing is contained under the human species unless it be a hypostasis of the human species. Therefore in Christ there is another hypostasis besides the hypostasis of the Word of God; and hence the same conclusion follows as above.

On the contrary, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 4):⁵ "In Our Lord Jesus Christ we acknowledge two natures and one hypostasis."

I answer that, Some⁶ who did not know the relation of hypostasis to person, although granting that there is but one person in Christ, held, nevertheless, that there is one hypostasis of God and another of man, as if the union took place in the person and not in the hypostasis.

Now this, for three reasons, is clearly erroneous. First, because person only adds to hypostasis a determinate nature—namely, rational—according to what Boëthius says (De Duab. Nat.):⁷ "a person is an individual substance of rational nature"; and hence it is the same to attribute to the human nature in Christ a proper hypostasis and a proper person. And the holy Fathers, seeing this, condemned both in the Fifth Council held at Constantinople,⁸ saying: "If anyone seeks to introduce into the mystery of Christ two subsistences or two persons, let him be anathema. For by the incarnation of one of the Holy Trinity, God the Word, the Holy Trinity received no argument of person or subsistence." Now subsistence is the same as the subsisting thing, which is proper to hypostasis, as is plain from Boëthius (De Duab. Nat.).⁹

Secondly, because if it is granted that person adds to hypostasis something in which the union can take place, this something is nothing else than a property pertaining to dignity, according as it is said by some that a person is "a hypostasis distinguished by a property pertaining to dignity."¹⁰ If, therefore, the union took place in the person and not in the hypostasis, it follows that the union only took place in regard to some dignity. And this is what Cyril,¹¹ with the approval of the Council of Ephesus,¹² condemned in these terms: "If anyone after the uniting divides the subsistences in the one Christ, only joining them in a union of dignity or authority or power, and not rather in a concourse of natural union, let him be anathema."

Thirdly, because to the hypostasis alone are attributed the operations and the natural properties, and whatever belongs to the nature in the concrete; for we say that this man reasons, and is capable of laughter, and is a rational animal. So likewise this man is said to be a suppositum, because he underlies (supponitur) whatever belongs to man and receives its predication. Therefore, if there is any hypostasis in Christ besides the hypostasis of the Word, it follows that whatever pertains to man is verified of some other than the Word—for example. that He was born of a Virgin, suffered, was crucified, was buried. And this, too, was condemned with the approval of the Council of Ephesus (ibid. can. 4)¹ in these words: "If anyone ascribes to two persons or subsistences such words as are in the evangelical and apostolic Scriptures, or have been said of Christ by the saints, or by Himself of Himself, and, moreover, applies some of them to the man, taken as distinct from the Word of God, and some of them (as if they could be used of God alone) only to the Word of God the Father, let him be anathema."

Therefore it is plainly a heresy condemned long since by the Church to say that in Christ there are two hypostases, or two supposita, or that the union did not take place in the hypostasis or suppositum. Hence in the same Council (can. 2)² it is said: "If anyone does not confess that the Word was united to flesh in subsistence, and that Christ with His flesh is both—namely, God and man—let him be anathema."

Reply Obj. 1. Just as accidental difference makes a thing other (alterum), so essential difference makes another thing (aliud). Now it is plain that the otherness which springs from accidental difference may pertain to the same hypostasis or suppositum in created things, since the same thing numerically can underlie different accidents. But it does not happen in created things that the same numerically can subsist in divers essences or natures. Hence just as when we speak of other and other in regard to creatures we do not signify diversity of suppositum, but only diversity of accidental forms, so likewise when Christ is said to be one thing or another thing we do not imply diversity of suppositum or hypostasis, but diversity of nature. Hence Gregory Nazianzen says in a letter to Chelidonius (Ep. ci):³ "In the Saviour we may find one thing and another, yet He is not one person and another. And I say 'one thing and another,' whereas, on the contrary, in the Trinity we say one Person and another (so as not to confuse the subsistences), but not one thing and another."

Reply Obj. 2. Hypostasis signifies a particular substance, not in every way, but as it is in its complement. Yet as it is in union with something more complete, it is not said to be a hypostasis, as for instance a hand or a foot. So likewise the human nature in Christ, although it is a particular substance, nevertheless cannot be called a hypostasis or suppositum because it is in union with a completed thing—namely, the whole Christ, as He is God and man. But the complete being with which it coincides is said to be a hypostasis or suppositum.

Reply Obj. 3. In created things a singular thing is placed in a genus or species not by reason of what belongs to its individuation, but by reason of its nature, which is determined according to its form, and in composite things individuation is taken rather from matter. Hence we say that Christ is in the human species by reason of the nature assumed, and not by reason of the hypostasis.

ARTICLE 4. Whether After the Incarnation the Person or Hypostasis of Christ Is Composite?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that the Person of Christ is not composite.

Objection 1. For the Person of Christ is not other than the Person or hypostasis of the Word, as appears from what has been said (A. 2). But in the Word, Person and Nature do not differ, as appears from Part I, q. xxxix, A. 1. Therefore since the Nature of the Word is simple, as was shown above (Part I, q. iiii, A. 7), it is impossible that the Person of Christ be composite.

Obj. 2. Further, all composition requires parts. But the Divine Nature is incompatible with the notion of a part, for every part involves the notion of imperfection. Therefore it is impossible that the Person of Christ be composed of two natures.

Obj. 3. Further, what is composed of others would seem to be homogeneous with them, as from bodies only a body can be composed. Therefore if there is anything in Christ composed of the two natures, it follows that this will not be a person but a nature; and hence the union in Christ will take place in the nature, which is contrary to A. 1.

On the contrary, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 4),⁴ "In the Lord Jesus Christ we acknowledge two natures, but one hypostasis composed from both."

I answer that, The Person or hypostasis of Christ may be viewed in two ways. First as it is in itself, and thus it is altogether simple, even as the Nature of the Word. Secondly, in the aspect of person or hypostasis to which it pertains: to subsist in a nature; and from this

³ PG 37, 180.

⁴ PG 94, 997.

point of view the Person of Christ subsists in two natures. Hence though there is one subsisting being in Him, yet there are different aspects of subsistence, and hence He is said to be a composite person, in so far as one being subsists in two.

And from this the solution to the first is clear.

Reply Obj. 2. This composition of a person from natures is not so called by reason of parts, but by reason of number, even as that in which two things are found together may be said to be composed of them.

Reply Obj. 3. It is not found in every composition that the thing composed is homogeneous with its component parts, but only in the parts of a continuous thing, for the continuous is composed solely of continuous (parts). But an animal is composed of soul and body, and neither of these is an animal.

ARTICLE 5. Whether in Christ There Is Any Union of Soul and Body?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that in Christ there was no union of soul and body.

Objection 1. For from the union of soul and body in us a person or a human hypostasis is caused. Hence if the soul and body were united in Christ, it follows that a hypostasis resulted from their union. But this was not the hypostasis of God the Word, for It is eternal. Therefore in Christ there would be a person or hypostasis besides the hypostasis of the Word, which is contrary to AA. 2 and 3.

Obj. 2. Further, from the union of soul and body results the nature of the human species. But Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 3),¹ that "we must not conceive a common species in the Lord Jesus Christ." Therefore there was no union of soul and body in Him.

Obj. 3. Further, the soul is united to the body for the sole purpose of making it alive. But the body of Christ could be made alive by the Word of God Himself, seeing He is the fount and principle of life. Therefore in Christ there was no union of soul and body.

On the contrary, The body is not said to be animated save from its union with the soul. Now the body of Christ is said to be animated, as the Church chants:² "Taking an animate body, He deigned to be born of a Virgin." Therefore in Christ there was a union of soul and body.

I answer that, Christ is called a man univocally with other men, as being of the same species, according to the Apostle (Phil. 2. 7), being made in the likeness of a man. Now it belongs to the notion of the human species that the soul be united to the body, for the form does not constitute the species, except through the fact that it becomes the act of matter, and this is the term of generation through which nature intends the species. Hence it must be said that in Christ the soul was united to the body, and the contrary is heretical, since it destroys the truth of Christ's humanity.

Reply Obj. 1. This would seem to be the reason which was of weight with such as denied the union of the soul and body in Christ³—namely, lest they should thereby be forced to admit a second person or hypostasis in Christ, since they saw that the union of soul and body in mere men resulted in a person. But this happens in mere men because the soul and body are so united in them as to exist by themselves. But in Christ they are united together so as to be united to something higher, which subsists in the nature composed of them. And hence from the union of the soul and body in Christ a new hypostasis or person does not result, but what is composed of them is united to the already existing hypostasis or Person.

Nor does it therefore follow that the union of the soul and body in Christ is of less effect than in us, for its union with something nobler does not lessen but increases its virtue and worth; just as the sensitive soul in animals constitutes the species, as being considered the ultimate form, yet it does not do so in man, although it is of greater power and dignity, and this because of its union with a further and nobler perfection—namely, the rational soul, as has been said above (A. 2, reply 2).

Reply Obj. 2. This saying of Damascene may be taken in two ways. First, as referring to human nature, which, according as it is in one individual alone, has not the nature of a common species, but only according as either it is abstracted from every individual, and considered in bare contemplation or according as it is in all individuals. Now the Son of God did not assume human nature as it exists in the mere consideration of the intellect, since in this way He would not have assumed human nature in reality, unless it be said that human nature is a separate idea, just as the Platonists held man to be without matter.⁴ But in this way the Son of God would not have assumed flesh, contrary to what is written (Luke 24. 39), A spirit hath not flesh and bones as you see Me to have. Neither can it be said that the Son of God assumed human nature as it is in all the individuals of the same species, because otherwise He would have assumed all men. Therefore it remains, as Damascene says further on (ibid. 11)¹ that He assumed human nature in atomo—that is, in an individual; not, indeed, in another individual which is a suppositum or a person of that nature, but in the Person of the Son of God.

Secondly, this saying of Damascene may be taken not as referring to human nature as if from the union of soul and body one common nature (namely, human) did not result, but as referring to the union of the two natures, Divine and human, which do not combine so as to form a third something that becomes a common nature, for in this way it would become predicable of many, and this is what he is aiming at, since he adds: "For there was not generated, neither will there ever be generated, another Christ, Who from the Godhead and manhood, and in the Godhead and manhood, is perfect God and perfect man."

Reply Obj. 3. There are two principles of corporeal life: one the effecting principle, and in this way the Word of God is the principle of all life; the other, the formal principle of life, for since "in living things to be is to live," as the Philosopher says,² just as everything, is formally by its form, so likewise the body lives by the soul; in this way a body could not live by the Word, Which cannot be the form of a body.

ARTICLE 6. Whether the Human Nature Was United to the Word of God Accidentally?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that the human nature was united to the Word of God accidentally.

Objection 1. For the Apostle says (Phil. 2. 7) of the Son of God, that He was in habit found as a man. But habit is accidentally associated with that to which it pertains, whether habit be taken for one of the ten predicaments or as a species of quality. Therefore human nature is accidentally united to the Son of God.

Obj. 2. Further, whatever comes to a thing that is complete in being comes to it accidentally, for an accident is said to be what can come or go without the subject being corrupted. But human nature came to Christ in time, Who had perfect being from eternity. Therefore it came to Him accidentally.

Obj. 3. Further, whatever does not pertain to the nature or the essence of a thing is its accident, for whatever is, is either a substance or an accident. But human nature does not pertain to the Divine Essence or Nature of the Son of God, for the union did not take place in the nature, as was said above (A. 1). Hence the human nature must have accrued accidentally to the Son of God.

Obj. 4. Further, an instrument accrues accidentally. But the human nature was the instrument of the Godhead in Christ, for Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 15),³ that "the flesh of Christ is the instrument of the Godhead." Therefore it seems that the human nature was united to the Son of God accidentally.

On the contrary, Whatever is predicated accidentally, predicates, not substance, but quantity, or quality, or some other mode of being. If therefore the human nature accrues accidentally, when we say Christ is man we do not predicate substance, but quality or quantity, or some other mode of being, which is contrary to the Decretal of Pope Alexander (III), who says:⁴ "Since Christ is perfect God and perfect man, what foolhardiness have some to dare to affirm that Christ as man is not a substance?"

I answer that, In evidence of this question we must know that two heresies have arisen with regard to the mystery of the union of the two natures in Christ. The first confused the natures, as Eutyches and Dioscorus,⁵ who held that from the two natures one nature resulted, so that they confessed Christ to be from two natures (which were distinct before the union), but not in two natures (the distinction of nature coming to an end after the union).

The second was the heresy of Nestorius and Theodore of Mopsuestia,⁶ who separated the persons. For they held the Person of the Son of God to be distinct from the Person of the Son of man, and said these were mutually united—first, by indwelling, since the Word of God dwelt in the man as in a temple; secondly, by unity of affection, since the will of the man was always in agreement with the will of the Word of God; thirdly, by operation, according as they said the man was the instrument of the Word of God; fourthly, by greatness of honour, according as all honour shown to the Son of God was equally shown to the Son of man, on account of His Union with the Son of God; fifthly, by equivocation—that is, sharing of names, according as we say that this man is God and the Son of God. Now it is plain that all these modes imply an accidental union.

But some more recent masters, thinking to avoid these heresies, through ignorance fell into them. For some¹ conceded one person in Christ, but maintained two hypostases, or two supposita, saying that a man, composed of body and soul, was from the beginning of his conception assumed by the Word of God. And this is the first opinion set down by the Master (III. Sent., d. 6).² But others³ desirous of keeping the unity of person, held that the soul of Christ was not united to the body, but that these two were mutually separate, and were united to the Word accidentally, so that the number of persons might not be increased. And this is the third opinion which the Master sets down (ibid.)⁴

But both of these opinions fall into the heresy of Nestorius; the first, indeed, because to maintain two hypostases or supposita in Christ is the same as to maintain two persons, as was shown above (A. 3). And if stress is laid on the word person, we must have in mind that even Nestorius spoke of unity of person on account of the unity of dignity and honour. Hence the fifth Council (Constantinople II., coll. viii, can. 5)⁵ directs an anathema against such a one as holds "one person in dignity, honour and adoration, as Theodore and Nestorius foolishly wrote." But the other opinion falls into the error of Nestorius by maintaining an accidental union. For there is no difference in saying that the Word of God is united to the Man Christ by indwelling, as in His temple (as Nestorius said), or by putting on man, as a garment, which is the third opinion; rather it says something worse than Nestorius—namely, that the soul and body are not united.

Now the Catholic faith, holding the mean between the above positions, does not affirm that the union of God and man took place in the essence or nature, nor yet in something accidental, but midway, in a subsistence or hypostasis. Hence in the fifth Council (ibid.)⁶ we read: "Since the unity may be understood in many ways, those who follow the impiety of Apollinaris and Eutyches, professing the destruction of what came together" (that is, destroying both natures), "confess a union by mingling; but the followers of Theodore and Nestorius, maintaining division, introduce a union of affection. But the Holy Church of God, rejecting the impiety of both these treasons, confesses a union of the Word of God with flesh, by composition, which is in subsistence."

Therefore it is plain that the second of the three opinions mentioned by the Master,⁷ which holds one hypostasis of God and man, is not to be called an opinion, but an article of Catholic faith. So likewise the first opinion which holds two hypostases, and the third which holds an accidental union, are not to be styled opinions, but heresies condemned by the Church in Councils.

Reply Obj. 1. As Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 26):⁸ "Examples need not be wholly and at all points similar, for what is wholly similar is the same, and not an example, and especially in Divine things, for it is impossible to find a wholly similar example in the Theology"—that is, in the Godhead of Persons—"and in the Dispensation"—that is, the mystery of the Incarnation. Hence the human nature in Christ is likened to a habit—that is, a garment, not indeed in regard to accidental union, but inasmuch as the Word is seen by the human nature, as a man by his garment, and also inasmuch as the garment is changed, for it is shaped according to the figure of him who puts it on, and yet he is not changed from his form on account of the garment. So likewise the human nature assumed by the Word of God is ennobled, but the Word of God is not changed, as Augustine says.⁹

Reply Obj. 2. Whatever accrues after the completion of the being comes accidentally, unless it be taken into communion with the complete being, just as in the resurrection the body comes to the soul which pre-exists, yet not accidentally, because it is assumed to the same being, so that the body has vital being through the soul; but it is not so with whiteness, for the being of whiteness is other from the being of man to which whiteness comes. But the Word of God from all eternity had complete being in hypostasis or person, while in time the human nature accrued to it, not as if it were assumed to one being according as this is of the nature (even as the body is assumed to the being of the soul), but to one being according as this is of the hypostasis or person. Hence the human nature is not accidentally united to the Son of God.

Reply Obj. 3. Accident is divided against substance. Now substance, as is plain from the Metaphysics,¹ is taken in two ways: first, for essence or nature; secondly, for suppositum or hypostasis. Hence the union having taken place in the hypostasis is enough to show that it is not an accidental union, although the union did not take place in the nature.

Reply Obj. 4. Not everything that is assumed as an instrument pertains to the hypostasis of the one who assumes, as is plain in the case of a saw or a sword; yet nothing prevents what is assumed into the unity of the hypostasis from being as an instrument, even as the body of man or his members. Hence Nestorius held that the human nature was assumed by the Word merely as an instrument, and not into the unity of the hypostasis. And therefore he did not concede that the man was really the Son of God, but His instrument. Hence Cyril says (Epist. ad Monach. Aegyptii):² "The Scripture does not affirm that this Emmanuel—that is, Christ—"was assumed for the office of an instrument, but as God truly humanized"—that is, made man. But Damascene held³ that the human nature in Christ is an instrument belonging to the unity of the hypostasis.

ARTICLE 7. Whether the Union of the Divine and Human Natures Is Anything Created?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It would seem that the union of the Divine and human natures is not anything created.

Objection 1. For there can be nothing created in God, because whatever is in God is God. But the union is in God, for God Himself is united to human nature. Therefore it seems that the union is not anything created.

Obj. 2. Further, the end holds first place in everything. But the end of the union is the Divine hypostasis or Person in which the union is terminated. Therefore it seems that this union ought chiefly to be judged with reference to the condition of the Divine hypostasis, which is not anything created. Therefore the union is nothing created.

Obj. 3. Further, "That which is the cause of a thing being such is still more so."⁴ But man is said to be the Creator on account of the union. Therefore much more is the union itself nothing created, but the Creator.

On the contrary, Whatever has a beginning in time is created. Now this union was not from eternity, but began to be in time. Therefore the union is something created.

I answer that, The union of which we are speaking is a relation which we consider between the Divine and the human nature, according as they come together in one Person of the Son of God. Now, as was said above (Part I, q. XIII, A. 7), every relation which we consider between God and the creature is really in the creature, by whose change the relation is brought into being, whereas it is not really in God, but according to reason only, since it does not arise from any change in God. And hence we must say that the union of which we are speaking is not really in God, but only in reason; but in the human nature, which is a creature, it is really. Therefore we must say it is something created.

Reply Obj. 1. This union is not really in God, but only in reason, for God is said to be united to a creature from the fact that the creature is united to God without any change in Him.

Reply Obj. 2. The nature of a relation, as of motion, depends upon the end or term, but its being depends on the subject. And since this union has real being nowhere save in a created nature, as was said above, it follows that it has a created being.

Reply Obj. 3. A man is called Creator and is God because of the union, since it is terminated in the Divine hypostasis; yet it does not follow that the union itself is the Creator or God, because that a thing is said to be created regards its being rather than its relation.

ARTICLE 8. Whether Union Is the Same As Assumption?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It would seem that union is the same as assumption.

Objection 1. For relations, as motions, are specified by their terms. Now the term of assumption and union is one and the same—namely, the Divine hypostasis. Therefore it seems that union and assumption are not different.

Obj. 2. Further, in the mystery of the Incarnation the same thing seems to be what unites and what assumes, and what is united and what is assumed. But union and assumption seem to follow the action and passion of the thing uniting and the united, of the thing assuming and the assumed. Therefore union seems to be the same as assumption.

Obj. 3. Further, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 11):¹ "Union is one thing, incarnation is another: for union demands mere joining together, and leaves unsaid the end of the joining; but incarnation and being made human determine the end of joining." But likewise assumption does not determine the end of joining together. Therefore it seems that union is the same as assumption.

On the contrary, The Divine Nature is said to be united, not assumed.

I answer that, As was said above (A. 7), union implies a certain relation of the Divine Nature and the human, according as they come together in one Person. Now all relations which begin to be in time are brought about by some change, and change consists in action and passion. Hence the first and principal difference between assumption and union must be said to be that union implies the relation: assumption however implies the action whereby someone is said to assume, or the passion whereby something is said to be assumed.

Now from this difference another second difference arises, for assumption implies becoming, whereas union implies having become, and therefore the thing uniting is said to be united, but the thing assuming is not said to be assumed. For the human nature is taken to be in the term of assumption to the Divine hypostasis when man is spoken of, and hence we can truly say that the Son of God, Who assumes human nature unto Himself, is man. But human nature, considered in itself—that is, in the abstract—is viewed as assumed; and we do not say the Son of God is human nature.

From this same follows a third difference which is that a relation, especially one of equivalence, is no more to one extreme than to the other, whereas action and passion bear themselves differently to the agent and the patient, and to different terms. And hence assumption determines the term from which and the term to which, for assumption means as it were a taking to oneself from another (ad se sumere). But union determines none of these things; hence it may be said indifferently that the human nature is united with the Divine, or conversely. But the Divine Nature is not said to be assumed by the human, but conversely, because the human nature is joined to the Divine personality so that the Divine Person subsists in human nature.

Reply Obj. 1. Union and assumption have not the same relation to the term, but a different relation, as was said above.

Reply Obj. 2. What unites and what assumes are not the same. For whatsoever Person assumes unites, and not conversely. For the Person of the Father united the human nature to the Son, but not to Himself; and hence He is said to unite and not to assume. So likewise the united and the assumed are not identical, for the Divine Nature is said to be united, but not assumed.

Reply Obj. 3. Assumption determines with whom the union is made on the part of the one assuming, since assumption means taking unto oneself, whereas incarnation and being made human (determine with whom the union is made) on the part of the thing assumed, which is flesh or human nature. And thus assumption differs logically both from union and from incarnation or being made human.

ARTICLE 9. Whether the Union of the Two Natures in Christ Is the Greatest of All Unions?

We proceed thus to the Ninth Article: It would seem that the union of the two natures in Christ is not the greatest of all unions.

Objection 1. For what is united falls short of the unity of what is one, since what is united is by participation, but what is one is one by essence. Now in created things some are said absolutely to be one, as is shown especially in unity itself, which is the principle of number. Therefore the union of which we are speaking does not imply the greatest of all unions.

Obj. 2. Further, the greater the distance between things united, the less the union. Now, the things united by this union are most distant —namely, the Divine and human natures, for they are infinitely apart. Therefore their union is the least of all.

Obj. 3. Further, from union there results one. But from the union of soul and body in us there arises what is one in person and nature, whereas from the union of the Divine and human nature there results what is one in person only. Therefore the union of soul and body is greater than that of the Divine and human natures; and hence the union of which we speak does not imply the greatest unity.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Trin. i, 10)¹ that “man is in the Son of God more than the Son in the Father.” But the Son is in the Father by unity of essence, and man is in the Son by the union of the Incarnation. Therefore the union of the Incarnation is greater than the unity of the Divine Essence, which nevertheless is the greatest union; and thus the union of the Incarnation implies the greatest unity.

I answer that, Union implies the joining of several in some one thing. Therefore the union of the Incarnation may be taken in two ways: first, in regard to the things united; secondly, in regard to that in which they are united. And in this regard this union has a pre-eminence over other unions, for the unity of the Divine Person, in which the two natures are united, is the greatest. But it has no pre-eminence in regard to the things united.

Reply Obj. 1. The unity of the Divine Person is greater than numerical unity, which is the principle of number. For the unity of a Divine Person is an uncreated and self-subsisting unity, not received into another by participation. Also, it is complete in itself, having in itself whatever pertains to the nature of unity; and therefore the nature of a part does not pertain to it, as in numerical unity, which is a part of number, and which is shared in by the things numbered. And hence in this respect the union of the Incarnation is higher than numerical unity by reason of the unity of the Divine Person, and not by reason of the human nature, which is not the unity of the Divine Person, but is united to it.

Reply Obj. 2. This reason regards the things united, and not the Person in Whom the union takes place.

Reply Obj. 3. The unity of the Divine Person is greater than the unity of person and nature in us, and hence the union of the Incarnation is greater than the union of soul and body in us.

And because what is urged in the argument on the contrary rests upon what is untrue—namely, that the union of the Incarnation is greater than the unity of the Divine Persons in Essence—we must say to the authority of Augustine that the human nature is not more in the Son of God than the Son of God in the Father, but much less. But the man in some respects is more in the Son than the Son in the Father—namely, in so far as the same suppositum is signified when I say man, meaning Christ, and when I say Son of God; the same suppositum however is not signified by the words Father and Son.

ARTICLE 10. Whether the Union of the Two Natures in Christ Took Place by Grace?

We proceed thus to the Tenth Article: It would seem that the union of the Incarnation did not take place by grace.

Objection 1. For grace is an accident, as was shown above (Part I-II, q. cx, a. 2). But the union of the human nature to the Divine did not take place accidentally, as was shown above (a. 6). Therefore it seems that the union of the Incarnation did not take place by grace.

Obj. 2. Further, the subject of grace is the soul. But it is written (Col. 2. 9): In Christ (Vulg., Him) dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead corporeally. Therefore it seems that this union did not take place by grace.

Obj. 3. Further, every saint is united to God by grace. If, therefore, the union of the Incarnation was by grace, it would seem that Christ is said to be God no more than other holy men.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Praed. Sanct. x):² “By the same grace every man is made a Christian, from the beginning of his faith, as this man from His beginning was made Christ.” But this man became Christ by union with the Divine Nature. Therefore this union was by grace.

I answer that, As was said above (Part I-II, q. cx, a. 1), grace is taken in two ways: first, as the will of God freely giving something; secondly, as the free gift itself of God. Now human nature stands in need of the gratuitous will of God in order to be lifted up to God, since this is above its natural capability. Moreover, human nature is lifted up to God in two ways: first, by operation, by which, for example, the saints know and love God; secondly, by personal being, and this mode belongs exclusively to Christ, in Whom human nature is assumed so as to be in the Person of the Son of God. But it is plain that for the perfection of operation the power needs to be perfected by a habit, whereas that a nature has being in its own suppositum does not take place by means of a habit.

And hence we must say that if grace be understood as the will of God gratuitously doing something or holding anything as well-pleasing or acceptable to Him, the union of the Incarnation took place by grace, even as the union of the saints with God by knowledge and love. But if grace be taken as the free gift of God, then the fact that the human nature is united to the Divine Person may be called a grace, since it took place without being preceded by any merits—but not as though there were an habitual grace, by means of which the union took place.

Reply Obj. 1. The grace which is an accident is a certain likeness of the Divinity participated by man. But by the Incarnation human nature is not said to have participated a likeness of the Divine Nature, but is said to be united to the Divine Nature itself in the Person of the Son. But the thing itself is greater than a participated likeness of it.

Reply Obj. 2. Habitual grace is only in the soul; but the grace—that is, the free gift of God—of being united to the Divine Person belongs to the whole human nature, which is composed of soul and body. And in this way it is said that the fulness of the Godhead dwelt corporeally in Christ because the Divine Nature is united not merely to the soul, but to the body also. Although it may also be said¹ that it dwelt in Christ corporeally—that is, not as in a shadow, as it dwelt in the sacraments of the old law, of which it is said in the same place (verse 17) that they are the shadow of things to come, but the body is Christ (Vulg., Christ's), according, that is, as the body is opposed to the shadow.

And some say² that the Godhead is said to have dwelt in Christ corporeally—that is, in three ways, just as a body has three dimensions: first, by essence, presence, and power, as in other creatures; secondly, by sanctifying grace, as in the saints; thirdly, by personal union, which is proper to Christ.

Hence the reply to the third objection is manifest—namely, because the union of the Incarnation did not take place by habitual grace alone as in the way other saints are joined to God, but according to the subsistence or person.

ARTICLE 11. Whether Any Merits Preceded the Union of the Word Incarnate?

We proceed thus to the Eleventh Article: It would seem that the union of the Incarnation followed upon certain merits.

Objection 1. For upon Ps. 32. 22, Let Thy mercy, O Lord, be upon us, as, etc., a gloss says:³ “Here the prophet’s desire for the Incarnation and its merited fulfilment are hinted at.” Therefore the Incarnation falls under merit.

Obj. 2. Further, whoever merits anything merits that without which it cannot be. But the ancient Fathers merited eternal life, to which they were able to attain only by the Incarnation; for Gregory says (Moral. xiii, 43):⁴ “Those who came into this world before Christ’s coming, whatsoever eminency of justice they may have had, could not, on being divested of the body, at once be admitted into the bosom of the heavenly country, seeing that He had not as yet come Who, by His own descending, should place the souls of the righteous in their everlasting seat.” Therefore it would seem that they merited the Incarnation.

Obj. 3. Further, of the Blessed Virgin it is sung that “she merited to bear the Lord of all,” and this took place through the Incarnation. Therefore the Incarnation falls under merit.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Praed. Sanct. xv):⁵ “Whoever can find merits preceding the singular generation of our Head may also find merits preceding the repeated regeneration of us His members.” But no merits preceded our regeneration, according to Titus 3. 5: Not by the works of justice which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us, by the laver of regeneration. Therefore no merits preceded the generation of Christ.

I answer that, With regard to Christ Himself, it is clear from the above (AA. 2, 3, 6) that no merits of His could have preceded the union. For we do not hold that He was first of all a mere man, and that afterwards by the merits of a good life it was granted Him to become the Son of God, as Photinus held,⁷ but we hold that from the beginning of His conception this man was truly the Son of God, seeing that He had no other hypostasis but that of the Son of God, according to Luke 1. 35: The Holy which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God. And hence every operation of this man followed the union. Therefore no operation of His could have been meritorious of the union.

Neither could the deeds of any other man whatsoever have adequately merited this union. First, because the meritorious works of man are properly ordered to happiness, which is the reward of virtue, and consists in the full enjoyment of God. The union of the Incarnation, however, since it is in the personal being, transcends the union of the beatified mind with God, which is through the act of possession, and therefore it cannot fall under merit. Secondly, because grace cannot fall under merit, for it is the principle of meriting. Hence, still less does the Incarnation fall under merit, since it is the principle of grace, according to John 1. 17: Grace and truth came by Jesus Christ. Thirdly, because the Incarnation is for the reformation of the entire human nature, and therefore it does not fall under the merit of any individual man, since the goodness of a mere man cannot be the cause of the good of the entire nature. Yet the holy Fathers fittingly merited the Incarnation by desiring and beseeching; for it was becoming that God should hearken to those who obeyed Him.

And thereby the reply to the first objection is manifest.

Reply Obj. 2. It is false that under merit falls everything without which there can be no reward. For there is something pre-required not merely for reward, but also for merit, as the Divine goodness and grace and the very nature of man. And again, the mystery of the Incarnation is the principle of merit, because of His fulness we all have received (John 1. 16).

Reply Obj. 3. The Blessed Virgin is said to have merited to bear the Lord of all not because she merited His Incarnation, but because by the grace bestowed upon her she merited that grade of purity and holiness which fitted her to be the Mother of God.

ARTICLE 12. Whether the Grace of Union Was Natural to the Man Christ?

We proceed thus to the Twelfth Article: It would seem that the grace of union was not natural to the man Christ.

Objection 1. For the union of the Incarnation did not take place in the nature, but in the Person, as was said above (A. 2). Now a thing is designated according to its end. Therefore this grace ought rather to be called personal than natural.

Obj. 2. Further, grace is divided against nature, even as gratuitous things, which are from God, are distinguished from natural things, which are from an intrinsic principle. But if things are divided in opposition to one another, one is not designated by the other. Therefore the grace of Christ was not natural to Him.

Obj. 3. Further, natural is that which is according to nature. But the grace of union is not natural to Christ in regard to the Divine Nature, otherwise it would belong to the other Persons; nor is it natural to Him according to the human nature, otherwise it would belong to all men, since they are of the same nature as He. Therefore it would seem that the grace of union is in no way natural to Christ.

On the contrary, Augustine says (Enchir. xl):¹ "In the assumption of human nature, grace itself became somewhat natural to that man, so as to leave no room for sin in Him."

I answer that, According to the Philosopher,² nature designates, in one way, birth itself, in another, the essence of a thing. Hence natural may be taken in two ways: first, for what is only from the essential principles of a thing, as it is natural to fire to mount upwards; secondly, we call natural to man what he has had from his birth, according to Eph. 2. 3: We were by nature children of wrath; and Wisd. 12. 10: They were a wicked generation, and their malice natural. Therefore the grace of Christ, whether of union or habitual, cannot be called natural as if caused by the principles of the human nature of Christ, although it may be called natural as if coming to the human nature of Christ by the causality of His Divine Nature. But these two kinds of grace are said to be natural to Christ in so far as He had them from His nativity, since from the beginning of His conception the human nature was united to the Divine Person, and His soul was filled with the gift of grace.

Reply Obj. 1. Although the union did not take place in the nature, yet it was caused by the power of the Divine Nature, which is truly the nature of Christ, and it, moreover, belonged to Christ from the beginning of His nativity.

Reply Obj. 2. The union is not said to be of grace and natural in the same respect; for it is called a grace in so far as it is not from merit, and it is said to be natural in so far as by the power of the Divine Nature it was in the humanity of Christ from His nativity.

Reply Obj. 3. The grace of union is not natural to Christ according to His human nature, as if it were caused by the principles of the human nature, and hence need not belong to all men. Nevertheless, it is natural to Him in regard to the human nature on account of the property of His birth, seeing that He was conceived by the Holy Ghost, so that He might be at the same time the natural Son of God and of man. But it is natural to Him in regard to the Divine Nature, since the Divine Nature is the active principle of this grace; and this belongs to the whole Trinity—namely, to be the active principle of this grace.

² Metaphysics, V, 4 (1014^b16; b35).

QUESTION III

OF THE MODE OF UNION ON THE PART OF THE PERSON ASSUMING (In Eight Articles)

WE must now consider the union on the part of the Person assuming, and under this head there are eight points of inquiry: (1) Whether to assume is befitting to a Divine Person? (2) Whether it is befitting to the Divine Nature? (3) Whether the nature abstracted from the personality can assume? (4) Whether one Person can assume without another? (5) Whether each Person can assume? (6) Whether several Persons can assume one individual nature? (7) Whether one Person can assume two individual natures? (8) Whether it was more fitting for the Person of the Son of God to assume human nature than for another Divine Person?

ARTICLE 1. Whether It Is Fitting for a Divine Person to Assume a Created Nature?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that it is not befitting to a Divine Person to assume a created nature.

Objection 1. For a Divine Person signifies something most perfect. Now no addition can be made to what is perfect. Therefore, since to assume is to take to oneself, so that what is assumed is added to the one who assumes, it does not seem to be befitting to a Divine Person to assume a created nature.

Obj. 2. Further, that to which anything is assumed is communicated in some degree to what is assumed to it, just as dignity is communicated to whosoever is assumed to a dignity. But it is of the nature of a person to be incommunicable, as was said above (Part I. q. xxix, A. 3, reply 4; q. xxx, A. 4). Therefore it is not befitting to a Divine Person to assume—that is, to take to Himself.

Obj. 3. Further, person is constituted by nature. But it is not allowable that the thing constituted should assume the constituent, since the effect does not act on its cause. Hence it is not befitting to a Person to assume a nature.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Fide ad Petrum, ii):¹ “This God—that is, the Only-Begotten One—took the form”—that is, the nature—“of a servant to His own Person.” But the Only-Begotten God is a Person. Therefore it is befitting to a Person to take—that is, to assume a nature.

I answer that, In the word assumption are implied two things—namely, the principle and the term of the act, for to assume is to take something to oneself. Now of this assumption a Person is both the principle and the term. The principle, because it properly belongs to a person to act, and this assuming of flesh took place by the Divine action. Likewise a Person is the term of this assumption, because, as was said above (q. ii, AA. 1 and 2), the union took place in the Person, and not in the nature. Hence it is plain that to assume a nature is most properly befitting to a Person.

Reply Obj. 1. Since the Divine Person is infinite, no addition can be made to it. Hence Cyril says in a letter to the General Council of Ephesus:² “We do not conceive the mode of conjunction to be according to addition,” just as in the union of man with God, which is by the grace of adoption, nothing is added to God, but what is Divine is united to man; hence, not God but man is perfected.

Reply Obj. 2. A Person is said to be incommunicable in so far as It cannot be predicated of several supposita, but nothing prevents several things being predicated of the Person. Hence it is not contrary to the nature of person to be communicated so as to subsist in several natures, for even in a created person several natures may concur accidentally, as in the person of one man we find quantity and quality. But this is proper to a Divine Person, on account of its infinity, that there should be a concurrence of natures in it, not accidentally, but in subsistence.

Reply Obj. 3. As was said above (q. ii, A. 6, reply 2), the human nature constitutes a Divine Person not absolutely but according as the Person is designated from such a nature. For human nature does not make the Son of Man to be absolutely, since He was from eternity, but only to be man. It is by the Divine Nature that a Divine Person is constituted absolutely.

Hence the Divine Person is not said to assume the Divine Nature, but to assume the human nature.

ARTICLE 2. Whether It Is Befitting To the Divine Nature To Assume?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that it is not befitting to the Divine Nature to assume.

Objection 1. Because, as was said above (A. 1), to assume is to take to oneself. But the Divine Nature did not take to Itself human nature, for the union did not take place in the nature but in the person, as was said above (q. II, AA. 1 and 2). Hence it is not befitting to the Divine Nature to assume human nature.

Obj. 2. Further, the Divine Nature is common to the three Persons. If, therefore, it is befitting to the Divine Nature to assume, it consequently is befitting to the three Persons; and thus the Father assumed human nature even as the Son, which is erroneous.

Obj. 3. Further, to assume is to act. But to act befits a person, not a nature, which is rather taken to be the principle by which the agent acts. Therefore to assume is not befitting to the nature.

On the contrary, Augustine¹ says (De Fide ad Petrum, ii): "That nature which remains eternally begotten of the Father (that is, which is received from the Father by eternal generation) took our nature free of sin from His Mother."

I answer that, As was stated above (A. 1), in the word assumption two things are signified—namely, the principle and the term of the action. Now to be the principle of the assumption belongs to the Divine Nature in itself, because the assumption took place by Its power, but to be the term of the assumption does not belong to the Divine Nature in itself, but by reason of the Person in Whom It is considered to be. Hence a Person is primarily and most properly said to assume, but it may be said secondarily that the Nature assumed a nature to Its Person. And after the same manner the Nature is also said to be incarnate, not that it is changed to flesh, but that it assumed the nature of flesh. Hence Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 6):² "Following the blessed Athanasius and Cyril we say that the Nature of God is incarnate."

Reply Obj. 1. Oneself is reciprocal, and points to the same suppositum. But the Divine Nature does not differ in suppositum from the Person of the Word. Hence, inasmuch as the Divine Nature took human nature to the Person of the Word, It is said to take it to Itself. But although the Father takes human nature to the Person of the Word, He did not thereby take it to Himself, for the suppositum of the Father and the Son is not the same; and hence it cannot properly be said that the Father assumes human nature.

Reply Obj. 2. What is befitting to the Divine Nature in Itself is befitting to the three Persons, as goodness, wisdom, and the like. But to assume belongs to It by reason of the Person of the Word, as was said above, and hence it is befitting to that Person alone.

Reply Obj. 3. As in God "what is" and "that by which it is" are the same, so likewise in Him "what acts" and "that by which it acts" are the same, since everything acts in so far as it is a being. Hence the Divine Nature is both that by which God acts, and the very God Who acts.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the Nature Abstracted from the Personality by the Intellect Can Assume?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that if we abstract the Personality by our intellect, the Nature cannot assume.

Objection 1. For it was said above (A. 2) that it belongs to the Nature to assume by reason of the Person. But what belongs to one by reason of another cannot belong to it if the other is removed; just as a body, which is visible by reason of colour, without colour cannot be seen. Hence if the Personality be abstracted by the intellect, the Nature cannot assume.

Obj. 2. Further, assumption implies the term of union, as was said above (A. 1). But the union cannot take place in the nature, but only in the Person. Therefore, if the Personality be abstracted, the Divine Nature cannot assume.

Obj. 3. Further, it has been said above (Part I, q. XL, A. 3) that in the Godhead if the Personality is abstracted, nothing remains. But the one who assumes is something. Therefore, if the Personality is abstracted, the Divine Nature cannot assume.

On the contrary, In the Godhead Personality signifies a personal property, and this is threefold—namely, Paternity, Sonship and Procession, as was said above (Part I, q. xxx, A. 2). Now if we take these away by the intellect, there still remains the omnipotence of God, by which the Incarnation was wrought, as the angel says (Luke 1. 37): No word shall be impossible with God. Therefore it seems that if the Personality be removed, the Divine Nature can still assume.

I answer that, The intellect stands in two ways towards God. First, to know God as He is, and in this manner it is impossible for the intellect to circumscribe something in God and leave the rest, for all that is in God is one, except the distinction of Persons; and as regards these, if one is removed the other is taken away, since they are distinguished by relations only which must be together at the same time. Secondly, the intellect stands towards God, not indeed as knowing God as He is, but in its own way—that is, understanding manifoldly and separately what in God is one; and in this way our intellect can understand the Divine goodness and wisdom, and the like, which are called essential attributes, without understanding Paternity or Sonship, which are called Personalities. And hence if we abstract Personality by our intellect, we may still understand the Nature assuming.

Reply Obj. 1. Because in God “what is”, and “that by which it is”, are one, if any one of the things which are attributed to God in the abstract is considered in itself, separated from all else, it will still be something subsisting, and consequently a Person, since it is an intellectual nature. Hence just as we now say three Persons, on account of holding three personal properties, so likewise if we exclude by our intellect the personal properties there will still remain in our consideration the Divine Nature as subsisting and as a Person. And in this way It may be understood to assume human nature by reason of Its subsistence or Personality.

Reply Obj. 2. Even if the personal properties of the three Persons are circumscribed by the intellect, nevertheless there will remain in our thoughts the one Personality of God, as the Jews understand. And the assumption can be terminated in It, as we now say it is terminated in the Person of the Word.

Reply Obj. 3. If we abstract the Personality by the intellect, it is said that nothing remains by way of resolution—that is, as if the subject of the relation and the relation itself were distinct because all we can think of in God is considered as a subsisting suppositum. However, some of the things predicated of God can be understood without others, not by way of resolution, but by the way mentioned above.

ARTICLE 4. Whether One Person Without Another Can Assume a Created Nature?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that one Person cannot assume a created nature without another assuming it.

Objection 1. For “the works of the Trinity are inseparable,” as Augustine says (Enchir. xxxviii).¹ But as the three Persons have one essence, so likewise They have one operation. Now to assume is a kind of operation. Therefore it cannot belong to one divine person without belonging to another.

Obj. 2. Further, as we say the Person of the Son became incarnate, so also did the Nature, for “the whole Divine Nature became incarnate in one of Its hypostases,” as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 6).² But the Nature is common to the three Persons. Therefore the assumption is.

Obj. 3. Further, as the human nature in Christ is assumed by God, so likewise are men assumed by Him through grace, according to Rom. 14. 3: God hath taken him to Him. But this assumption pertains to all the Persons; therefore the first also.

On the contrary, Dionysius says (Div. Nom. ii)³ that the mystery of the Incarnation pertains to discrete theology—that is, according to which something distinct is said of the Divine Persons.

I answer that, As was said above (AA. 1, 2), assumption implies two things—namely, the act of assuming and the term of assumption. Now the act of assumption proceeds from the Divine power, which is common to the three Persons, but the term of the assumption is a Person, as stated above (A. 2). Hence what has to do with action in the assumption is common to the three Persons, but what pertains to the nature of term belongs to one Person in such a manner as not to belong to another; for the three Persons caused the human nature to be united to the one Person of the Son.

Reply Obj. 1. This argument regards the operation, and the conclusion would follow if it implied this operation only, without the term, which is a Person.

Reply Obj. 2. The Nature is said to be incarnate and to assume by reason of the Person in Whom the union is terminated, as stated above (AA. 1 and 2), and not as it is common to the three Persons. Now “the whole Divine Nature” is said to be “incarnate”; not that it is incarnate in all the Persons, but because nothing is wanting to the perfection of the Divine Nature of the Person incarnate.

Reply Obj. 3. The assumption which takes place by the grace of adoption is terminated in a certain participation of the Divine Nature by an assimilation to Its goodness, according to II Pet. 1. 4: That you may be made partakers of the Divine Nature, and hence this assumption is common to the three Persons, both in regard to the principle and the term. But the assumption which is by the grace of union is common on the part of the principle, but not on the part of the term, as was said above.

ARTICLE 5. Whether Each of the Divine Persons Could Have Assumed Human Nature?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that no other Divine Person could have assumed human nature except the Person of the Son.

Objection 1. For by this assumption it has been brought about that God is the Son of Man. But it was not becoming that either the Father or the Holy Ghost should be said to be a Son, for this would tend to the confusion of the Divine Persons. Therefore the Father and Holy Ghost could not have assumed flesh.

Obj. 2. Further, by the Divine Incarnation men have come into possession of the adoption of sons, according to Rom. 8. 15: For you have not received the spirit of bondage again in fear, but the spirit of adoption of sons. But sonship by adoption is a participated likeness of natural sonship which does not belong to the Father nor the Holy Ghost; hence it is said (Rom. 8. 29): For whom He foreknew He also predestinated to be made conformable to the image of His Son. Therefore it seems that no other Person except the Person of the Son could have become incarnate.

Obj. 3. Further, the Son is said to be sent and to be begotten by the temporal nativity, according as He became incarnate. But it does not belong to the Father to be sent, for He is innascible, as was said above (Part I, q. xxxii, a. 3; q. xliii, a. 4). Therefore at least the Person of the Father cannot become incarnate.

On the contrary, Whatever the Son can do, so can the Father and the Holy Ghost, for otherwise the power of the three Persons would not be one. But the Son was able to become incarnate. Therefore the Father and the Holy Ghost were able to become incarnate.

I answer that, As was said above (AA. 1, 2, 4), assumption implies two things—namely, the act of the one assuming and the term of the assumption. Now the principle of the act is the Divine power, and the term is a Person. But the Divine power is indifferently and commonly in all the Persons. Moreover, the nature of Personality is common to all the Persons, although the personal properties are different. Now whenever a power regards several things indifferently, it can terminate its action in any of them indifferently, as is plain in rational powers, which regard opposites, and can do either of them. Therefore the Divine power could have united human nature to the Person of the Father or of the Holy Ghost, as It united it to the Person of the Son. And hence we must say that the Father or the Holy Ghost could have assumed flesh even as the Son.

Reply Obj. 1. The temporal sonship, whereby Christ is said to be the Son of Man, does not constitute His Person, as does the eternal Sonship, but is something following upon the temporal birth. Hence, if the name of son were transferred to the Father or the Holy Ghost in this manner, there would be no confusion of the Divine Persons.

Reply Obj. 2. Adoptive sonship is a certain participation of natural sonship; but it takes place in us, by appropriation, by the Father, Who is the principle of natural sonship, and by the gift of the Holy Ghost, Who is the love of the Father and Son, according to Gal. 4. 6: God hath sent the Spirit of His Son into your hearts crying, Abba, Father. And therefore, even as by the Incarnation of the Son we receive adoptive sonship in the likeness of His natural sonship, so likewise, had the Father become incarnate, we should have received adoptive sonship from Him, as from the principle of the natural sonship, and from the Holy Ghost as from the common bond of Father and Son.

Reply Obj. 3. It belongs to the Father to be innascible as to eternal birth, and the temporal birth would not destroy this. But the Son of God is said to be sent in regard to the Incarnation because He is from another, without which the Incarnation would not suffice for the nature of mission.

ARTICLE 6. Whether Several Divine Persons Can Assume One and the Same Individual Nature?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that two Divine Persons cannot assume one and the same individual nature.

Objection 1. For, this being granted, there would either be several men or one. But not several, for just as one Divine Nature in several Persons does not make several gods, so one human nature in several persons does not make several men. Nor could there be only one man, for one man is this man, which signifies one person; and hence the distinction of three Divine Persons would be destroyed, which cannot be allowed. Therefore neither two nor three Persons can take one human nature.

Obj. 2. Further, the assumption is terminated in the unity of Person, as has been said above (A. 4). But the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are not one Person. Therefore the three Persons cannot assume one human nature.

Obj. 3. Further, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 3, 4),¹ and Augustine (De Trin. i, 13),² that from the Incarnation of God the Son it follows that whatever is said of the Son of God is said of the Son of Man, and conversely. Hence, if three Persons were to assume one human nature, it would follow that whatever is said of each of the three Persons would be said of the man; and conversely, what was said of the man could be said of each of the three Persons. Therefore what is proper to the Father—namely, to beget the Son—would be said of the man, and conversely would be said of the Son of God; and this could not be. Therefore it is impossible that the three Persons should assume one human nature.

On the contrary, The Incarnate Person subsists in two natures—namely, the divine and human. But the three Persons can subsist in one Divine Nature. Therefore they can also subsist in one human nature in such a way that the human nature be assumed by the three Persons.

I answer that, As was said above (Q. II, A. 5, reply 1), by the union of the soul and body in Christ neither a new person is made nor a new hypostasis, but one human nature is assumed to the Divine Person or hypostasis, which, indeed, does not take place by the power of the human nature, but by the power of the Divine Person. Now such is the characteristic of the Divine Persons that one does not exclude another from communicating in the same nature, but only in the same Person. Hence, since in the mystery of the Incarnation “the whole reason of the deed is the power of the doer,” as Augustine says (Ep. ad Volusianum, cxxxvii),³ it is rather to be judged of it in regard to the nature of the Divine Person assuming, and not according to the nature of the human nature assumed. Therefore it is not impossible that two or three Divine Persons should assume one human nature.

But it would be impossible for them to assume one human hypostasis or person; thus Anselm says, (Cur Deus Homo, ii, 9),⁴ that “several Persons cannot assume one and the same man to unity of Person.”

Reply Obj. 1. In the hypothesis that three Persons assume one human nature, it would be true to say that the three Persons were one man because of the one human nature. For just as it is now true to say that the three Persons are one God on account of the one Divine Nature, so it would be true to say they are one man on account of the one human nature. Nor would the “one” imply unity of person, but unity in human nature; for it could not be argued that because the three Persons were one man they were one absolutely. For nothing hinders our saying that men, who are many absolutely, are in some respect one—for example, one people—and as Augustine says (De Trin. vi, 3):⁵ “The Spirit of God and the spirit of man are by nature different, but by inherence one spirit results,” according to I Cor. 6. 17: He who is joined to the Lord is one spirit.

Reply Obj. 2. In this supposition the human nature would be assumed to the unity not indeed of one Person, but to the unity of each Person, so that even as the Divine Nature has a natural unity with each Person, so also the human nature would have a unity with each Person by assumption.

Reply Obj. 3. In the mystery of the Incarnation, there results a communication of the properties belonging to the nature, because whatever belongs to the nature can be predicated of the Person subsisting in that nature, no matter to which of the natures it may apply. Hence in this hypothesis, of the Person of the Father may be predicated what belongs to the human nature and what belongs to the Divine; and likewise of the Person of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. But what belongs to the Person of the Father by reason of His own Person could not be attributed to the Person of the Son or Holy Ghost on account of the distinction of Persons which would still remain. Therefore it might be said that as the Father was unbegotten, so the man was unbegotten, according as “man” stood for the Person of the Father. But if one were to go on to say, “The man is unbegotten; the Son is man; therefore the Son is unbegotten,” it would be the fallacy of figure of speech or of accident; even as we now say God is unbegotten because the Father is unbegotten, yet we cannot conclude that the Son is unbegotten, although He is God.

ARTICLE 7. Whether One Divine Person Can Assume Two Human Natures?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It would seem that one Divine Person cannot assume two human natures.

Objection 1. For the nature assumed in the mystery of the Incarnation has no other suppositum than the suppositum of the Divine Person, as is plain from what has been stated above (Q. II, AA. 3 and 6). Therefore, if we suppose one Person to assume two human natures, there would be one suppositum of two natures of the same species, which would seem to imply a contradiction, for the nature of one species is only multiplied by a distinction of supposita.

Obj. 2. Further, in this hypothesis it could not be said that the Divine Person incarnate was one man, seeing that He would not have one human nature; neither could it be said that there were several, for several men are distinct by suppositum, whereas in this case there would be only one suppositum. Therefore the afore-said hypothesis is impossible.

Obj. 3. Further, in the mystery of the Incarnation the whole Divine Nature is united to the whole nature assumed—that is, to every part of it—for Christ is “perfect God and perfect man, whole God and whole man,” as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 7).¹ But two human natures cannot be wholly united together, because the soul of one would have to be united to the body of the other, and, again, two bodies would be together, which would give rise to confusion of natures. Together it is not possible for one Divine Person to assume two human natures.

On the contrary, Whatever the Father can do, that also can the Son do. But after the Incarnation the Father can still assume a human nature other in number from that which the Son has assumed, for in nothing is the power of the Father or the Son lessened by the Incarnation of the Son. Therefore it seems that after the Incarnation the Son can assume another human nature distinct from the one He has assumed.

I answer that, What has power for one thing, and no more, has a power limited to one. Now the power of a Divine Person is infinite, nor can it be limited by any created thing. Hence it may not be said that a Divine Person so assumed one human nature as to be unable to assume another. For it would seem to follow from this that the Personality of the Divine Nature was so contained by one human nature as to be unable to assume another to its Personality; and this is impossible, for the Uncreated cannot be contained by any creature. Hence it is plain that, whether we consider the Divine Person in regard to His Power, which is the principle of the union, or in regard to His Personality, which is the term of the union, it has to be said that the Divine Person, over and beyond the human nature which He has assumed, can assume a human nature other in number.

Reply Obj. 1. A created nature is perfected in its essentials by its form, which is multiplied according to the division of matter. And hence, if the composition of matter and form constitutes a new suppositum, the consequence is that the nature is multiplied by the multiplication of supposita. But in the mystery of the Incarnation the union of form and matter—that is, of soul and body—does not constitute a new suppositum, as was said above (A. 6). Hence there can be a numerical multitude on the part of the nature, on account of the division of matter, without distinction of supposita.

Reply Obj. 2. It might seem possible to reply that in such a hypothesis it would follow that there were two men by reason of the two natures without there being there two supposita, just as, on the contrary, the three Persons would be called one man on account of the one nature assumed, as was said above (A. 6, reply 1). But this does not seem to be true, because we must use words according to the purpose of their meaning, which arises out of a consideration of the things which are around us. Consequently, in order to judge of a word's meaning and co-meanings, we must consider the things which are around us, in which a word derived from some form is never used in the plural unless there are several supposita. For a man who has on two garments is not said to be two persons clothed, but one clothed with two garments; and whoever has two qualities is designated in the singular as such by reason of the two qualities. Now the assumed nature is, as it were, a garment, although this similitude does not fit at all points, as has been said above (Q. II, A. 6, reply 1). And hence, if the Divine Person were to assume two human natures, He would be called, on account of the unity of suppositum, one man having two human natures. Now it happens that many men are said to be one people from the fact that they have some one thing in common, and not on account of the unity of suppositum. So likewise, if two Divine Persons were to assume one singular human nature, they would be said to be one man, as stated (A. 6, reply 1), not from the unity of suppositum, but because they have some one thing in common.

Reply Obj. 3. The Divine and human natures do not bear the same relation to the one Divine Person, but the Divine Nature is related first of all to It since as It is one with It from eternity, and afterwards the human nature is related to the Divine Person, from the fact that it is assumed by the Divine Person in time, not indeed that the nature is the Person, but that the Person subsists in the nature. For the Son of God is His Godhead, but is not His manhood. And hence, in order that the human nature may be assumed by the Divine Person, the Divine Nature must be united by a personal union with the whole nature assumed—that is, in all its parts. Now in the two natures assumed there would be a uniform relation to the Divine Person, nor would one assume the other. Hence it would not be necessary for one of them to be altogether united to the other—that is, all the parts of one with all the parts of the other.

ARTICLE 8. Whether It Was More Fitting That the Person of the Son Rather Than Any Other Divine Person Should Assume Human Nature?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It would seem that it was not more fitting that the Son of God should become incarnate than the Father or the Holy Ghost.

Objection 1. For by the mystery of the Incarnation men are led to the true knowledge of God, according to John 18. 37: For this was I born, and for this came I into the world, to give testimony to the truth. But by the Person of the Son of God becoming incarnate many have been kept back from the true knowledge of God, since they referred to the very Person of the Son what was said of the Son in His human nature, as Arius, who held¹ an inequality of Persons, according to what is said (John 14. 28): The Father is greater than I. Now this error would not have arisen if the Person of the Father had become incarnate, for no one would have taken the Father to be less than the Son. Hence it seems fitting that the Person of the Father, rather than the Person of the Son, should have become incarnate.

Obj. 2. Further, the effect of the Incarnation would seem to be, as it were a kind of re-creation of human nature, according to Gal. 6. 15: For in Christ neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature. But the power of creation is appropriated to the Father. Therefore it would have been more becoming to the Father than to the Son to become incarnate.

Obj. 3. Further, the Incarnation is ordained to the remission of sins, according to Matt. 1. 21: Thou shalt call His name Jesus. For He shall save His people from their sins. Now the remission of sins is attributed to the Holy Ghost, according to John 20. 22, 23: Receive ye the Holy Ghost. Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them. Therefore it became the Person of the Holy Ghost rather than the Person of the Son to become incarnate.

On the contrary, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 1):² "In the mystery of the Incarnation the wisdom and power of God are made known: the wisdom, for He found a most suitable discharge for a most heavy debt; the power, for He made the conquered conquer." But power and wisdom are appropriated to the Son, according to I Cor. 1. 24: Christ, the power of God and the wisdom of God. Therefore it was fitting that the Person of the Son should become incarnate.

I answer that, It was most fitting that the Person of the Son should become incarnate. First, on the part of the union, for such as are similar are fittingly united. Now the Person of the Son, Who is the Word of God, has a certain common agreement with all creatures, because the word of the craftsman—that is, his concept—is an exemplary likeness of whatever is made by him. Hence the Word of God, Who is His eternal concept, is the exemplary likeness of all creatures. And therefore as creatures are established in their proper species, though subject to change, by the participation of this likeness, so by the non-participated but personal union of the Word with a creature it was fitting that the creature should be restored in its order to eternal and unchangeable perfection; for the craftsman by the intelligible form of his art, whereby he fashioned his handiwork, restores it when it has fallen into ruin. Moreover, He has a particular agreement with human nature, since the Word is the concept of the eternal Wisdom, from Whom all man's wisdom is derived. And hence man is perfected in wisdom (which is his proper perfection, as he is rational) by participating the Word of God, as the disciple is instructed by receiving the word of his master. Hence it is said (Ecclus. 1. 5): The Word of God on high is the fountain of wisdom. And hence for the consummate perfection of man it was fitting that the very Word of God should be personally united to human nature.

Secondly, the reason of this fitness may be taken from the end of the union, which is the fulfilling of predestination—that is, of such as are preordained to the heavenly inheritance, which is bestowed only on sons, according to Rom. 8. 17: If sons, heirs also. Hence it was fitting that by Him Who is the natural Son men should share this likeness of sonship by adoption, as the Apostle says in the same chapter (8. 29): For whom He foreknew, He also predestinated to be made conformable to the image of His Son.

Thirdly, the reason of this fitness may be taken from the sin of our first parent, for which the Incarnation supplied the remedy. For the first man sinned by seeking knowledge, as is plain from the words of the serpent, promising to man the knowledge of good and evil (Gen. 3. 5). Hence it was fitting that by the Word of true knowledge man might be led back to God, having wandered from God through an inordinate thirst for knowledge.

Reply Obj. 1. There is nothing which human malice cannot abuse, since it even abuses God's goodness, according to Rom. 2. 4: Or despisest thou the riches of His goodness? Hence, even if the Person of the Father had become incarnate, men would have been capable of finding an occasion of error, as though for example the Son were not able to restore human nature.

Reply Obj. 2. The first creation of things was made by the power of God the Father through the Word; hence the second creation ought to have been brought about through the Word, by the power of God the Father, in order that restoration should correspond to creation according to II Cor. 5. 19: For God indeed was in Christ reconciling the world to Himself.

Reply Obj. 3. To be the gift of the Father and the Son is proper to the Holy Ghost. But the remission of sins is caused by the Holy Ghost as by the gift of God. And hence it was more fitting to man's justification that the Son should become incarnate, Whose gift the Holy Ghost is.

QUESTION IV

OF THE MODE OF UNION ON THE PART OF THE HUMAN NATURE ASSUMED

(In Six Articles)

WE must now consider the union on the part of what was assumed. About which we must consider first what things were assumed by the Word of God; secondly, what were co-assumed, whether perfections or defects (Q. VII).

Now the Son of God assumed human nature and its parts. Hence a threefold consideration arises. First, with regard to the nature; secondly, with regard to its part (Q. V); thirdly, with regard to the order of the assumption (Q. VI).

Under the first head there are six points of inquiry: (1) Whether human nature was more capable of being assumed than any other nature? (2) Whether He assumed a person? (3) Whether He assumed a man? (4) Whether it was becoming that He should assume human nature abstracted from all individuals? (5) Whether it was becoming that He should assume human nature in all its individuals? (6) Whether it was becoming that He should assume human nature in any man begotten of the stock of Adam?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Human Nature Was More Capable of Being Assumed By the Son of God Than Any Other Nature?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that human nature is not more capable of being assumed by the Son of God than any other nature.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (Ep ad Volusianum, cxxxvii):¹ "In deeds wrought miraculously the whole reason of the deed is the power of the doer." Now the power of God Who wrought the Incarnation, which is a most miraculous work, is not limited to one nature, since the power of God is infinite. Therefore human nature is not more capable of being assumed than any other creature.

Obj. 2. Further, likeness is the reason for the fittingness of the Incarnation of the Divine Person, as above stated (Q. III, A. 8). But as in rational creatures we find the likeness of image, so in irrational creatures we find the likeness of trace. Therefore the irrational creature was as capable of assumption as human nature.

Obj. 3. Further, in the angelic nature we find a more perfect likeness of God than in human nature, as Gregory says:¹ where he introduces Ezech. 28. 12: Thou wast the seal of resemblance. And sin is found in angels, even as in man, according to Job 4. 18: And in His angels He found wickedness. Therefore the angelic nature was as capable of assumption as the nature of man.

Obj. 4. Further, since the highest perfection belongs to God, the more like to God a thing is, the more perfect it is. But the whole universe is more perfect than its parts, amongst which is human nature. Therefore the whole universe is more capable of being assumed than human nature.

On the contrary, It is said (Prov. 8 31) by the mouth of Begotten Wisdom: My delights were to be with the children of men, and hence there would seem some fitness in the union of the Son of God with human nature.

I answer that, A thing is said to be assumable as being capable of being assumed by a Divine Person, and this capability cannot be taken with reference to the natural passive power, which does not extend to what transcends the natural order, as the personal union of a creature with God transcends it. Hence it follows that a thing is said to be assumable according to some fitness for such a union. Now this fitness in human nature may be taken from two things—namely, according to its dignity, and according to its need. According to its dignity, because human nature, as being rational and intellectual, was made for attaining to the Word Itself to some extent by its operation—namely, by knowing and loving Him. According to its need, because it stood in need of restoration, having fallen under original sin. Now these two things belong to human nature alone. For in the irrational creature the fitness of dignity is wanting, and in the angelic nature the aforesaid fitness of need is wanting. Hence it follows that only human nature was assumable.

Reply Obj. 1. Creatures are said to be of such and such a character with reference to their proper causes, not with reference to what belongs to them from their first and universal causes; thus we call a disease incurable not because that it cannot be cured by God, but that it cannot be cured by the proper principles of the subject. Therefore a creature is said to be not capable of being assumed not as if we withdrew anything from the power of God, but in order to show the condition of the creature, which has no capability for this.

Reply Obj. 2. The likeness of image is found in human nature, according as it is capable of God—namely, by attaining to Him through its own operation of knowledge and love. But the likeness of trace regards only a representation by Divine impression, existing in the creature, and does not imply that the irrational creature, in which merely this likeness exists, can attain to God by its own operation alone. For what is wanting in regard to the less has no fitness for the greater; just as a body which is not fitted to be perfected by a sensitive soul is much less fitted for an intellectual soul. Now much greater and more perfect is the union with God in personal being than the union by operation. And hence the irrational creature which falls short of the union with God by operation has no fitness to be united with Him in personal being.

Reply Obj. 3. Some say² that angels are not assumable, since they are perfect in their personality from the beginning of their creation, inasmuch as they are not subject to generation and corruption; hence they cannot be assumed to the unity of a Divine Person unless their personality be destroyed, and this does not benefit the incorruptibility of their nature nor the goodness of the One assuming, to Whom it does not belong to corrupt any perfection in the creature assumed. But this would not seem totally to disprove the fitness of the angelic nature for being assumed. For God by producing a new angelic nature could join it to Himself in unity of Person, and in this way nothing pre-existing would be corrupted in it. But as was said above, there is wanting the fitness of need, because, although the angelic nature in some is the subject of sin, their sin is irremediable, as stated above (Part I. q. lxiiv, a. 2).

Reply Obj. 4. The perfection of the universe is not the perfection of one person or suppositum, but of something which is one by position or order, of which very many parts are not capable of assumption, as was said above. Hence it follows that only human nature is capable of being assumed.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the Son of God Assumed a Person?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that the Son of God assumed a person.

Objection 1. For Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 11)³ that “the Son of God assumed human nature 'in atomo', that is, in an individual." But an individual of rational nature is a person, as is plain from Boëthius (De Duab. Nat.).¹ Therefore the Son of God assumed a person.

Obj. 2. Further, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 6)² that "the Son of God assumed what He had sown in our nature." But He sowed our personality there. Therefore the Son of God assumed a person.

Obj. 3. Further, nothing is absorbed unless it exist. But Innocent III. says in a Decretal³ that the Person of God absorbed the person of man. Therefore it would seem that the person of man existed previous to its being assumed.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Fide ad Petrum, xvii)⁴ that "God assumed the nature, not the person, of man."

I answer that, A thing is said to be assumed from the fact that it is taken into another. Hence, what is assumed must be presupposed to the assumption, as what is moved from place to place is presupposed to the motion itself. Now a person in human nature is not presupposed to assumption; rather, it is the term of the assumption, as was said (Q. III, AA. 1 and 2). For if it were presupposed, it must either have been corrupted, in which case it would be assumed in vain, or it remains after the union, and thus there would be two persons, one assuming and the other assumed, which is false, as was shown above (Q. II, A. 6). Hence it follows that the Son of God in no way assumed a human person.

Reply Obj. 1. The Son of God assumed human nature in atomo, that is, in an individual, which is no other than the uncreated suppositum, the Person of the Son of God. Hence it does not follow that a person was assumed.

Reply Obj. 2. Its proper personality is not wanting to the nature assumed through the loss of anything pertaining to the perfection of the human nature but through the addition of something which is above human nature—namely, the union with a Divine Person.

Reply Obj. 3. Absorption does not here imply the destruction of anything pre-existing, but the hindering what might otherwise have been. For if the human nature had not been assumed by a Divine Person, the human nature would have had its own personality; and in this way is it said, although improperly, that the Person absorbed the person, because the Divine Person by His union hindered the human nature from having its own personality.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the Divine Person Assumed a Man?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that the Divine Person assumed a man.

Objection 1. For it is written (Ps. 64. 5): Blessed is he whom Thou hast chosen and taken to Thee, which a gloss expounds of Christ;⁵ and Augustine says (De Acone Christ. xi):⁶ "The Son of God assumed a man, and in him bore things human."

Obj. 2. Further, the word man signifies a human nature. But the Son of God assumed a human nature. Therefore He assumed a man.

Obj. 3. Further, the Son of God is a man. But He is not one of the men He did not assume, for with equal reason He would be Peter or any other man. Therefore He is the man whom He assumed.

On the contrary, Is the authority of Felix, Pope and Martyr, which is quoted by the Council of Ephesus:⁷ "We believe in Our Lord Jesus Christ, born of the Virgin Mary, because He is the Eternal Son and Word of God, and not a man assumed by God, in such sort that there is another besides Him."

I answer that, As has been said above (A. 2), what is assumed is not the term of the assumption, but is presupposed to the assumption. Now it was said (Q. III, AA. 1, 2) that the individual to Whom the human nature is assumed is none other than the Divine Person, Who is the term of the assumption. Now this word man signifies human nature according as it is made to be in a suppositum, because, as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 4, 11),⁸ "Just as this word God signifies Him who has divine nature, so also this word man signifies him who has human nature." And hence it cannot properly be said that the Son assumed a man, granted (as it must be, in fact) that in Christ there is but one suppositum and one hypostasis. But according to such as hold that there are two hypostases or two supposita in Christ,⁹ it may fittingly and properly be said that the Son of God assumed a man. Hence the first opinion quoted in III. Sent.,¹ grants that a man was assumed. But this opinion is erroneous, as was said above (Q. II, A. 6).

Reply Obj. 1. These phrases are not to be taken too literally, but are to be explained with reverence wherever they are used by holy doctors; so that we might say that a man was assumed because his nature was assumed, and because the assumption terminated in this, that the Son of God is man.

Reply Obj. 2. The word man signifies human nature in the concrete, according as it is in a suppositum; and hence, since we cannot say a suppositum was assumed, so we cannot say a man was assumed.

Reply Obj. 3. The Son of God is not the man whom He assumed, but the man whose nature He assumed.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the Son of God Ought To Have Assumed Human Nature Abstracted from All Individuals?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that the Son of God ought to have assumed human nature abstracted from all individuals.

Objection 1. For the assumption of human nature took place for the common salvation of all men; hence it is said of Christ (I Tim. 4. 10) that He is the Saviour of all men, especially of the faithful. But nature as it is in individuals withdraws from its universality. Therefore the Son of God ought to have assumed human nature as it is abstracted from all individuals.

Obj. 2. Further, what is noblest in all things ought to be attributed to God. But in every genus what is of itself is best. Therefore the Son of God ought to have assumed self-existing (per se) man, which, according to Platonists,² is human nature abstracted from its individuals. Therefore the Son of God ought to have assumed this.

Obj. 3. Further, human nature was not assumed by the Son of God in the concrete as is signified by the word man, as was said above (A. 3). Now in this way it signifies human nature as it is in individuals, as is plain from what has been said (ibid.). Therefore the Son of God assumed human nature as it is separated from individuals.

On the contrary, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 11):³ "God the Word incarnate did not assume a nature which exists in pure thought, for this would have been no Incarnation, but a false and fictitious Incarnation." But human nature as it is separated or abstracted from individuals "is taken to be a pure conception, since it does not exist in itself," as Damascene says (ibid.). Therefore the Son of God did not assume human nature as it is separated from individuals.

I answer that, The nature of man or of any other sensible thing, beyond the being which it has in individuals, may be taken in two ways: first, as if it had being of itself, apart from matter, as the Platonists held;⁴ secondly, as existing in an intellect either human or Divine.

Now it cannot subsist of itself, as the Philosopher proves,⁵ because sensible matter belongs to the specific nature of sensible things, and is placed in its definition, as flesh and bones in the definition of man. Hence human nature cannot be apart from sensible matter.

Nevertheless, if human nature were subsistent in this way, it would not be fitting that it should be assumed by the Word of God. First, because this assumption is terminated in a Person, and it is contrary to the nature of a common form to be thus individualized in a person. Secondly, because to a common nature can only be attributed common and universal operations, according to which man neither merits nor demerits, whereas, on the contrary, the assumption took place in order that the Son of God, having assumed our nature, might merit for us. Thirdly, because a nature so existing would not be sensible, but intelligible. But the Son of God assumed human nature in order to show Himself in men's sight, according to Baruch 3. 38: Afterwards He was seen upon earth, and conversed with men.

Likewise, neither could human nature have been assumed by the Son of God, as it is in the Divine intellect, since thus it would be none other than the Divine Nature, and, in this way, human nature would be in the Son of God from eternity.

Neither can we say that the Son of God assumed human nature as it is in a human intellect, for this would mean nothing else but that He is understood to assume a human nature. And thus if He did not assume it in reality, this would be a false understanding, nor would this assumption of the human nature be anything but "a fictitious Incarnation," as Damascene says (loc. cit.).

Reply Obj. 1. The incarnate Son of God is the common Saviour of all, not by a community of genus or species, such as is attributed to the nature separated from the individuals, but by a community of cause, whereby the incarnate Son of God is the universal cause of human salvation.

Reply Obj. 2. Self-existing (per se) man is not to be found in nature in such a way as to be outside the singular, as the Platonists held,¹ although some say Plato believed that the separate man was only in the Divine intellect.² And hence it was not necessary for it to be assumed by the Word, since it had been with Him from eternity.

Reply Obj. 3. Although human nature was not assumed in the concrete, as if the suppositum were presupposed to the assumption, nevertheless it is assumed in an individual, since it is assumed so as to be in an individual.

ARTICLE 5. Whether the Son of God Ought To Have Assumed Human Nature in All Individuals?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that the Son of God ought to have assumed human nature in all individuals.

Objection 1. For what is assumed first and by itself is human nature. But what belongs per se to a nature belongs to all who exist in the nature. Therefore it was fitting that human nature should be assumed by the Word of God in all its supposita.

Obj. 2. Further, the Divine Incarnation proceeded from Divine Love; hence it is written (John 3. 16): God so loved the world as to give His only-begotten Son. But love makes us give ourselves to our friends as much as we can. But it was possible for the Son of God to assume several human natures, as was said above (q. III, A. 7), and by the same reason all. Hence it was fitting for the Son of God to assume human nature in all its supposita.

Obj. 3. Further, a skilful workman completes his work in the shortest manner possible. But it would have been a shorter way if all men had been assumed to the natural sonship than for one natural Son to lead many to the adoption of sons, as is written Gal. 4. 5 (cf. Heb. 2. 10). Therefore human nature ought to have been assumed by God in all its supposita.

On the contrary, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 11)³ that "the Son of God did not assume human nature as a species, nor did He assume all its hypostases."

I answer that, It was unfitting for human nature to be assumed by the Word in all its supposita. First, because the multitude of supposita of human nature, which are natural to it, would have been taken away. For since we must not consider any other suppositum in the assumed nature except the Person assuming, as was said above (A. 3; q. 2, A. 6), if there was no human nature except what was assumed, it would follow that there was but one suppositum of human nature, which is the Person assuming. Secondly, because this would have taken away from the dignity of the incarnate Son of God, as He is the First-born of many brethren, according to the human nature, even as He is the First-born of all creatures according to the Divine, for then all men would be of equal dignity. Thirdly, because it is fitting that as one Divine suppositum is incarnate so He should assume one human nature only, so that on both sides unity might be found.

Reply Obj. 1. To be assumed belongs to the human nature of itself because it does not belong to it by reason of a person, as it belongs to the Divine Nature to assume by reason of the Person; not, however, that it belongs to it of itself as if belonging to its essential principles, or as its natural property, in which manner it would belong to all its supposita.

Reply Obj. 2. The love of God to men is shown not merely in the assumption of human nature, but especially in what He suffered in human nature for other men, according to Rom. 5. 8: But God commendeth His charity towards us; because when as yet we were sinners . . . Christ died for us, which would not have taken place had He assumed human nature in all its supposita.

Reply Obj. 3. In order to shorten the way, which the skilful workman does, what can be done by one must not be done by many. Hence it was most fitting that by one man all the rest should be saved.

ARTICLE 6. Whether It Was Fitting for the Son of God To Assume Human Nature of the Stock of Adam?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that it was not fitting for the Son of God to assume human nature of the stock of Adam.

² Cf. Augustine, QQ. LXXXIII, qu. 46 (PL 40, 30).

³ PG 94, 1024.

Objection 1. For the Apostle says (Heb. 7. 26): For it was fitting that we should have such a high priest, . . . separated from sinners. But He would have been still further separated from sinners had He not assumed human nature of the stock of Adam, a sinner. Hence it seems that He ought not to have assumed human nature of the stock of Adam.

Obj. 2. Further, in every genus the principle is nobler than what is from the principle. Hence, if He wished to assume human nature, He ought rather to have assumed it in Adam himself.

Obj. 3. Further, the Gentiles were greater sinners than the Jews, as a gloss¹ says on Gal. 2. 15: For we by nature are Jews, and not of the Gentiles, sinners. Hence, if He wished to assume human nature from sinners, He ought rather to have assumed it from the Gentiles than from the stock of Abraham, who was just.

On the contrary (Luke 3.), the genealogy of our Lord is traced back to Adam.

I answer that, As Augustine says (De Trin. xiii, 18):² "God was able to assume human nature elsewhere than from the stock of Adam, who by his sin had fettered the whole human race; yet God judged it better to assume human nature from the vanquished race, and thus to vanquish the enemy of the human race." And this for three reasons: First, because it would seem to belong to justice that he who sinned should make amends; and hence that from the nature which had been corrupted should be assumed that whereby satisfaction was to be made for the whole nature. Secondly, it pertains to man's greater dignity that the conqueror of the devil should spring from the stock conquered by the devil. Thirdly, because God's power is thereby made more manifest, since, from a corrupt and weakened nature He assumed that which was raised to such might and glory.

Reply Obj. 1. Christ ought to be separated from sinners as regards sin, which He came to overthrow, and not as regards nature which He came to save, and in which it behoved Him in all things to be made like to His brethren, as the Apostle says (Heb. 2. 17). And in this is His innocence the more wonderful, seeing that though assumed from a mass subject to sin, His nature was endowed with such purity.

Reply Obj. 2. As was said above (reply 1)

it behoved Him Who came to take away sins to be separated from sinners as regards sin, to which Adam was subject, whom Christ brought out of his sin, as is written Wisd. 10. 2. For it behoved Him Who came to cleanse all, not to need cleansing Himself; just as in every genus of motion the first mover is immovable as regards that motion, just as the first to alter is itself unalterable. Hence it was not fitting that He should assume human nature in Adam himself.

Reply Obj. 3. Since Christ ought especially to be separated from sinners as regards sin, and to possess the highest innocence, it was fitting that between the first sinner and Christ some just men should stand midway, in whom certain signs of (His) future holiness should shine forth. And hence, even in the people from whom Christ was to be born, God appointed signs of holiness, which began in Abraham, who was the first to receive the promise of Christ, and circumcision, as a sign that the covenant should be kept, as is written Gen. 17. 11.

QUESTION V

OF THE MANNER OF UNION WITH REGARD TO THE PARTS OF HUMAN NATURE

(In Four Articles)

WE must now consider the assumption of the parts of human nature; and under this head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether the Son of God ought to have assumed a true body? (2) Whether He ought to have assumed an earthly body—that is, one of flesh and blood? (3) Whether He ought to have assumed a soul? (4) Whether He ought to have assumed an intellect?

ARTICLE 1. Whether the Son of God Ought To Have Assumed a True Body?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that the Son of God did not assume a true body.

Objection 1. For it is written (Phil. 2. 7), that He was made in the likeness of men. But what is something in truth is not said to be in the likeness thereof. Therefore the Son of God did not assume a true body.

Obj. 2. Further, the assumption of a body in no way diminishes the dignity of the God-head; for Pope Leo says (Serm. de Nativ.)³ that "the glorification did not absorb the lesser nature, nor did the assumption lessen the higher." But it pertains to the dignity of God to be altogether separated from bodies. Therefore it seems that by the assumption God was not united to a body.

Obj. 3. Further, signs ought to correspond to the things signified. But the apparitions of the Old Testament which were signs of the manifestation of Christ were not in a real body, but by visions in the imagination, as is plain from Isa. 60. 1: I saw the Lord sitting, etc. Hence it would seem that the apparition of the Son of God in the world was not in a real body, but only in imagination.

On the contrary, Augustine says (qq. lxxxiii, qu. 14):¹ "If the body of Christ was a phantom, Christ deceived us, and if He deceived us, He is not the Truth. But Christ is the Truth. Therefore His body was not a phantom." Hence it is plain that He assumed a true body.

I answer that, As is said (De Eccles. Dogm. ii):² "The Son of God was not born in appearance only, as if He had an imaginary body, but His body was real." The proof of this is threefold. First, from the essence of human nature, to which it pertains to have a true body. Therefore granted, as already proved (q. iv, a. 1), that it was fitting for the Son of God to assume human nature, He must consequently have assumed a real body.

The second reason is taken from what was done in the mystery of the Incarnation. For if His body was not real but imaginary, He neither underwent a real death, nor of those things which the Evangelists recount of Him did He do any in very truth, but only in appearance; and hence it would also follow that the real salvation of man has not taken place; since the effect must be proportionate to the cause.

The third reason is taken from the dignity of the Person assuming, Whom it did not become to have anything fictitious in His work, since He is the Truth. Hence Our Lord Himself deigned to refute this error (Luke 24. 37, 39), when the disciples, troubled and frightened, supposed that they saw a spirit, and not a true body; therefore He offered Himself to their touch, saying: Handle, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as you see Me to have.

Reply Obj. 1. This likeness indicates the truth of the human nature in Christ,—just as all that truly exist in human nature are said to be like in species,—and not a mere imaginary likeness. In proof of this the Apostle adds (Phil. 2. 8) that He became obedient unto death, even to the death of the cross; which would have been impossible, had it been only an imaginary likeness.

Reply Obj. 2. By assuming a true body the dignity of the Son of God is nowise lessened. Hence Augustine says (De Fid. ad Pet. ii):³ "He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, that He might become a servant; yet did He not lose the fulness of the form of God." For the Son of God assumed a true body not so as to become the form of a body, which is contrary to the Divine simplicity and purity—for this would be to assume a body to the unity of the nature, which is impossible, as is plain from what has been stated above (q. ii, a. 1), but, the natures remaining distinct, He assumed a body to the unity of Person.

Reply Obj. 3. The figure ought to correspond to the reality as regards the likeness and not as regards the truth of the thing. "For if they were alike in all points, it would no longer be a likeness but the reality itself," as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 26).⁴ Hence it was more fitting that the apparitions of the Old Testament should be in appearance only, being figures; and that the apparition of the Son of God in the world should be in a true body, as the thing prefigured by these figures. Hence the Apostle says (Col. 2. 17): Which are a shadow of things to come, but the body is Christ's.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the Son of God Ought To Have Assumed an Earthly Body—Namely, One of Flesh and Blood?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that Christ had not a carnal or earthly, but a heavenly body.

Objection 1. For the Apostle says (I Cor. 15. 47): The first man was of the earth, earthy; the second man from heaven, heavenly. But the first man—that is, Adam—was of the earth as regards his body, as is plain from Gen. 1. Therefore the second man—that is, Christ—was of heaven as regards the body.

Obj. 2. Further, it is said (I Cor. 15. 50): Flesh and blood shall not (Vulg., cannot) possess the kingdom of God. But the kingdom of God is in Christ chiefly. Therefore there is no flesh or blood in Him, but rather a heavenly body.

Obj. 3. Further, whatever is best is to be attributed to God. But of all bodies a heavenly body is the best. Therefore it behoved Christ to assume such a body.

² Gennadius (PL 58, 981).

³ Fulgentius (PL 65, 682).

⁴ PG 94, 1096.

On the contrary, Our Lord says (Luke 24. 39): A spirit hath not flesh and bones, as you see Me to have. Now flesh and bones are not of the matter of heavenly bodies, but are composed of the inferior elements. Therefore the body of Christ was not a heavenly, but a carnal and earthly body.

I answer that, By the same reasons which proved that the body of Christ was not an imaginary one, it may also be shown that it was not a heavenly body.¹ First, because even as the truth of the human nature of Christ would not have been maintained had His body been an imaginary one such as Manes supposed,² so likewise it would not have been maintained if we supposed, as did Valentine,³ that it was a heavenly body. For since the form of man is a natural thing, it requires determinate matter, namely, flesh and bones, which must be placed in the definition of man, as is plain from the Philosopher.⁴

Secondly, because this would lessen the truth of such things as Christ did in the body. For since a heavenly body is impassible and incorruptible, as is proved in the book on the Heavens,⁵ if the Son of God had assumed a heavenly body. He would not have truly hungered or thirsted, nor would he have undergone His passion and death.

Thirdly, this would have detracted from God's truthfulness. For since the Son of God showed Himself to men as if He had a carnal and earthly body, the manifestation would have been false had He had a heavenly body. Hence (De Eccles. Dogm. ii)⁶ it is said: "The Son of God was born, taking flesh of the Virgin's body, and not bringing it with Him from heaven."

Reply Obj. 1. Christ is said in two ways to have come down from heaven. First, by reason of His Divine Nature; not indeed that the Divine Nature ceased to be in heaven, but because He began to be here below in a new way, namely, by His assumed nature, according to John 3. 13: No man hath ascended into heaven, but He that descended from heaven, the Son of Man, Who is in heaven.

Secondly, by reason of His body, not indeed that the very substance of the body of Christ descended from heaven, but that His body was formed by a heavenly power, that is, by the Holy Ghost. Hence Augustine, explaining the passage quoted, says (Ad Orosium):⁷ "I call Christ a heavenly man because He was not conceived of human seed." And Hilary expounds it in the same way (De Trin. x).⁸

Reply Obj. 2. Flesh and blood are not taken here for the substance of flesh and blood but for the corruption of flesh, which was not in Christ as far as it was sinful, but as far as it was a punishment; thus, for a time it was in Christ that He might carry through the work of our redemption.

Reply Obj. 3. It pertains to the greatest glory of God to have raised a weak and earthly body to such sublimity. Hence in the General Council of Ephesus (P. II, Act. 1)⁹ we read the saying of St. Theophilus: "Just as the best workmen are esteemed not merely for displaying their skill in precious materials, but very often because by making use of the poorest clay and commonest earth, they show the power of their craft, so the best of all workmen, the Word of God, did not come down to us by taking a heavenly body of some most precious matter, but shewed the greatness of His skill in clay."

ARTICLE 3. Whether the Son of God Assumed a Soul?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that the Son of God did not assume a soul.

Objection 1. For John has said, teaching the mystery of the Incarnation (John i. 14): The Word was made flesh—with no mention being made of a soul. Now it is not said that the Word was made flesh as if changed to flesh, but because He assumed flesh. Therefore He seems not to have assumed a soul.

Obj. 2. Further, a soul is necessary to the body, in order to quicken it. But this was not necessary for the body of Christ, as it would seem, for of the Word of God it is written (Ps. 35. 10): Lord, with Thee is the fountain of life. Therefore it would seem altogether superfluous for the soul to be there when the Word was present. But "God and nature do nothing in vain," as the Philosopher says.¹⁰ Therefore the Word would seem not to have assumed a soul.

⁴ Metaphysics, vii, 11 (1036^b3).

⁵ Aristotle, I, 3 (270^a12). ⁶ Gennadius (PL 58, 981).

Obj. 3. Further, by the union of soul and body is constituted the common nature, which is the human species. But "in the Lord Jesus Christ we are not to look for a common species," as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 3).¹ Therefore He did not assume a soul.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Agone Christ. xxi).² "Let us not hearken to such as say that only a human body was assumed by the Word of God, and take 'the Word was made flesh' to mean that the man had no soul nor any other part of a man, save flesh."

I answer that, As Augustine says (De Haeres. 49, 55).³ it was first of all the opinion of Arius⁴ and then of Apollinaris⁵ that the Son of God assumed only flesh, without a soul, holding that the Word took the place of a soul to the body. And consequently it followed that there were not two natures in Christ, but only one; for from a soul and body one human nature is constituted.

But this opinion cannot hold, for three reasons. First, because it is counter to the authority of Scripture, in which Our Lord makes mention of His soul, Matt. 26, 38: My soul is sorrowful even unto death; and John 10, 18: I have power to lay down My soul (animam meam: Douay, My life). But to this Apollinaris⁶ replied that in these words soul is taken metaphorically, in which way mention is made in the Old Testament of the soul of God (Isa. 1, 14): My soul hateth your new moons and your solemnities. But, as Augustine says (Qq. lxxxiii, qu. 80).⁷ the Evangelists relate how Jesus wondered, was angered, sad, and hungry. Now these show that He had a true soul, just as that He ate, slept and was weary shows that He had a true human body; otherwise, if these things are a metaphor, because the like are said of God in the Old Testament, the trustworthiness of the Gospel story is undermined. For it is one thing that things were foretold in a figure and another that historical events were related in very truth by the Evangelists.

Secondly, this error lessens the utility of the Incarnation, which is man's liberation. For Augustine argues thus (Contra Felician. xiii):⁸ "If the Son of God in taking flesh passed over the soul, either He knew its sinlessness, and trusted it did not need a remedy, or He considered it unsuitable to Him, and did not bestow on it the boon of redemption; or He reckoned it altogether incurable, and was unable to heal it; or He cast it off as worthless and seemingly unfit for any use. Now two of these reasons imply a blasphemy against God. For how shall we call Him omnipotent, if He is unable to heal what is beyond hope? or God of all, if He has not made our soul. And as regards the other two reasons, in one the cause of the soul is ignored, and in the other no place is given to merit. Is He to be considered to understand the cause of the soul Who seeks to separate it from the sin of wilful transgression, enabled as it is to receive the law by the endowment of the habit of reason? Or how can His generosity be known to anyone who says it was despised on account of its ignoble sinfulness? If you look at its origin, the substance of the soul is more precious than the body, but if at the sin of transgression, on account of its understanding it is worse than the body. Now I know and declare that Christ is perfect wisdom, nor have I any doubt that He is most loving; and because of the first of these He did not despise what was better and more capable of prudence; and because of the second He sustained what was most wounded."

Thirdly, this position is against the truth itself of the Incarnation. For flesh and the other parts of man receive their species through the soul. Hence, if the soul is absent, there are no bones nor flesh, except equivocally, as is plain from the Philosopher.⁹

Reply Obj. 1. When we say, The Word was made flesh, "flesh" is taken for the whole man, as if we were to say, The Word was made man, as Isa. 40, 5: All flesh together shall see that the mouth of the Lord hath spoken. And the whole man is signified by flesh, because, as is said in the authority quoted (John 1, 14), the Son of God became visible by flesh; hence it is added: And we saw His glory. Or because, as Augustine says (Qq. lxxxiii, qu. 80).¹⁰ "in all that union the Word is the highest, and flesh the last and lowest. Hence, wishing to commend the love of God's humility to us, the Evangelist mentioned the Word and flesh, leaving the soul on one side, since it is less than the Word and nobler than flesh." Again, it was reasonable to mention flesh, which, as being farther away from the Word, was less assumable, as it would seem.

Reply Obj. 2. The Word is the fountain of life as the first effecting cause of life, but the soul is the principle of the life of the body as its form. Now the form is the effect of the agent. Hence from the presence of the Word it might rather have been concluded that the body was animated, just as from the presence of fire it may be concluded that the body, in which fire adheres, is warm.

Reply Obj. 3. It is not unfitting, indeed it is necessary, to say that in Christ there was a nature which was constituted by the soul coming to the body. But Damascene denied (ibid.) that in Jesus Christ there was a common species—that is, a third something resulting from the Godhead and the humanity.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the Son of God Should Have Assumed an Intellect?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that the Son of God did not assume a human mind or intellect.

Objection 1. For where a thing is present, its image is not required. But man is made to God's image, as regards his mind, as Augustine says (De Trin. xii, 7).¹ Hence, since in Christ there was the presence of the Divine Word itself, there was no need of a human mind.

Obj. 2. Further, the greater light dims the lesser. But the Word of God, Who is the light, which enlighteneth every man that cometh into this world, as is written John 1, 9, is compared to the mind as the greater light to the lesser, since our mind is a kind of light, being as it were a lamp enkindled by the First Light (Prov. 20, 27): The spirit of a man is the lamp of the Lord. Therefore in Christ Who is the Word of God there is no need of a human mind.

Obj. 3. Further, the assumption of human nature by the Word of God is called His Incarnation. But the intellect or human mind is neither flesh nor the act of flesh, for it is not the act of a body, as is proved in the book on the Soul.² Hence it would seem that the Son of God did not assume a human mind.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Fid. ad Pet. xiv):³ "Firmly hold and nowise doubt that Christ the Son of God has true flesh and a rational soul of the same kind as ours, since of His flesh He says (Luke 24, 39): 'Handle, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as you see Me to have.' And He proves that He has a soul, saying (John 10, 17): 'I lay down my soul (Douay, life) that I may take it again.' And He proves that He has an intellect, saying (Matth. 11, 29): 'Learn of Me, because I am meek and humble of heart.' And God says of Him by the prophet (Isa. 52, 13): 'Behold my servant shall understand.'"

I answer that, As Augustine says (De Haeres. 55),⁴ "the Apollinarists⁵ thought differently from the Catholic Church concerning the soul of Christ, saying with the Arians⁶ that Christ God took flesh alone, without a soul; and on being overcome on this point by the Gospel witness, they went on to say that the mind was wanting to Christ's soul, but that the Word Itself supplied its place."

But this position is refuted by the same arguments as the preceding. First, because it runs counter to the Gospel story, which relates how He marvelled (as is plain from Matt. 8, 10). Now marvelling cannot be without reason, since it implies the comparing of effect and cause, according as, that is, when we see an effect and are ignorant of its cause, we seek to know it, as is said in the Metaphysics.⁷

Secondly, it is inconsistent with the purpose of the Incarnation, which is the justification of man from sin. For the human soul is not capable of sin nor of justifying grace except through the mind. Hence it was especially necessary for the mind to be assumed. And so Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 6)⁸ that "the Word of God assumed a body and an intellectual and rational soul," and adds afterwards: "The whole was united to the whole, that He might bestow salvation on me wholly; for what was not assumed is not curable."

Thirdly, it is against the truth of the Incarnation. For since the body is proportioned to the soul as matter to its proper form, it is not truly human flesh if it is not perfected by a human, that is, a rational, soul. And hence if Christ had had a soul without a mind, He would not have had true human flesh, but irrational flesh, since our soul differs from an animal soul by the mind alone. Hence Augustine says (QQ. lxxxiii, qu. 80)⁹ that from this error it would have followed that the Son of God "took an animal with the form of a human body," which, again, is against the Divine truth, which cannot suffer any fictitious untruth.

Reply Obj. 1. Where a thing is by its presence, its image is not required to supply the place of the thing, as where the emperor is the soldiers do not pay homage to his image. Yet the image of a thing is required together with its presence that it may be perfected by the presence of the thing, just as the image in the wax is perfected by the impression of the seal, and as the image of a man is reflected in the mirror by his presence. Hence in order to perfect the human mind it was necessary that the Word should unite it to Himself.

Reply Obj. 2. The greater light dims the lesser light of another luminous body, but it does not dim, rather it perfects the light of the body illuminated; at the presence of the sun the light of the stars is put out, but the light of the air is perfected. Now the intellect or mind of man is, as it were, a light lit up by the light of the Divine Word; and hence by the presence of the Word the mind of man is perfected rather than overshadowed.

Reply Obj. 3. Although the intellectual power is not the act of a body, nevertheless the essence of the human soul, which is the form of the body, requires that it should be more noble in order that it may have the power of understanding; and hence it is necessary that a better disposed body should correspond to it.

QUESTION VI

OF THE ORDER OF ASSUMPTION *

(In Six Articles)

WE must now consider the order of the foregoing assumption, and under this head there are six points of inquiry: (1) Whether the Son of God assumed flesh through the medium of the soul? (2) Whether He assumed the soul through the medium of the spirit or mind? (3) Whether the soul was assumed previous to the flesh? (4) Whether the flesh of Christ was assumed by the Word previous to being united to the soul? (5) Whether the whole human nature was assumed through the medium of the parts? (6) Whether it was assumed through the medium of grace?

ARTICLE 1. Whether the Son of God Assumed Flesh Through the Medium of the Soul?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that the Son of God did not assume flesh through the medium of the soul.

Objection 1. For the mode in which the Son of God is united to human nature and its parts is more perfect than the mode whereby He is in all creatures. But He is in all creatures immediately by essence, power and presence. Much more, therefore, is the Son of God united to flesh without the medium of the soul.

Obj. 2. Further, the soul and flesh are united to the Word of God in unity of hypostasis or person. But the body pertains immediately to the person, or hypostasis of man, even as the soul. Indeed, the human body, since it is matter, would rather seem to be nearer the hypostasis than the soul, which is a form, since the principle of individuation, which is implied in the word hypostasis, would seem to be matter. Hence the Son of God did not assume flesh through the medium of the soul.

Obj. 3. Further, take away the medium and you separate what were joined by the medium; for example, if the surface be removed colour would leave the body, since it is in the body through the medium of the surface. But though the soul was separated from the body by death, yet there still remained the union of the Word to the flesh, as will be shown (Q. L, AA. 2 and 3). Hence the Word was not joined to flesh through the medium of the soul.

On the contrary, Augustine says (Ep. ad Volusianum, cxxxvii):¹ "The greatness of the Divine power fitted to itself a rational soul, and through it a human body, so as to raise the whole man to something higher."

I answer that, A medium is spoken of in reference to a beginning and an end. Hence just as beginning and end imply order, so also does a medium. Now there is a twofold order: one, of time, the other, of nature. But in the mystery of the Incarnation nothing is said to be a medium in the order of time, for the Word of God united the whole human nature to Himself at the same time, as will appear (AA. 3, 4). An order of nature between things may be taken in two ways: first, as regards rank of dignity, as we say the angels are midway between man and God; secondly, as regards the notion of causality, as we say a cause is midway between the first cause and the last effect. And this second order follows the first to some extent, for as Dionysius says (Cæl. Hier. xiii),² God acts upon the more remote substances through those less remote from Him. Hence if we consider the rank of dignity, the soul is found to be midway between God and flesh; and in this way it may be said that the Son of

God united flesh to Himself through the medium of the soul. But even as regards the order of causality the soul is to some extent the cause of flesh being united to the Son of God. For the flesh would not have been capable of assumption except by its relation to the rational soul, through which it becomes human flesh. For it was said above (Q. IV, A. 1) that human nature was capable of being assumed before all others.

Reply Obj. 1. We may consider a twofold order between creatures and God. The first is by reason of creatures being caused by God and depending on Him as on the principle of their being; and thus on account of the infinity of His power God touches each thing immediately, by causing and preserving it, and so it is that God is immediately in all things by essence, presence and power.

But the second order is by reason of things being led back to God as to their end. And it is here that there is a medium between the creature and God, since "lower creatures are led back to God by higher," as Dionysius says,¹ and to this order pertains the assumption of human nature by the Word of God, Who is the term of the assumption. And hence it is united to flesh through the soul.

Reply Obj. 2. If the hypostasis of the Word of God were constituted absolutely by human nature, it would follow that the body was nearer to it, since it is matter which is the principle of individuation; even as the soul, which is the specifying form, would be nearer the human nature. But because the hypostasis of the Word is prior to and more exalted than the human nature, the more exalted any part of the human nature is, the nearer it is to the hypostasis of the Word. And hence the soul is nearer the Word of God than the body is.

Reply Obj. 3. Nothing prevents one thing being the cause of the aptitude and congruity of another, even though if it be taken away the other remains, because although a thing's becoming may depend on another, yet when it is in being it no longer depends on it; just as a friendship brought about by some other may endure when the latter has gone; or as a woman is taken in marriage on account of her beauty, which makes a woman's fittingness for the marriage tie, yet when her beauty passes away, the marriage tie still remains. So likewise, when the soul was separated, the union of the Word with flesh still endured.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the Son of God Assumed a Soul Through the Medium of the Spirit or Mind?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that the Son of God did not assume a soul through the medium of the spirit.

Objection 1. For nothing is a medium between itself and another. But the spirit or mind is nothing else in essence but the soul itself, as was said above (Part I, Q. LXXVII, A. 1, Reply 1). Therefore the Son of God did not assume a soul through the medium of the spirit or mind.

Obj. 2. Further, what is the medium of the assumption is itself more assumable. But the spirit or mind is not more assumable than the soul, which is plain from the fact that angelic spirits are not assumable, as was said above (Q. IV, A. 1). Hence it seems that the Son of God did not assume a soul through the medium of the spirit.

Obj. 3. Further, that which comes later is assumed by the first through the medium of what comes before. But soul designates the very essence, which naturally comes before its power, which is the mind. Therefore it would seem that the Son of God did not assume a soul through the medium of the spirit or mind.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Agone Christ. xviii):² "The invisible and unchangeable Truth took a soul by means of the spirit, and a body by means of the soul."

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1), the Son of God is said to have assumed flesh through the medium of the soul, both on account of the order of dignity, and the fittingness of the assumption. Now both these may be applied to the intellect, which is called the spirit, if we compare it with the other parts of the soul. For the soul is assumed fittingly only through the fact that it has a capacity for God, being in His likeness, which is in respect of the mind, which is called the spirit, according to Eph. 4. 23: Be renewed in the spirit of your mind. So, too, the intellect is the highest and noblest of the parts of the soul, and the most like to God, and hence Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 6)³ that "the Word of God is united to flesh through the medium of the intellect; for the intellect is the purest part of the soul, God Himself being an intellect."

Reply Obj. 1. Although the intellect is not distinct from the soul in essence, it is distinct from the other parts of the soul according to its aspect as a power; and it is in this way that it has the nature of a medium.

³ PG 94, 1005.

Reply Obj. 2. Fitness for assumption is wanting to the angelic spirits not from any lack of dignity, but because of the irreparable character of their fall, which cannot be said of the human spirit, as is clear from what has been said above (Part I, q. LXII, A. 8; q. LXIV, A. 2).

Reply Obj. 3. The soul, between which and the Word of God the intellect is said to be a medium, does not stand for the essence of the soul, which is common to all the powers, but for the lower powers, which are common to every soul.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the Soul Was Assumed Before the Flesh By the Son of God?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that the soul of Christ was assumed before the flesh by the Word.

Objection 1. For the Son of God assumed flesh through the medium of the soul, as was said above (A. 1). Now the medium is reached before the end. Therefore the Son of God assumed the soul before the body.

Obj. 2. Further, the soul of Christ is nobler than the angels, according to Ps. 96, 8: Adore Him, all you His angels. But the angels were created in the beginning, as was said above (Part I, q. XLVI, A. 3). Therefore the soul of Christ also (was created in the beginning). But it was not created before it was assumed, for Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii).¹ that "neither the soul nor the body of Christ ever had any hypostasis, save the hypostasis of the Word." Therefore it would seem that the soul was assumed before the flesh, which was conceived in the womb of the Virgin.

Obj. 3. Further, it is written (John 1, 14): We saw Him (Vulg., His glory) full of grace and truth, and it is added afterwards that of His fulness we have all received (verse 16)—that is, all the faithful of all time, as Chrysostom expounds it (Hom. xiv in Joann.).² Now this could not have been unless the soul of Christ had all fulness of grace and truth before all the saints, who were from the beginning of the world, for the cause is not subsequent to the effect. Hence since the fulness of grace and truth was in the soul of Christ from union with the Word, according to what is written in the same place: We saw His glory, the glory as it were of the Only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth, it would seem in consequence that from the beginning of the world the soul of Christ was assumed by the Word of God.

On the contrary, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iv, 6):³ "The intellect was not, as some untruthfully say, united to the true God, and henceforth called Christ, before the Incarnation which was of the Virgin."

I answer that, Origen (Peri Archon, i, 7, 8; ii 8)⁴ maintained that all souls, amongst which he placed Christ's soul, were created in the beginning. But this is not fitting, if we suppose that it was first of all created but not at once joined to the Word, since it would follow that this soul once had its own subsistence without the Word; and thus, since it was assumed by the Word, either the union did not take place in the subsistence, or the pre-existing subsistence of the soul was corrupted.

So likewise it is not fitting to suppose that this soul was united to the Word from the beginning and that it afterwards became incarnate in the womb of the Virgin, for thus His soul would not seem to be of the same nature as ours, which are created at the same time that they are infused into bodies. Hence Pope Leo says (Ep. ad Julian. xxv)⁵ that "Christ's flesh was not of a different nature to ours, nor was a different soul breathed into it in the beginning than into other men."

Reply Obj. 1. As was said above (A. 1), the soul of Christ is said to be the medium in the union of the flesh with the Word, in the order of nature; but it does not follow from this that it was the medium in the order of time.

Reply Obj. 2. As Pope Leo says in the same Epistle,⁶ Christ's soul "excels our soul not by diversity of genus, but by sublimity of power"; for it is of the same genus as our souls, yet excels even the angels in fulness of grace and truth. But the mode of creation of the soul is in harmony with its properties; and since it is the form of the body, it is consequently created at the same time that it is united with the body. This does not happen to angels, since they are substances entirely apart from bodies.

Reply Obj. 3. Of the fulness of Christ all men receive according to the faith they have in Him; for it is written (Rom. 3, 22) that the justice of God is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe in Him. Now just as we believe in Him as already born, so the ancients believed in Him as about to be born, since having the same spirit of faith . . .

we also believe, as it is written (II Cor. 4. 13). But the faith which is in Christ has the power of justifying by reason of the purpose of the grace of God, according to Rom. 4. 5: But to him that worketh not, yet believeth in Him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is reputed to justice according to the purpose of the grace of God. Hence because this purpose is eternal, there is nothing to hinder some from being justified by the faith of Jesus Christ even before His soul was full of grace and truth.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the Flesh of Christ Was Assumed By the Word Before Being United to the Soul?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that the flesh of Christ was assumed by the Word before being united to the soul.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (De Fid. ad Pet. xviii):¹ "Most firmly hold, and nowise doubt that the flesh of Christ was not conceived in the womb of the Virgin without the God-head, before it was assumed by the Word." But the flesh of Christ would seem to have been conceived before being united to the rational soul, because matter or disposition is prior to the completing form in order of generation. Therefore the flesh of Christ was assumed before being united to the soul.

Obj. 2. Further, as the soul is a part of human nature, so is the body. But the human soul in Christ had no other principle of being than in other men, as is clear from the authority of Pope Leo, quoted above (A. 3). Therefore it would seem that the body of Christ had no other principle of being than we have. But in us the body is begotten before the rational soul comes to it. Therefore it was the same in Christ. And thus the flesh was assumed by the Word before being united to the soul.

Obj. 3. Further, as is said (De Causis),² "the first cause excels the second in bringing about the effect, and precedes it in its union with the effect." But the soul of Christ is compared to the Word as a second cause to a first. Hence the Word was united to the flesh before it was to the soul.

On the contrary, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 2):³ "At the same time the Word of God was made flesh and flesh was united to a rational and intellectual soul." Therefore the union of the Word with the flesh did not precede the union with the soul.

I answer that, The human flesh is capable of being assumed by the Word on account of the order which it has to the rational soul as to its proper form. Now it does not have this order before the rational soul comes to it, because when any matter becomes proper to any form, at the same time it receives that form; hence the alteration is terminated at the same instant in which the substantial form is introduced. And so it is that the flesh ought not to have been assumed before it was human flesh, which happened when the rational soul came to it. Therefore since the soul was not assumed before the flesh, because it is against the nature of the soul to be before it is united to the body, so likewise the flesh ought not to have been assumed before the soul, since it is not human flesh before it has a rational soul.

Reply Obj. 1. Human flesh depends upon the soul for its being; and hence, before the coming of the soul, there is no human flesh, but there may be a disposition towards human flesh. Yet in the conception of Christ, the Holy Ghost, Who is an agent of infinite might, disposed the matter and brought it to its perfection at the same time.

Reply Obj. 2. The form actually gives the species, but the matter in itself is in potency to the species. And hence it would be against the nature of a form to exist before the specific nature, which is brought about through its union with matter; but it is not against the nature of matter to exist prior to the specific nature. And therefore the dissimilarity between our origin and Christ's origin, inasmuch as our flesh is conceived before being animated, and Christ's flesh is not, is by reason of what precedes the perfection of the nature, namely, that we are conceived from the seed of man, and Christ is not. But a difference which would be with reference to the origin of the soul would bespeak a diversity of nature.

Reply Obj. 3. The Word of God is understood to be united to the flesh before the soul by the common mode whereby He is in the rest of creatures by essence, power, and presence. Yet I say before, not in time, but in nature; for the flesh is understood as a being, which it has from the Word, before it is understood as animated, which it has from the soul. But by the personal union we understand the flesh as united to the soul before it is united to the Word, for it is from its union with the soul that it is capable of being united to the Word in Person; especially since a person is found only in the rational nature.

ARTICLE 5. Whether the Whole Human Nature Was Assumed Through the Medium of the Parts?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that the Son of God assumed the whole human nature through the medium of its parts.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (De Agone Christ. xviii)¹ that "the invisible and unchangeable Truth assumed the soul through the medium of the spirit, and the body through the medium of the soul, and in this way the whole man." But the spirit, soul, and body are parts of the whole man. Therefore He assumed all, through the medium of the parts.

Obj. 2. Further, the Son of God assumed flesh through the medium of the soul because the soul is more like to God than the body. But the parts of human nature, since they are simpler than the body, would seem to be more like to God, Who is most simple, than the whole. Therefore He assumed the whole through the medium of the parts.

Obj. 3. Further, the whole results from the union of parts. But the union is taken to be the term of the assumption, and the parts are presupposed to the assumption. Therefore He assumed the whole by the parts.

On the contrary, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 16):² "In Our Lord Jesus Christ we do not behold parts of parts, but such as are immediately joined, that is, the Godhead and the manhood." Now the humanity is a whole, which is composed of soul and body, as out of parts. Therefore the Son of God assumed the parts through the medium of the whole.

I answer that, When anything is said to be a medium in the assumption of the Incarnation, we do not signify order of time, because the assumption of the whole and the parts was simultaneous. For it has been shown (AA. 3, 4) that the soul and body were mutually united at the same time in order to constitute the human nature of the Word. But it is order of nature that is signified. Hence by what is prior in nature that is assumed which is posterior in nature. Now a thing is prior in nature in two ways: first on the part of the agent, secondly on the part of the matter, for these two causes exist prior to the thing. On the part of the agent, that is absolutely first which is first included in his intention, but that is relatively first with which his operation begins; and this because the intention is prior to the operation.

On the part of the matter, that is first which exists first in the transmutation of the matter.

Now in the Incarnation the order depending on the agent must be particularly considered, because, as Augustine says (Ep. ad Volusianum, cxxxvii),³ "in such things the whole reason of the deed is the power of the doer." But it is manifest that according to the intention of the doer what is complete is prior to what is incomplete, and, consequently, the whole to the parts. Hence it must be said that the Word of God assumed the parts of human nature through the medium of the whole; for even as He assumed the body on account of its relation to the rational soul, so likewise He assumed a body and soul on account of their relation to human nature.

Reply Obj. 1. From these words nothing may be gathered, except that the Word, by assuming the parts of human nature, assumed the whole human nature. And thus the assumption of parts is prior in the order of the intellect, if we consider the operation, but not in order of time; but the assumption of the nature is prior if we consider the intention, and this is to be first absolutely, as was said above.

Reply Obj. 2. God is so simple that He is also most perfect, and hence the whole is more like to God than the parts, since it is more perfect.

Reply Obj. 3. It is a personal union wherein the assumption is terminated, not a union of nature, which springs from a conjunction of parts.

ARTICLE 6. Whether the Human Nature Was Assumed Through the Medium of Grace?

We proceed thus to the sixth Article: It would seem that the Son of God assumed human nature through the medium of grace.

Objection 1. For by grace we are united to God. But the human nature in Christ was most closely united to God. Therefore the union took place by grace.

Obj. 2. Further, as the body lives by the soul, which is its perfection, so does the soul by grace. But the human nature was fitted for the assumption by the soul. Therefore the Son of God assumed the soul through the medium of grace.

Obj. 3. Further, Augustine says (De Trin. xv, 11)⁴ that the incarnate Word is like our spoken word. But our word is united to our speech by means of breathing (spiritus). Therefore the Word of God is united to flesh by means of the Holy Spirit, and hence by means of grace, which is attributed to the Holy Spirit, according to I Cor. 12. 4: Now there are diversities of graces, but the same Spirit.

³ Chap. 2 (PL 33, 519).

On the contrary, Grace is a kind of accident of the soul, as was shown above (Part I-II, q. cx, A. 2). Now the union of the Word with human nature took place in the subsistence, and not accidentally, as was shown above (q. ix, A. 6). Therefore the human nature was not assumed by means of grace.

I answer that, In Christ there was the grace of union and habitual grace. Therefore grace cannot be taken to be the medium of the assumption of the human nature whether we speak of the grace of union or of habitual grace. For the grace of union is the personal being itself that is given freely from above to the human nature in the Person of the Word, and is the term of the assumption. But the habitual grace pertaining to the special holiness of that man is an effect following the union, according to John 1. 14: We saw His glory, . . . as it were of the Only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth,—by which we are given to understand that because this Man (as a result of the union) is the Only-begotten of the Father, He is full of grace and truth. But if by grace we understand the will of God doing or bestowing something freely, the union took place by grace not as a means, but as the efficient cause.

Reply Obj. 1. Our union with God is by operation, in so far, that is, as we know and love Him, and hence this union is by habitual grace, in so far as a perfect operation proceeds from a habit. Now the union of the human nature with the Word of God is in personal being, which depends not on any habit, but immediately on the nature itself.

Reply Obj. 2. The soul is the substantial perfection of the body; grace is but an accidental perfection of the soul. Hence grace cannot order the soul to personal union, which is not accidental, as the soul orders the body.

Reply Obj. 3. Our word is united to our speech by means of breathing (spiritus) not as a formal medium, but as a moving medium. For from the word conceived within, the breathing proceeds, from which the speech is formed. And similarly from the eternal Word proceeds the Holy Spirit, Who formed the body of Christ, as will be shown (q. xxxii, A. 1). But it does not follow from this that the grace of the Holy Spirit is the formal medium in the aforesaid union.

QUESTION VII

OF THE GRACE OF CHRIST AS AN INDIVIDUAL MAN

(In Thirteen Articles)

WE must now consider such things as were co-assumed by the Son of God in human nature; and first what belongs to perfection, secondly, what belongs to defect (q. xiv).

Concerning the first, there are three points of consideration: (1) The grace of Christ; (2) His knowledge (q. ix); (3) His power (q. xiii).

With regard to His grace we must consider two things: (1) His grace as He is an individual man; (2) His grace as He is the Head of the Church (q. viii). Of the grace of union we have already spoken (q. ii).

Under the first head there are thirteen points of inquiry: (1) Whether in the soul of Christ there was any habitual grace? (2) Whether in Christ there were virtues? (3) Whether He had faith? (4) Whether He had hope? (5) Whether in Christ there were the gifts? (6) Whether in Christ there was the gift of fear? (7) Whether in Christ there were any gratuitous graces? (8) Whether in Christ there was prophecy? (9) Whether there was the fulness of grace in Him? (10) Whether such fulness was proper to Christ? (11) Whether the grace of Christ was infinite? (12) Whether it could have been increased? (13) How this grace stood towards the union?

ARTICLE 1. Whether in the Soul of Christ There Was Any Habitual Grace?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem there was no habitual grace in the soul assumed by the Word.

Objection 1. For grace is a certain partaking of the Godhead by the rational creature, according to II Pet. 1. 4: By Whom He hath given us most great and precious promises, that by these you may be made partakers of the Divine Nature. Now Christ is God not by participation, but in truth. Therefore there was no habitual grace in Him.

Obj. 2. Further, grace is necessary to man, that he may operate well, according to I Cor. 15. 10: I have laboured more abundantly than all they; yet not I, but the grace of God with me; and in order that he may reach eternal life, according to Rom. 6. 23: The grace of God (is) life everlasting. Now the inheritance of everlasting life was due to Christ by the mere fact of His being the natural Son of God; and by the fact of His being the Word, by Whom all things were made, He had the power of doing all things well. Therefore His human nature needed no further grace beyond union with the Word.

Obj. 3. Further, what operates as an instrument does not need a habit for its own operations, since habits are rooted in the principal agent. Now the human nature in Christ was as "the instrument of the Godhead," as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 15).¹ Therefore there was no need of habitual grace in Christ.

On the contrary, It is written (Isa. 11, 2): The Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon Him; which (Spirit), indeed, is said to be in man by habitual grace, as was said above (Part I, Q. VIII, A. 3; Q. XLIII, AA. 3, 6). Therefore there was habitual grace in Christ.

I answer that, It is necessary to suppose habitual grace in Christ for three reasons. First, on account of the union of His soul with the Word of God. For the nearer any recipient is to an inflowing cause, the more does it partake of its influence. Now the inflow of grace is from God, according to Ps. 83, 12: The Lord will give grace and glory. And hence it was most fitting that His soul should receive the inflow of Divine grace. Secondly, on account of the dignity of this soul, whose operations were to attain so closely to God by knowledge and love, to which it is necessary for human nature to be raised by grace. Thirdly, on account of the relation of Christ to the human race. For Christ, as man, is the Mediator of God and men, as is written, I Tim. 2, 5, and hence He had to have grace which would overflow upon others, according to John 1, 10: And of His fulness we have all received, and grace for grace.

Reply Obj. 1. Christ is the true God in Divine Person and Divine Nature. Yet because together with unity of person there remains distinction of natures, as stated above (Q. II, AA. 1, 2), the soul of Christ is not Divine through its essence. Hence it has to be made Divine by participation, which is by grace.

Reply Obj. 2. To Christ, since He is the natural Son of God, is due an eternal inheritance, which is the uncreated happiness through the uncreated act of knowledge and love of God—that is, the same whereby the Father knows and loves Himself. Now the soul was not capable of this act, on account of the difference of natures. Hence it had to attain to God by a created act of fruition which could not be without grace.

Likewise, since He was the Word of God, He had the power of doing all things well by the Divine operation. And because it is necessary to admit in Him a human operation, distinct from the Divine operation, as will be shown (Q. XIX, A. 1), it was necessary for Him to have habitual grace whereby this operation might be perfect in Him.

Reply Obj. 3. The humanity of Christ is the instrument of the Godhead—not, indeed, an inanimate instrument, which in no way acts, but is merely acted upon, but an instrument animated by a rational soul, which is so acted upon as to act. And hence the nature of the action demanded that he should have habitual grace.

ARTICLE 2. Whether in Christ There Were Virtues?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that in Christ there were no virtues.

Objection 1. For Christ had the fulness of grace. Now grace is sufficient for every good act, according to II Cor. 12, 9: My grace is sufficient for thee. Therefore there were no virtues in Christ.

Obj. 2. Further, according to the Philosopher,² virtue is divided against a certain heroic or godlike habit which is attributed to godlike men. But this belongs chiefly to Christ. Therefore Christ had not virtues, but something higher than virtue.

Obj. 3. Further, as was said above (Part I-II, Q. LXV, AA. 1, 2), all the virtues are bound together. But it was not becoming for Christ to have all the virtues, as is clear in the case of liberality and magnificence, for these have to do with riches, which Christ spurned, according to Matt. 8, 20: The Son of man hath not where to lay His head. Temperance and continence also regard wicked desires, from which Christ was free. Therefore Christ had not the virtues.

On the contrary, On Ps. 1, 2, But His will is in the law of the Lord, a gloss says:³ "This refers to Christ, Who is full of all good." But a good quality of the mind is a virtue. Therefore Christ was full of all virtue.

I answer that, As was said above (Part I-II, Q. CX, AA. 3, 4), as grace regards the essence of the soul, so does virtue regard its power. Hence it is necessary that as the powers of the soul flow from its essence, so do the virtues flow from grace. Now the more perfect a principle is, the more it impresses its effects. Hence, since the grace of Christ was most perfect, there flowed from it, in consequence, the virtues which perfect the several powers of the soul for all the soul's acts; and thus Christ had all the virtues.

² Ethics, VII, 1 (1145^a10).

³ Glossa Lombardi (PL 191, 62); cf. Glossa ordin (III, 27A).

Reply Obj. 1. Grace suffices a man for all whereby he is ordered to happiness; nevertheless, it effects some of these immediately by itself, such as to make him pleasing to God, and the like, and some others through the medium of the virtues which proceed from grace.

Reply Obj. 2. A heroic or godlike habit only differs from virtue commonly so called by a more perfect mode, in so far, that is, as one is disposed to good in a higher way than is common to all. Hence it is not thus proved that Christ had not the virtues, but that He had them most perfectly beyond the common mode. In this sense Plotinus gave to a certain sublime degree of virtue the name of "virtue of the purified soul."¹

Reply Obj. 3. Liberality and magnificence are praiseworthy in regard to riches in so far as anyone does not esteem wealth to the extent of wishing to retain it so as to forego what ought to be done. But he esteems them least who wholly despises them, and casts them aside for love of perfection. And hence by altogether contemning all riches, Christ showed the highest kind of liberality and magnificence, although He also performed the act of liberality, as far as it became Him, by causing to be distributed to the poor what was given to Himself. Hence, when Our Lord said to Judas (John 13. 27), That which thou dost, do quickly, the disciples understood Our Lord to have ordered him to give something to the poor.

But Christ had no evil desires whatever, as will be shown (Q. XV, AA. 1, 2); yet He was not thereby prevented from having temperance, which is the more perfect in man as he is without evil desires. Hence, according to the Philosopher,² the temperate man differs from the continent in this, that the temperate has not the evil desires which the continent suffers. Hence, taking continence in this sense, as the Philosopher takes it, Christ, from the very fact that He had all virtue, had not continence, since it is not a virtue but something less than virtue.

ARTICLE 3. Whether in Christ There Was Faith?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that there was faith in Christ.

¹ Cf. Part I II, Q. 121, A. 5; cf. also Macrobius, In Somn. Scip., I, 8 (DD 32). ² Ethics, VIII, 9 (1152^a1).

Objection 1. For faith is a nobler virtue than the moral virtues—for example, temperance and liberality. Now these were in Christ, as stated above (A. 2). Much more, therefore, was there faith in Him.

Obj. 2. Further, Christ did not teach virtues which He had not Himself, according to Acts 1. 1: Jesus began to do and to teach. But of Christ it is said (Heb. 12. 2) that He is the author and finisher of our faith. Therefore there was faith in Him before all others.

Obj. 3. Further, everything imperfect is excluded from the blessed. But in the blessed there is faith, for on Rom. 1. 17, the justice of God is revealed therein from faith to faith, a gloss says:³ "From the faith of words and hope to the faith of things and sight." Therefore it would seem that in Christ also there was faith, since it implies nothing imperfect.

On the contrary. It is written (Heb. 11. 1): Faith is the evidence of things that appear not. But there was nothing that was not manifest to Christ, according to what Peter said to Him (John 21. 17): Thou knowest all things. Therefore there was no faith in Christ.

I answer that, As was said above (Part II-II, Q. IV, A. 1), the object of faith is a Divine thing not seen. Now the habit of virtue, as every other habit, takes its species from the object. Hence, if we deny that the Divine thing was not seen, we exclude the very notion of faith. Now from the first moment of His conception Christ saw God's Essence fully, as will be made clear (Q. XXXIV, A. 1). Hence there could be no faith in Him.

Reply Obj. 1. Faith is a nobler virtue than the moral virtues, seeing that it has to do with nobler matter; nevertheless, it implies a certain defect with regard to that matter, and this defect was not in Christ. And hence there could not be faith in Him, although the moral virtues were in Him, since in their nature they imply no defect with regard to their matter.

Reply Obj. 2. The merit of faith consists in this, that man through obedience assents to what things he does not see, according to Rom. 1. 5: For obedience to the faith in all nations for His name. Now Christ had most perfect obedience to God, according to Phil. 2. 8: Becoming obedient unto death. And hence He taught nothing pertaining to merit which He did not fulfil more perfectly Himself.

Reply Obj. 3. As a gloss says in the same place,¹ faith is that "whereby such things as are not seen are believed." But faith in things seen is improperly so called, and only after a certain similitude with regard to the certainty and firmness of the assent.

ARTICLE 4. Whether in Christ There Was Hope?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that there was hope in Christ.

Objection 1. For it is said "in the Person of Christ," according to a gloss² (Ps. 30. 1): In Thee, O Lord, have I hoped. But the virtue of hope is that whereby a man hopes in God. Therefore the virtue of hope was in Christ.

Obj. 2. Further, hope is the expectation of future Happiness as was shown above (Part II-II, Q. XVII, A. 1, reply 2; A. 3, reply 3). But Christ awaited something pertaining to Happiness—namely the glorifying of His body. Therefore it seems there was hope in Him.

Obj. 3. Further, everyone may hope for what pertains to his perfection, if it has yet to come. But there was something still to come pertaining to Christ's perfection, according to Eph. 4. 12: For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the building up (Douay, edifying) of the body of Christ. Hence it seems that it befitted Christ to have hope.

On the contrary, It is written (Rom. 8. 24): What a man seeth, why doth he hope for? Thus it is clear that as faith is of the unseen, so also is hope. But there was no faith in Christ, as was said above (A. 3). Neither, consequently, was there hope.

I answer that, As it is of the nature of faith that one assents to what one does not see, so is it of the nature of hope that one expects what as yet one has not; and as faith, in so far as it is a theological virtue, does not regard everything unseen, but only God, so likewise hope, as a theological virtue, has God Himself for its object, the enjoyment of Whom man chiefly expects by the virtue of hope; yet, in consequence, whoever has the virtue of hope may expect the Divine aid in other things, even as he who has the virtue of faith believes God not only in Divine things, but even in whatsoever is divinely revealed.

Now from the beginning of His conception Christ had the Divine enjoyment fully, as will be shown (Q. XXXIV, A. 4), and hence he had not the virtue of hope. Nevertheless He had hope as regards such things as He did not yet possess, although He had no faith with regard to anything; because, although He knew all things fully, for which reason faith was altogether wanting to Him, nevertheless He did not as yet fully possess all that pertained to His perfection, namely, immortality and glory of the body, which He could hope for.

Reply Obj. 1. This is said of Christ with reference to hope, not as a theological virtue, but in so far as He hoped for some other things not yet possessed, as was said above.

Reply Obj. 2. The glory of the body does not pertain to Happiness as being that in which Happiness principally consists, but by a certain outpouring from the soul's glory, as was said above (Part I-II, Q. IV, A. 6). Hence hope, as a theological virtue, does not regard the Happiness of the body but the soul's Happiness, which consists in the Divine enjoyment.

Reply Obj. 3. The building up of the Church by the conversion of the faithful does not pertain to the perfection of Christ, by which He is perfect in Himself, but according as it leads others to a sharing of His perfection. And because hope properly regards what is expected by him who hopes, the virtue of hope cannot properly be said to be in Christ, because of the aforesaid reason.

ARTICLE 5. Whether in Christ There Were the Gifts?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that the gifts were not in Christ.

Objection 1. For, as is commonly said, the gifts are given to help the virtues. But what is perfect in itself does not need an exterior help. Therefore, since the virtues of Christ were perfect, it seems there were no gifts in Him.

Obj. 2. Further, to give and to receive gifts would not seem to belong to the same, since to give pertains to one who has, and to receive pertains to one who has not. But it belongs to Christ to give gifts according to Ps. 67. 19. Thou hast given gifts to men (Vulg., Thou hast received gifts in men). Therefore it was not becoming that Christ should receive the gifts of the Holy Ghost.

Obj. 3. Further, four gifts would seem to pertain to the contemplation of earth—namely, wisdom, knowledge, understanding, and counsel which pertains to prudence; hence the Philosopher enumerates these with the intellectual virtues.³ But Christ had the contemplation of heaven. Therefore He had not these gifts.

² Cf. Glossa interl. (III, 125v).

On the contrary, It is written (Is. 4. 1): Seven women shall take hold of one man, on which a gloss says:¹ "That is, the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost shall take hold of Christ."

I answer that, As was said above (Part I-II, q. LXVIII, A. 1), the gifts, properly, are certain perfections of the soul's powers, inasmuch as these are designed to be moved by the Holy Ghost. But it is clear that the soul of Christ is moved in a most perfect manner by the Holy Ghost, according to Luke 4. 1: And Jesus, being full of the Holy Ghost, returned from the Jordan, and was led by the Spirit into the desert. Hence it is manifest that in Christ the gifts were in a pre-eminent degree.

Reply Obj. 1. What is perfect in the order of its nature needs to be helped by something of a higher nature; just as man, however perfect, needs to be helped by God. And in this way the virtues, which perfect the powers of the soul, as they are controlled by reason, no matter how perfect they are, need to be helped by the gifts, which perfect the soul's powers, according as these are moved by the Holy Ghost.

Reply Obj. 2. Christ is not a recipient and a giver of the gifts of the Holy Ghost, in the same respect; for He gives them as God and receives them as man. Hence Gregory says (Moral. ii, 56)² that "the Holy Ghost never quitted the human nature of Christ, from Whose Divine nature He proceedeth."

Reply Obj. 3. In Christ there was not only heavenly knowledge, but also earthly knowledge, as will be said (q. xv, A. 10). And yet even in heaven the gifts of the Holy Ghost will still exist, in a certain manner, as was said above (Part. I-II, q. LXVIII, A. 6).

ARTICLE 6. Whether in Christ There Was the Gift of Fear?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that in Christ there was not the gift of fear.

Objection 1. For hope would seem to be stronger than fear, since the object of hope is goodness, and of fear, evil, as was said above (Part I-II, q. XL, A. 1; q. XLI, A. 2; q. XLII, A. 1). But in Christ there was not the virtue of hope, as was said above (A. 4). Hence, likewise, there was not the gift of fear in Him.

Obj. 2. Further, by the gift of fear we fear either to be separated from God, which pertains to chaste fear;—or to be punished by Him, which pertains to servile fear, as Augustine says (in Joann. Tract. ix).³ But Christ did not fear being separated from God by sin, nor being punished by Him on account of a fault, since it was impossible for Him to sin, as will be said (q. xv, AA. 1 and 2). Now fear is not of the impossible. Therefore in Christ there was not the gift of fear.

Obj. 3. Further, it is written (I John 4. 18) that perfect charity casteth out fear. But in Christ there was most perfect charity, according to Eph. 3. 19: The charity of Christ which surpasseth all knowledge. Therefore in Christ there was not the gift of fear.

On the contrary, It is written (Isa. 11. 3): And He shall be filled with the spirit of the fear of the Lord.

I answer that, As was said above (Part I-II, q. XLII, A. 1), fear regards two objects, of which one is an evil causing terror; the other is that by whose power an evil can be inflicted, as we fear the king in so far as he has the power of putting to death. Now whoever can hurt would not be feared unless he had a certain greatness of power, to which resistance could not easily be offered; for what we easily repel we do not fear. And hence it is plain that no one is feared except for some pre-eminence.

And in this way it is said that in Christ there was the fear of God, not indeed as it regards the evil of separation from God by fault, nor as it regards the evil of punishment for fault, but according as it regards the Divine eminence, on account of which the soul of Christ, led by the Holy Spirit, was borne towards God in an act of reverence. Hence it is written (Heb. 5. 7) that in all things he was heard for His reverence. For Christ as man had this act of reverence towards God in a fuller sense and beyond all others. And hence Scripture attributes to Him the fulness of the fear of the Lord.

Reply Obj. 1. The habits of virtues and gifts regard goodness properly and of themselves, evil, however, consequently, since it pertains to the nature of virtue to render acts good, as is said in the Ethics.⁴ And hence the nature of the gift of fear regards not that evil which fear is concerned with, but the eminence of that goodness—namely, of God, by Whose power evil may be inflicted. On the other hand, hope, as a virtue, regards not only the author of good, but even the good itself, as far as it is not yet possessed. And hence to Christ, Who already possessed the perfect good of Happiness, we do not attribute the virtue of hope, but we do attribute the gift of fear.

Reply Obj. 2. This reason is based on fear in so far as it regards the evil object.

Reply Obj. 3. Perfect charity casts out servile fear, which principally regards punishment. But this kind of fear was not in Christ.

ARTICLE 7. Whether the Gratuitous Graces Were in Christ?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It would seem that the gratuitous graces were not in Christ.

Objection 1. For it does not pertain to whoever has anything in its fulness to have it by participation. Now Christ has grace in its fulness, according to John 1. 14: Full of grace and truth. But the gratuitous graces would seem to be certain participations, bestowed distributively and particularly upon various subjects, according to I Cor. 12. 4: Now there are diversities of graces. Therefore it would seem that there were no gratuitous graces in Christ.

Obj. 2. Further, what is due to anyone would not seem to be gratuitously bestowed on him. But it was due to the man Christ that He should abound in the word of wisdom and knowledge, and to be mighty in doing wonderful works and the like, all of which pertain to gratuitous graces, since He is the power of God and the wisdom of God, as is written I Cor. 1. 24. Therefore it was not fitting for Christ to have the gratuitous graces.

Obj. 3. Further, gratuitous graces are ordained to the benefit of the faithful. But it does not seem that a habit or any other disposition which a man does not use is for the benefit of others, according to Ecclus. 20. 32: Wisdom that is hid and treasure that is not seen: what profit is there in them both? Now we do not read that Christ made use of these gratuitously given graces, especially as regards the gift of tongues. Therefore not all the gratuitous graces were in Christ.

On the contrary, Augustine says (Ep. ad Dardan. cclxxxii)¹ that as in the head are all the senses, so in Christ were all the graces.

I answer that, As was said above (Part I-II, Q. CXI. AA. 1, 4), the gratuitous graces are ordained for the manifestation of faith and spiritual doctrine. For he who teaches has to have the means of making his doctrine clear; otherwise his doctrine would be useless. Now Christ is the first and chief teacher of spiritual doctrine and faith, according to Heb. 2. 3. 4: Which having begun to be declared by the Lord was confirmed unto us by them that heard Him, God also bearing them witness by signs and wonders, etc. Hence it is clear that all the gratuitous graces were most excellently in Christ, as in the first and chief teacher of the faith.

Reply Obj. 1. As sanctifying grace is ordained to meritorious acts both interior and exterior, so likewise gratuitous grace is ordained to certain exterior acts manifestive of the faith, as the working of miracles, and the like. Now of both these graces Christ had the fulness, since inasmuch as His soul was united to the Godhead, He had the perfect power of effecting all these acts. But other saints who are moved by God as separated and not united instruments receive power in a particular manner in order to bring about this or that act. And hence in other saints these graces are divided, but not in Christ.

Reply Obj. 2. Christ is said to be the power of God and the wisdom of God according as He is the Eternal Son of God. But in this respect it does not pertain to Him to have grace, but rather to be the bestower of grace; but it pertains to Him in His human nature to have grace.

Reply Obj. 3. The gift of tongues was bestowed on the apostles, because they were sent to teach all nations; but Christ wished to preach personally only in the one nation of the Jews, as He Himself says (Matt. 15. 24): I was not sent but to the sheep that are lost of the house of Israel; and the Apostle says (Rom. 15. 8): I say that Christ Jesus was minister of the circumcision. And hence it was not necessary for Him to speak several languages. Yet was a knowledge of all languages not wanting to Him, since even the secrets of hearts, of which all words are signs, were not hidden from Him, as will be shown (Q. X, A. 2). Nor was this knowledge uselessly possessed, just as it is not useless to have a habit, which we do not use when there is no occasion.

ARTICLE 8. Whether in Christ There Was the Gift of Prophecy?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It would seem that in Christ there was not the gift of prophecy.

Objection 1. For prophecy implies a certain obscure and imperfect knowledge, according to Num. 12. 6: If there be among you a prophet of the Lord, I will appear to him in a vision, or I will speak to him in a dream. But Christ had full and unveiled knowledge, much more than Moses, of whom it is added that plainly and not by riddles and figures doth he see God (verse 8). Therefore we ought not to admit prophecy in Christ.

Obj. 2. Further, as faith has to do with what is not seen, and hope with what is not possessed, so prophecy has to do with what is not present, but distant; for a prophet means, as it were, a teller of far-off things. But in Christ there could be neither faith nor hope, as was said above (AA. 3, 4). Hence prophecy also ought not to be admitted in Christ.

Obj. 3. Further, a prophet is in an inferior order to an angel; hence Moses, who was the greatest of the prophets, as was said above (Part II-II, Q. CLXXIV, A. 4) is said (Acts 7, 38) to have spoken with an angel in the desert. But Christ was made lower than the angels, not as to the knowledge of His soul, but only as regards the sufferings of His body, as is shown Heb. 2. 9. Therefore it seems that Christ was not a prophet.

On the contrary, 1. is written of Him (Deut. 18. 15): Thy God will raise up to thee a prophet of thy nation and of thy brethren, and He says of Himself (Matt. 13. 57 and John 4. 44): A prophet is not without honour, save in his own country.

I answer that, A prophet means, as it were, a teller or seer of far-off things, in so far as he knows and announces what things are far from men's senses, as Augustine says (Contra Faust. xvi, 18).¹ Now we must bear in mind that no one can be called a prophet for knowing and announcing what is distant from others, whose life he is not sharing. And this is clear in regard to place and time. For if anyone living in France were to know and announce to others living in France what things were transpiring at the time in Syria, it would be prophetic, as Eliseus told Giezi (IV Kings 5. 26) how the man had leapt down from his chariot to meet him. But if anyone living in Syria were to announce what things were there, it would not be prophetic. And the same appears in regard to time. For it was prophetic of Isaias to announce that Cyrus, King of the Persians, would rebuild the temple of God, as is clear from Isa., 44. 28. But it was not prophetic of Esdras to write it (I Esdras 1, 3), in whose time it took place.

Hence if God or angels, or even the blessed, know and announce what is beyond our knowing, this does not pertain to prophecy, since they in no way touch our state. Now Christ before His passion touched our state, since He was not merely a comprehensor, but a wayfarer. Hence it was prophetic in Him to know and announce what was beyond the knowledge of other wayfarers, and for this reason He is called a prophet.

Reply Obj. 1. These words do not prove that enigmatical knowledge—namely, by dream and vision—belongs to the nature of prophecy; but the comparison is drawn between other prophets, who saw Divine things in dreams and visions, and Moses, who saw God plainly and not by riddles—and who is yet called a prophet, according to Deut. 24. 10: And there arose no more a prophet in Israel like unto Moses. Nevertheless it may be said that although Christ had full and unveiled knowledge as regards the intellectual part, yet in the imaginative part He had certain likenesses in which Divine things could be viewed, since He was not only a comprehensor, but a wayfarer.

Reply Obj. 2. Faith regards such things as are unseen by him who believes, and hope, too, is of such things as are not possessed by the one who hopes; but prophecy is of such things as are beyond the sense of men, with whom the prophet dwells and converses in this state of pilgrimage. And hence faith and hope are contrary to the perfection of Christ's Happiness, but prophecy is not.

Reply Obj. 3. Angels, being comprehensors, are above prophets, who are merely wayfarers; but not above Christ, Who was both a comprehensor and a wayfarer.

ARTICLE 9. Whether in Christ There Was the Fulness of Grace?

We proceed thus to the Ninth Article: It would seem that in Christ there was not the fulness of grace.

Objection 1. For the virtues flow from grace, as was said above (Part I-II, Q. CX, A. 4). But in Christ there were not all the virtues, for there was neither faith nor hope in Him, as was shown above (AA. 3, 4). Therefore in Christ there was not the fulness of grace.

Obj. 2. Further, as is plain from what was said above (Part I-II, Q. CXI, A. 2), grace is divided into operating and co-operating. Now operating grace signifies that whereby the ungodly is justified, which has no place in Christ, Who never lay under any sin. Therefore in Christ there was not the fulness of grace.

Obj. 3. Further, it is written (Jas. 1. 17):

Every best gift and every perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of lights. But what comes thus is possessed partially, and not fully. Therefore no creature, not even the soul of Christ, can have the fulness of the gifts of grace.

On the contrary, It is written (John 1. 14): We saw Him (Vulg., His glory) full of grace and truth.

I answer that, To have fully is to have wholly and perfectly. Now totality and perfection can be taken in two ways. First as regards their intensive quantity; for instance, I may say that some man has whiteness fully, because he has as much of it as can naturally be in him. Secondly, as regards power; for instance, if anyone be said to have life fully because he has it in all the effects or works of life; and thus man has life fully, but brute animals or plants have not.

Now in both these ways Christ has the fulness of grace. First, since He has grace in its highest degree, in the most perfect way it can be had. And this appears, first, from the nearness of Christ's soul to the cause of grace. For it was said above (A. 1) that the nearer a recipient is to the inflowing cause, the more abundantly it receives. And hence the soul of Christ, which is more closely united to God than all other rational creatures, receives the greatest inflowing of His grace. Secondly, in His relation to the effect. For the soul of Christ so received grace, that, in a manner, it is poured out from it upon others. And hence He had to have the greatest grace; just as fire which is the cause of heat, in other hot things, is of all things the hottest.

Likewise, as regards the power of grace, He had grace fully, since He had it for all the operations and effects of grace; and this, because grace was bestowed on Him as upon a universal principle in the genus of such as have grace. Now the power of the first principle of a genus universally extends itself to all the effects of that genus; thus the power of the sun, which is the universal cause of generation, as Dionysius says (Div. Nom. iv),¹ extends to all things that come under generation. Hence the second fulness of grace is seen in Christ in so far as His grace extends to all the effects of grace, which are the virtues, gifts and the like.

Reply Obj. 1. Faith and hope signify effects of grace with certain defects on the part of the recipient of grace, in so far as faith is of the unseen, and hope of what is not yet possessed.

Hence it was not necessary that in Christ, Who is the author of grace, there should be any defects such as faith and hope imply, but whatever perfection is in faith and hope was in Christ most perfectly; just as in fire there are not all the modes of heat which are defective by the subject's defect, but whatever belongs to the perfection of heat.

Reply Obj. 2. It pertains per se to operating grace to justify; but that it makes the ungodly to be just is accidental to it on the part of the subject, in which sin is found. Therefore the soul of Christ was justified by operating grace, since it was rendered just and holy by it from the beginning of His conception, not that it was until then sinful, or even not just.

Reply Obj. 3. The fulness of grace is attributed to the soul of Christ according to the capacity of the creature, and not by comparison with the infinite fulness of the Divine goodness.

ARTICLE 10. Whether the Fulness of Grace Is Proper to Christ?

We proceed thus to the Tenth Article: It would seem that the fulness of grace is not proper to Christ.

Objection 1. For what is proper to anyone belongs to him alone. But to be full of grace is attributed to some others; for it was said to the Blessed Virgin (Luke 1. 28): Hail, full of grace; and again it is written (Acts 6. 8): Stephen, full of grace and fortitude. Therefore the fulness of grace is not proper to Christ.

Obj. 2. Further, what can be communicated to others through Christ does not seem to be proper to Christ. But the fulness of grace can be communicated to others through Christ, since the Apostle says (Eph. 3. 19): That you may be filled unto all the fulness of God. Therefore the fulness of grace is not proper to Christ.

Obj. 3. Further, the state of the wayfarer seems to be proportioned to the state of the goal. But in the state of our heavenly home there will be a certain fulness, since in our heavenly country with its fulness of all good, although some things are bestowed in a pre-eminent way, yet nothing is possessed in an exclusive manner, as is clear from Gregory (Hom. De Cent. Orib.; xxxiv in Ev.).² Therefore in the state of heaven the fulness of grace is possessed by everyone, and hence the fulness of grace is not proper to Christ.

On the contrary, The fulness of grace is attributed to Christ according as He is the Only-begotten of the Father, according to John 1. 14: We saw Him (Vulg., His glory) as it were . . . the Only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. But to be the Only-begotten of the Father is proper to Christ. Therefore it is proper to Him to be full of grace and truth.

I answer that, The fulness of grace may be taken in two ways: first, on the part of grace itself, or secondly on the part of the one who has grace. Now on the part of grace itself there is said to be the fulness of grace when the highest point of grace is attained, both as to essence and power, because grace is possessed in its highest possible excellence and in its greatest possible extension to all its effects. And this fulness of grace is proper to Christ. But on the part of the subject there is said to be the fulness of grace when anyone fully possesses grace according to his condition; whether as regards intensity, by reason of grace being intense in him to the limit assigned by God, according to Eph. 4. 7: But to every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the giving of Christ; or as regards power, by reason of a man having the help of grace for all that belongs to his office or state, as the Apostle says (Eph. 3. 8): To me, the least of all the saints, is given this grace, . . . to enlighten all men. And this fulness of grace is not proper to Christ, but is communicated to others by Christ.

Reply Obj. 1 The Blessed Virgin is said to be full of grace not on the part of grace itself—since she had not grace in its greatest possible excellence—nor for all the effects of grace, but she is said to be full of grace in reference to herself, that is, because she had sufficient grace for the state to which God had chosen her, namely, to be the mother of His Only-begotten. So, too, Stephen is said to be full of grace, since he had sufficient grace to be a fit minister and witness of God, to which office he had been called. And the same must be said of others. Of these fulnesses one is more full than another, according as one is divinely pre-ordained to a higher or lower state.

Reply Obj. 2. The Apostle is there speaking of that fulness which has reference to the subject, in comparison with what man is divinely pre-ordained to; and this is either something in common, to which all the saints are pre-ordained, or something special, which pertains to the pre-eminence of some. And in this manner a certain fulness of grace is common to all the saints, namely, to have grace enough to merit eternal life, which consists in the full enjoyment of God. And this is the fulness of grace which the Apostle desires for the faithful to whom he writes.

Reply Obj. 3. These gifts which are in common in heaven, namely: vision, possession and enjoyment, and the like, have certain gifts corresponding to them in this life which are also common to all the saints. Yet there are certain prerogatives of saints, both in heaven and on earth, which are not possessed by all.

ARTICLE 11. Whether the Grace of Christ Is Infinite?

We proceed thus to the Eleventh Article: It would seem that Christ's grace is infinite.

Objection 1. For everything immeasurable is infinite. But the grace of Christ is immeasurable, since it is written (John 3. 34): *For God doth not give the Spirit by measure to His Son,*¹ namely Christ. Therefore the grace of Christ is infinite.

Obj. 2. Further, an infinite effect shows an infinite power which can only spring from an infinite essence. But the effect of Christ's grace is infinite, since it extends to the salvation of the whole human race; for He is the propitiation for our sins . . . and for those of the whole world, as is said (I John 2. 2). Therefore the grace of Christ is infinite.

Obj. 3. Further, every finite thing by addition can attain to the quantity of any other finite thing. Therefore if the grace of Christ is finite the grace of any other man could increase to such an extent as to reach to an equality with Christ's grace, against what is written (Job 28. 17): Gold nor crystal cannot equal it, as Gregory expounds it (Moral. xviii).² Therefore the grace of Christ is infinite.

On the contrary, Grace is something created in the soul. But every created thing is finite, according to Wisd. 11, 21: Thou hast ordered all things in measure and number and weight. Therefore the grace of Christ is not infinite.

I answer that, As was made clear above (Q. 11, A. 10; Q. VI, A. 6), a twofold grace may be considered in Christ. The first is the grace of union, which, as was said (Q. 11, A. 10; Q. VI, A. 6), is for Him to be personally united to the Son of God, which is a free grant to human nature; and it is clear that this grace is infinite, as the Person of God is infinite.

The second is habitual grace, which may be taken in two ways: first according as it is a kind of being, and in this way it must be a finite being, since it is in the soul of Christ, as in a subject, and Christ's soul is a creature having a finite capacity; hence the being of grace cannot be infinite, since it cannot exceed its subject. Secondly it may be viewed in its proper nature of grace; and thus the grace of Christ can be termed infinite, since it is not limited, that is, it has whatsoever can pertain to the nature of grace, and what pertains to the nature of grace is not bestowed on Him in a fixed measure, seeing that according to the purpose of God to Whom it pertains to measure grace, grace is bestowed on Christ's soul as on a universal principle for bestowing grace on human nature, according to Eph. 1. 5, 6, He hath graced us in His beloved Son. Thus we might say that the light of the sun is infinite, not indeed in being, but according to the nature of light, as having whatever can pertain to the nature of light.

Reply Obj. 1. When it is said that the Father doth not give the Spirit by measure, it may be expounded of the gift which God the Father from all eternity gave the Son, namely, the Divine Nature, which is an infinite gift. Hence the comment of a certain gloss:¹ So that the Son may be as great as the Father is.

Or again, it may be referred to the gift which is given the human nature, namely, that it be united to the Divine Person, and this also is an infinite gift. Hence a gloss² says on this text: "As the Father begot a full and perfect Word, it is united thus full and perfect to human nature."

Thirdly, it may be referred to habitual grace, according as the grace of Christ extends to whatever belongs to grace. Hence Augustine expounding this (Tract. xiv in Joann.)³ says: "The division of the gifts is a measurement. . . for to one indeed by the Spirit is given the word of wisdom, to another . . . the word of knowledge. But Christ the giver does not receive by measure."

Reply Obj. 2. The grace of Christ has an infinite effect, both because of the aforesaid infinity of grace, and because of the unity of the Divine Person, to Whom Christ's soul is united.

Reply Obj. 3. The lesser can attain by increase to the quantity of the greater when both have the same kind of quantity. But the grace of any man is compared to the grace of Christ as a particular to a universal power; hence as the force of fire, no matter how much it increases, can never equal the sun's strength, so the grace of a man, no matter how much it grows, can never equal the grace of Christ.

ARTICLE 12. Whether the Grace of Christ Could Increase?

We proceed thus to the Twelfth Article: It would seem that the grace of Christ could increase.

Objection 1. For to every finite thing addition can be made. But the grace of Christ was finite as we have said (A. 11). Therefore it could increase.

Obj. 2. Further, it is by Divine power that grace is increased, according to II Cor. 9 8: And God is able to make all grace abound in you. But the Divine power, being infinite, is confined by no limits. Therefore it seems that the grace of Christ could have been greater.

Obj. 3. Further, it is written (Luke 2. 52) that the child Jesus advanced in wisdom and age and grace with God and men. Therefore the grace of Christ could increase.

On the contrary, It is written (John 1. 14): We saw Him (Vulg., His glory) as it were . . . the Only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. But nothing can be or can be thought greater than that anyone should be the Only-begotten of the Father. Therefore no greater grace can be or can be thought than that of which Christ was full.

I answer that, For a form to be incapable of increase happens in two ways: first on the part of the subject itself; secondly, on the part of the form itself. On the part of the subject, indeed, when the subject reaches the utmost limit wherein it partakes of this form, after its own manner, for example, if we say that air cannot increase in heat when it has reached the utmost limit of heat which can exist in the nature of air, although there may be greater heat in actual existence, namely, the heat of fire. But on the part of the form, the possibility of increase is excluded when a subject reaches the utmost perfection which this form can have; for example, if we say the heat of fire cannot be increased because there cannot be a more perfect grade of heat than that to which fire attains.

Now the proper measure of grace, like that of other forms, is determined by the Divine wisdom, according to Wisd. 11. 21: Thou hast ordered all things in number, weight and measure. And it is with reference to its end that a measure is set to every form; just as there is no greater gravity than that of the earth because there is no lower place than that of the earth. Now the end of grace is the union of the rational creature with God. But there can neither be nor be thought a greater union of the rational creature with God than that which is in the Person. And hence the grace of Christ reached the highest measure of grace. And so it is clear that the grace of Christ cannot be increased on the part of grace itself.

But neither can it be increased on the part of the subject, since Christ as man was a true and full comprehensor from the first instant of His conception. Hence there could have been no increase of grace in Him, as there could be none in the rest of the blessed, whose grace could not increase, seeing that they have reached their last end.

But as regards men who are wholly wayfarers, their grace can be increased both on the part of the form, since they have not attained the highest degree of grace, and also on the part of the subject, since they have not yet attained their end.

Reply Obj. 1. If we speak of mathematical quantity, addition can be made to any finite quantity, since there is nothing on the part of finite quantity which is contrary to addition. But if we speak of natural quantity, there may be incompatibility on the part of the form to which a determined quantity is due, even as other accidents are determined. Hence the Philosopher says¹ that "there is naturally a term of all fixed things, and a limit of magnitude and increase." And hence to the quantity of the whole there can be no addition. And still more must we suppose a term in the forms themselves, beyond which they may not go. Hence it is not necessary that addition should be capable of being made to Christ's grace, although it is finite in its essence.

Reply Obj. 2. Although the Divine power can make something greater and better than the habitual grace of Christ, yet it could not make it to be ordered to anything greater than the personal union with the only-begotten Son of the Father; and to this union, by the determining of the Divine wisdom, the measure of grace is sufficient.

Reply Obj. 3. Anyone may increase in wisdom and grace in two ways. First according as the very habits of wisdom and grace are increased, and in this way Christ did not increase. Secondly, as regards the effects, that is, in so far as they do wiser and greater works; and in this way Christ increased in wisdom and grace even as in age, since in the course of time He did more perfect works, to prove Himself true man, both in the things of God and in the things of man.

ARTICLE 13. In What Way the Habitual Grace of Christ Was Related to the Union?

We proceed thus to the Thirteenth Article: It would seem that the habitual grace did not follow after the union.

Objection 1. For nothing follows itself. But this habitual grace seems to be the same as the grace of union; for Augustine says (De Predest. Sanct. xv):² "Every man becomes a Christian from the beginning of his belief, by the same grace whereby this Man from His beginning became Christ," and of these two the first pertains to habitual grace and the second to the grace of union. Therefore it would seem that habitual grace did not follow upon the union.

Obj. 2. Further, disposition precedes perfection if not in time, at least in thought. But the habitual grace seems to be a disposition in human nature for the personal union. Therefore it seems that the habitual grace did not follow but rather preceded the union.

Obj. 3. Further the common precedes the proper. But habitual grace is common to Christ and other men, and the grace of union is proper to Christ. Therefore habitual grace is prior in thought to the union. Therefore it does not follow it.

On the contrary, It is written (Isa. 42. 1): Behold my servant, I will uphold him . . . and farther on: I have given My Spirit upon Him; and this pertains to the gift of habitual grace. Hence it remains that the assumption of human nature to the unity of the Person preceded the habitual grace of Christ.

I answer that, The union of the human nature with the Divine Person, which, as we have said above (Q. II, A. 10; Q. VI, A. 6), is the grace of union, precedes the habitual grace of Christ not in order of time, but by nature and in thought; and this for a triple reason. First, with reference to the order of the principles of both. For the principle of the union is the Person of the Son assuming human nature, Who is said to be sent into the world (John 3. 17) because He assumed human nature; but the principle of habitual grace, which is given with charity, is the Holy Ghost, Who is said to be sent because He dwells in the mind by charity. Now the mission of the Son is prior, in the order of nature, to the sending of the Holy Ghost, even as in the order of nature the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Son, and love from wisdom. Hence the personal union, according to which is understood the mission of the Son, is prior in the order of nature to habitual grace, according to which is understood the mission of the Holy Ghost. Secondly, the reason of this order may be taken from the relation of grace to its cause. For grace is caused in man by the presence of the Godhead, as light in the air by the presence of the sun. Hence it is written (Ezech. 43. 2): The glory of the God of Israel came in by the way of the east; . . . and the earth shone with His majesty. But the presence of God in Christ is understood according to the union of human nature with the Divine Person. Hence the habitual grace of Christ is understood to follow this union, as light follows the sun.

Thirdly, the reason of this order can be taken from the end of grace, since it is ordained to acting rightly, and actions belong to the suppositum and the individual. Hence action and, in consequence, grace ordering to it, presuppose the hypostasis which operates. Now the hypostasis did not exist in the human nature before the union, as is clear from (Q. IV, A. 3). Therefore the grace of union precedes, in thought, habitual grace.

Reply Obj. 1. Augustine here means by grace the gratuitous will of God, bestowing benefits freely; and hence every man is said to be made a Christian by the same grace whereby a Man became Christ, since both take place by the gratuitous will of God without merits.

Reply Obj. 2. As disposition in the order of generation precedes the perfection to which it disposes, in such things as are successively perfected, so it naturally follows the perfection which one has already obtained; just as heat, which was a disposition to the form of fire, is an effect flowing from the form of already existing fire. Now the human nature in Christ is united to the Person of the Word from the beginning without succession. Hence habitual grace is not understood to have preceded the union, but to have followed it as a kind of natural property. Hence, as Augustine says (Enchir. xl):¹ "Grace is in a manner natural to the Man Christ."

Reply Obj. 3. The common precedes the proper when both are of the same genus; but when they are of divers genera, there is nothing to prevent the proper being prior to the common. Now the grace of union is not in the same genus as habitual grace, but is above all genera even as the Divine Person Himself. Hence there is nothing to prevent this proper from being before the common since it does not result from something being added to the common, but is rather the principle and source of that which is common.

QUESTION VIII

OF THE GRACE OF CHRIST AS HE IS THE HEAD OF THE CHURCH (In Eight Articles)

WE must now consider the grace of Christ as the Head of the Church; and under this head there are eight points of inquiry: (1) Whether Christ is the Head of the Church? (2) Whether He is the Head of men as regards their bodies or only as regards their souls? (3) Whether He is the Head of all men? (4) Whether He is the Head of the angels? (5) Whether the grace of Christ as Head of the Church is the same as His habitual grace as an individual man? (6) Whether to be Head of the Church is proper to Christ? (7) Whether the devil is the head of all the wicked? (8) Whether Antichrist can also be called the head of all the wicked?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Christ Is the Head of the Church?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that it does not belong to Christ as man to be Head of the Church.

Objection 1. For the head imparts sense and motion to the members. Now spiritual sense and motion which are by grace, are not imparted to us by the Man Christ, because, as Augustine says (De Trin. xv, 26),² not even Christ, as man, but only as God, bestows the Holy Ghost. Therefore it does not belong to Him as man to be Head of the Church.

Obj. 2. Further, it is not fitting for the head to have a head. But God is the Head of Christ, as man, according to I Cor. 11. 3. The Head of Christ is God. Therefore Christ Himself is not a head.

Obj. 3. Furthermore, the head of a man is a particular member, receiving an influx from the heart. But Christ is the universal principle of the whole Church. Therefore He is not the Head of the Church.

On the contrary, It is written (Eph. 1. 22): And He . . . hath made Him head over all the Church.

² PL 42, 1093.

I answer that, As the whole Church is termed one mystic body from its likeness to the natural body of a man, which in various members has various acts, as the Apostle teaches (Rom. 12.4; I Cor. 12.12), so likewise Christ is called the Head of the Church from a likeness with the human head, in which we may consider three things, namely, order, perfection, and power. Order, because the head is the first part of man, beginning from the higher part; and hence it is that every principle is usually called a head according to Ezech. 16. 24: At every head of the way, thou hast set up a sign of thy prostitution. Perfection, because in the head dwell all the senses, both interior and exterior, whereas in the other members there is only touch, and hence it is said (Isa. 9. 15): The aged and honourable, he is the head. Power, because the power and movement of the other members, together with the direction of them in their acts, is from the head, by reason of the sensitive and moving power there ruling; hence the ruler is called the head of a people according to I Kings 15. 17: When thou wast a little one in thy own eyes, wast thou not made the head of the tribes of Israel?

Now these three things belong spiritually to Christ.

First, on account of His nearness to God His grace is the highest and first, though not in time, since all have received grace on account of His grace, according to Rom. 8. 29: For whom He foreknew, He also predestinated to be made conformable to the image of His Son; that He might be the first-born amongst many brethren. Secondly, He had perfection as regards the fulness of all graces, according to John 1. 14, We saw Him (Vulg., His glory) . . . full of grace and truth, as was shown, Q VII, A. 9. Thirdly, He has the power of bestowing grace on all the members of the Church, according to John 1. 16: Of His fulness we have all received. And thus it is plain that Christ is fittingly called the Head of the Church.

Reply Obj. 1. To give grace or the Holy Ghost belongs to Christ as He is God, as originator; but instrumentally it belongs also to Him as man, since His manhood is the instrument of His Godhead. And hence by the power of the Godhead His actions were health-bringing to us—that is, by causing grace in us, both meritoriously and efficiently. But Augustine denies that Christ as man gives the Holy Ghost as originator. Even other saints are said to give the Holy Ghost instrumentally, or ministerially, according to Gal 3. 5: He . . . who giveth to you the Spirit, etc.

Reply Obj. 2. In metaphorical speech we must not expect a likeness in all respects, for thus there would be not likeness but identity. Accordingly a natural head has not another head because one human body is not part of another; but a metaphorical body—that is, an ordered multitude—is part of another multitude as the domestic multitude is part of the civil multitude; and hence the father who is head of the domestic multitude has a head above him—that is, the civil governor. And so there is no reason why God should not be the Head of Christ, although Christ Himself is Head of the Church.

Reply Obj. 3. The head has a manifest pre-eminence over the other exterior members, but the heart has a certain hidden influence. And hence the Holy Ghost is likened to the heart, since He invisibly quickens and unifies the Church; but Christ is likened to the Head in His visible nature in which man is set over man.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Christ Is the Head of Men As to Their Bodies or Only As to Their Souls?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that Christ is not the Head of men as to their bodies.

Objection 1. For Christ is said to be the Head of the Church in so far as He bestows spiritual sense and the movement of grace on the Church. But a body is not capable of this spiritual sense and movement. Therefore Christ is not the Head of men as regards their bodies.

Obj. 2. Further, we share bodies with the brutes. If therefore Christ was the Head of men as to their bodies, it would follow that He was the Head of brute animals, and this is not fitting.

Obj. 3. Further, Christ took His body from other men, as is clear from Matt. 1.1 and Luke 3.23. But the head is the first of the members, as was said above (A. 1). Therefore Christ is not the Head of the Church as regards bodies.

On the contrary, It is written (Phil. 3. 21): Who will reform the body of our lowliness, made like to the body of His glory.

I answer that, The human body has a natural relation to the rational soul, which is its proper form and mover. And in so far as the soul is its form, it receives from the soul life and the other properties which belong to the human body according to its species; but in so far as the soul is its mover, the body serves the soul instrumentally. Therefore we must hold that the manhood of Christ had the power of influence, because it is united to the Word of God, to Whom His body is united through the soul, as stated above (Q. VI, A. 1). Hence the whole manhood of Christ—that is, according to soul and body—influences all, both in soul and body; but principally the soul, and secondarily the body. First, in so far as the members of the body are presented as instruments of justice in the soul that lives through Christ, as the Apostle says (Rom. 6. 13). Secondly, in so far as the life of glory flows from the soul on to the body, according to Rom. 8. 11: He that raised up Jesus from the dead shall quicken also your mortal bodies, because of His Spirit that dwelleth in you.

Reply Obj. 1. The spiritual sense of grace does not reach to the body first and principally, but secondarily and instrumentally, as was said above.

Reply Obj. 2. The body of an animal has no relation to a rational soul, as the human body has. Hence there is no parity.

Reply Obj. 3. Although Christ drew the matter of His body from other men, yet all draw from Him the immortal life of their body, according to I Cor. 15. 22: And as in Adam all die, so also in Christ all shall be made alive.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Christ Is the Head of All Men?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that Christ is not the Head of all men.

Objection 1. For the head has no relation except to the members of its body. Now the unbelievers are in no way members of the Church which is the body of Christ, as it is written (Eph. 1. 23). Therefore Christ is not the Head of all men.

Obj. 2. Further, the Apostle writes to the Ephesians (5. 25, 27): Christ delivered Himself up for the Church that He might present it to Himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing. But there are many of the faithful in whom is found the spot or the wrinkle of sin. Therefore Christ is not the Head of all the faithful.

Obj. 3. Further, the sacraments of the Old Law are compared to Christ as the shadow to the body, as is written (Col. 2. 17). But the fathers of the Old Testament in their day served unto these sacraments, according to Heb. 8. 5: Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things. Hence they did not pertain to Christ's body, and therefore Christ is not the Head of all men.

On the contrary, It is written (I Tim 4. 10): Who is the Saviour of all men, especially of the faithful, and (I John 2. 2): He is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for those of the whole world. Now to save men and to be a propitiation for their sins belongs to Christ as Head. Therefore Christ is the Head of all men.

I answer that, This is the difference between the natural body of man and the Church's mystical body, that the members of the natural body are all together and the members of the mystical are not all together; neither as regards the being of nature, since the body of the Church is made up of the men who have been from the beginning of the world until its end; nor as regards the being of grace, since, of those who are at any one time, some there are who are without grace, yet will afterwards obtain it, and some have it already. We must therefore consider the members of the mystical body not only as they are in act, but as they are in potency. Nevertheless, some are in potency who will never be reduced to act, and some are reduced at some time to act; and this according to three degrees, of which the first is by faith, the second by the charity of this life, the third by the fruition of the life to come.

Hence we must say that if we take the whole time of the world in general, Christ is the Head of all men, but according to different degrees. For, first and principally, He is the Head of such as are actually united to Him by glory; secondly, of those who are actually united to Him by charity; thirdly, of those who are actually united to Him by faith; fourthly, of those who are united to Him merely in potency, which is not yet reduced to act, yet will be reduced to act according to Divine predestination; fifthly, of those who are united to Him in potency, which will never be reduced to act; such are those men existing in the world who are not predestined, who, however, on their departure from this world, wholly cease to be members of Christ, as being no longer in potency to be united to Christ.

Reply Obj. 1. Those who are unbelievers, though not actually in the Church, are in the Church potentially. And this potentiality is rooted in two things—first and principally, in the power of Christ, which is sufficient for the salvation of the whole human race; secondly, in the liberty of choice.

Reply Obj. 2. To be a glorious Church not having spot or wrinkle is the ultimate end to which we are brought by the Passion of Christ.

Hence this will be in heaven, and not on earth, in which if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, as is written (I John 1. 8). Nevertheless, there are some—namely, mortal—sins from which they are free who are members of Christ by the actual union of charity; but such as are tainted with these sins are not members of Christ actually, but potentially; except, perhaps, imperfectly, by formless faith, which unites to God relatively but not absolutely—namely, so that through Christ man partakes of the life of grace. For, as is written (Jas. 2. 20): Faith without works is dead. Yet such as these receive from Christ a certain vital act—that is, to believe—as if a lifeless limb were moved by a man to some extent.

Reply Obj. 3. The holy Fathers made use of the sacraments of the Law not as realities, but as images and shadows of what was to come. Now it is the same motion to an image as image, and to the reality, as is clear from the Philosopher.¹ Hence the ancient Fathers, by observing the sacraments of the Law, were borne to Christ by the same faith and love whereby we also are borne to Him, and hence the ancient Fathers belong to the same body of the Church as we.

ARTICLE 4. Whether Christ Is the Head of the Angels?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that Christ as man is not the head of the angels.

Objection 1. For the head and members are of one nature. But Christ as man is not of the same nature with the angels, but only with men, since, as is written (Heb. 2. 16): For nowhere doth He take hold of the angels; but of the seed of Abraham He taketh hold. Therefore Christ as man is not the head of the angels.

Obj. 2. Further, Christ is the head of such as belong to the Church, which is His Body, as is written (Eph. 1. 23). But the angels do not belong to the Church. For the Church is the congregation of the faithful, and in the angels there is no faith, for they do not walk by faith but by sight, otherwise they would be absent from the Lord, as the Apostle argues (II Cor. 5. 6). Therefore Christ as man is not head of the angels.

Obj. 3. Further, Augustine says (Tract. xix and xxiii in Joann.),² that as the Word which was in the beginning with the Father quickens souls, so the Word made flesh quickens bodies, which angels lack. But the Word made flesh is Christ as man. Therefore Christ as man does not give life to angels, and hence as man He is not the head of the angels.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (Col. 2. 10), Who is the head of all Principality and Power, and the same reason holds good with the other orders of angels. Therefore Christ is the Head of the angels.

I answer that, As was said above (A. 1, reply 2), where there is one body we must allow that there is one head. Now a multitude ordered to one end, with distinct acts and duties, may be metaphorically called one body. But it is manifest that both men and angels are ordered to one end, which is the glory of the enjoyment of God. Hence the mystical body of the Church consists not only of men but of angels. Now of all this multitude Christ is the Head, since He is nearer God, and shares His gifts more fully, not only than man, but even than angels; and of His influence not only men but even angels partake, since it is written (Eph. 1. 20-22): that God the Father set Him, namely Christ, on His right hand in the heavenly places, above all Principality and Power and Virtue and Dominion and every name that is named not only in this world, but also in that which is to come. And He hath subjected all things under His feet. Therefore Christ is not only the Head of men, but of angels. Hence we read (Matt. 4. 11) that angels came and ministered to Him.

Reply Obj. 1. Christ's influence over all men is chiefly with regard to their souls, wherein men agree with angels in generic nature, though not in specific nature. By reason of this agreement Christ can be said to be the Head of the angels, although the agreement falls short as regards the body.

Reply Obj. 2. The Church, on earth, is the congregation of the faithful; but, in heaven it is the congregation of comprehensors. Now Christ was not merely a wayfarer, but a comprehensor. And therefore He is the Head not merely of the faithful, but of comprehensors, as having grace and glory most fully.

Reply Obj. 3. Augustine here uses the similitude of cause and effect—according as, namely, corporeal things act on bodies, and spiritual things on spiritual things. Nevertheless, the humanity of Christ, by virtue of the spiritual nature—that is, the Divine—can cause something not only in the spirits of men, but also in the spirits of angels, on account of its most close conjunction with God—that is, by personal union.

ARTICLE 5. Whether the Grace of Christ, As Head of the Church, Is the Same As His Habitual Grace, According As He Is Man?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that the grace whereby Christ is Head of the Church and the individual grace of the Man are not the same.

Objection 1. For the Apostle says (Rom. 5. 15): If by the offence of one many died, much more the grace of God and the gift, by the grace of one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many. But the actual sin of Adam is distinct from original sin which he transmitted to his posterity. Hence the personal grace which is proper to Christ Himself is distinct from His grace according as He is the Head of the Church, which flows to others from Him.

Obj. 2. Further, habits are distinguished according to acts. But the personal grace of Christ is ordered to one act—namely, the sanctification of His soul; and the grace as head is ordered to another—namely, to sanctifying others. Therefore the personal grace of Christ is distinct from His grace as He is the Head of the Church.

Obj. 3. Further, as was said above (Q. VII, introd.), in Christ we distinguish a threefold grace—namely, the grace of union, the grace as head, and the individual grace of the Man. Now the individual grace of Christ is distinct from the grace of union. Therefore it is also distinct from the grace as head.

On the contrary, It is written (John 1. 16): Of His fulness we all have received. Now He is our Head because we receive from Him. Therefore He is our Head because He has the fulness of grace. Now He had the fulness of grace because personal grace was in Him in its perfection, as was said above (Q. VII, A. 9). Therefore He is our head according to personal grace. Hence His grace as head and personal grace are not distinct.

I answer that, Since everything acts in so far as it is a being in act, it must be the same act whereby it is in act and whereby it acts, just as it is the same heat whereby fire is hot and whereby it heats. Yet not every act whereby anything is in act suffices for its being the principle of acting upon others. For since "the agent is nobler than the patient," as Augustine says (Gen. ad. lit. xii, 16)¹ and the Philosopher,² the agent must act on others by reason of a certain pre-eminence. Now it was said above (Q. VII, AA. 9, 10), grace was received by the soul of Christ in the highest way; and therefore from this pre-eminence of grace which He received, it is from Him that this grace is bestowed on others,—and this belongs to the nature of head. Hence the personal grace whereby the soul of Christ is justified is essentially the same as His grace as He is the Head of the Church, and justifies others; but there is a distinction of reason between them.

Reply Obj. 1. Original sin in Adam, which is a sin of the nature, is derived from his actual sin, which is a personal sin, because in him the person corrupted the nature; and by means of this corruption the sin of the first man is transmitted to posterity, according as the corrupt nature corrupts the person. Now grace is not vouchsafed to us by Christ by means of human nature, but solely by the personal action of Christ Himself. Hence we must not distinguish a two-fold grace in Christ, one corresponding to the nature, the other to the person, as in Adam we distinguish the sin of the nature and of the person.

Reply Obj. 2. Different acts, one of which is the reason and the cause of the other, do not diversify a habit. Now the act of the personal grace which is formally to sanctify its subject, is the reason of the justification of others, which pertains to the grace of the head. Hence it is that the essence of the habit is not diversified by this difference.

Reply Obj. 3. Personal grace and grace of the head are ordered to an act; but the grace of union is not ordered to an act, but to the personal being. Hence the personal grace and the grace of the head agree in the essence of the habit; but the grace of union does not, although the personal grace can be called in a manner the grace of union, since it brings about a fitness for the union; and thus the grace of union, the grace of the head, and the personal grace are one in essence, though there is a distinction of reason between them.

ARTICLE 6. Whether It Is Proper to Christ To Be Head of the Church?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It seems that it is not proper to Christ to be Head of the Church.

Objection 1. For it is written (I Kings 15. 17): When thou wast a little one in thy own eyes, wast thou not made the head of the tribes of Israel? Now there is but one Church in the New and the Old Testament. Therefore it seems that with equal reason any other man than Christ might be head of the Church.

² Soul, III, 5 (430^a18).

Obj. 2. Further, Christ is called Head of the Church from His bestowing grace on the Church's members. But it belongs to others also to grant grace to others, according to Eph. 4. 29: Let no evil speech proceed from your mouth; but that which is good to the edification of faith, that it may administer grace to the hearers. Therefore it seems to belong also to others than Christ to be head of the Church.

Obj. 3. Further, Christ by His ruling over the Church is not only called Head, but also Shepherd and Foundation. Now Christ did not retain for Himself alone the name of Shepherd, according to I Pet. 5. 4, And when the prince of pastors shall appear, you shall receive a never-fading crown of glory; nor the name of Foundation, according to Apoc. 21. 14: And the wall of the city had twelve foundations. Therefore it seems that He did not retain the name of Head for Himself alone.

On the contrary, It is written (Col. 2. 19): The head of the Church is that from which the whole body, by joints and bands being supplied with nourishment as it is compacted, groweth unto the increase of God. But this belongs only to Christ. Therefore Christ alone is Head of the Church.

I answer that, The head influences the other members in two ways. First, by a certain intrinsic influence, according as moving and sensitive power flow from the head to the other members; secondly, by a certain exterior governance, according as by sight and the senses, which are rooted in the head, man is guided in his exterior acts.

Now the interior inflowing of grace is from no one save Christ, Whose manhood, through its union with the Godhead, has the power of justifying; but the influence over the members of the Church, as regards their exterior governance, can belong to others. And in this way others may be called heads of the Church, according to Amos 6. 1, Ye great men, heads of the people, differently, however, from Christ. First, because Christ is the Head of all who pertain to the Church in every place and time and state, but all other men are called heads with reference to certain special places, as bishops of their Churches, or with reference to a determined time, as the Pope is the head of the whole Church—namely, during the time of his Pontificate—and with reference to a determined state, according as they are in the state of wayfarers. Secondly, because Christ is the Head of the Church by His own power and authority, while others are called heads, in so far as they rule in the place of Christ, according to II Cor. 2. 10, For what I have pardoned, if I have pardoned anything, for your sakes I have done it in the person of Christ, and 5. 20. For Christ therefore we are ambassadors, God, as it were, exhorting by us.

Reply Obj. 1. The word head is employed in that passage in regard to exterior government, just as a king is said to be the head of his kingdom.

Reply Obj. 2. Man does not distribute grace by an inward inflowing, but by exteriorly persuading to the effects of grace.

Reply Obj. 3. As Augustine says (Tract. xlii in Joann.):¹ "If the rulers of the Church are Shepherds, how is there one Shepherd, except that all these are members of one Shepherd?" So likewise others may be called foundations and heads, according as they are members of the one Head and Foundation. Nevertheless, as Augustine says (Tract. xlvii),² "He gave to His members to be shepherds; yet none of us calleth himself the Door. He kept this for Himself alone." And this because by door is implied the principal authority, since it is by the door that all enter the house, and it is Christ alone by Whom also we have access . . . into this grace, wherein we stand (Rom. 5. 2); but by the other names above-mentioned there may be implied not merely the principal but also the secondary authority.

ARTICLE 7. Whether the Devil Is the Head of All the Wicked?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It would seem that the devil is not the head of the wicked.

Objection 1. For it belongs to the head to diffuse sense and movement into the members, as a gloss says,³ on Eph. 1. 22, And made Him head, etc. But the devil has no power of insinuating the evil of sin, which proceeds from the will of the sinner. Therefore the devil cannot be called the head of the wicked.

Obj. 2. Further, by every sin a man is made evil. But not every sin is from the devil; and this is plain as regards the sins of the demons, who did not sin through the persuasion of another; so likewise not every sin of man proceeds from the devil, for it is said (De Eccles. Dogm. lxxxii):⁴ "Not all our wicked thoughts are always raised up by the suggestion of the devil, but sometimes they spring from the movement of our choice." Therefore the devil is not the head of all the wicked.

Obj. 3. Further, one head is placed on one body. But the whole multitude of the wicked do not seem to have anything in which they are united, for evil is contrary to evil and it springs also from divers defects, as Dionysius says (Div. Nom. iv).¹ Therefore the devil cannot be called the head of all the wicked.

On the contrary, A gloss² on Job 18. 17, Let the memory of him perish from the earth, says: "This is said of every evil one, yet so as to be referred to the head—that is, the devil."

I answer that, As was said above (A. 8), the head not only influences the members interiorly, but also governs them exteriorly, directing their actions to an end. Hence it may be said that anyone is the head of a multitude, either as regards both—that is, by interior influence and exterior governance—and thus Christ is the Head of the Church, as was stated (A. 8); or as regards exterior governance, and thus every prince or prelate is head of the multitude subject to him. And in this way the devil is called the head of all the wicked. For, as is written (Job. 41. 25): He is king over all the children of pride.

Now it belongs to a governor to lead those whom he governs to their end. But the end of the devil is the turning aside of the rational creature from God; hence from the beginning he has endeavoured to lead man from obeying the Divine precept. But this turning aside from God has the nature of an end, since it is sought for under the appearance of liberty, according to Jer. 2. 20: Of old time thou hast broken my yoke, thou hast burst my bands, and thou saidst, "I will not serve." Hence, in so far as some are brought to this end by sinning, they fall under the rule and government of the devil, and therefore he is called their head.

Reply Obj. 1. Although the devil does not influence the rational mind interiorly, yet he leads it to evil by persuasion.

Reply Obj. 2. A governor does not always suggest to individuals to obey his will, but proposes to all the sign of his will, in consequence of which some are incited by persuasion, and some of their own accord, as is plain in the leader of an army, whose standard all the soldiers follow, though no one persuades them. Therefore in the same way, the first sin of the devil, who sinneth from the beginning (I John 3. 8), is held out to all to be followed, and some imitate at his suggestion, and some of their own accord without any suggestion. And hence the devil is the head of all the wicked, inasmuch as they imitate him, according to Wisd. 2. 24, 25: By the envy of the devil, death came into the world. And they follow him that are of his side.

Reply Obj. 3. All sins agree in the turning aside from God, although they differ by turning to different changeable goods.

ARTICLE 8. Whether Antichrist May Be Called the Head of All the Wicked?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It would seem that Antichrist is not the head of the wicked.

Objection 1. For there are not several heads of one body. But the devil is the head of the multitude of the wicked. Therefore Antichrist is not their head.

Obj. 2. Further, Antichrist is a member of the devil. Now the head is distinguished from the members. Therefore Antichrist is not the head of the wicked.

Obj. 3. Further, the head has an influence over the members. But Antichrist has no influence over the wicked who have preceded him. Therefore Antichrist is not the head of the wicked.

On the contrary, A gloss³ on Job 21. 29, Ask any of them that go by the way, says: "Whilst he was speaking of the body of all the wicked, suddenly he turned his speech to Antichrist the head of all evil-doers."

I answer that, As was said above (A. 1), in the head are found naturally three things: order, perfection, and the power of influencing. But as regards the order of time, Antichrist is not said to be the head of the wicked as if his sin had preceded, as the sin of the devil preceded. So likewise he is not called the head of the wicked from the power of influencing, although he will pervert some in his day by exterior persuasion; nevertheless those who were before him were not led into wickedness by him nor have imitated his wickedness. Hence he cannot be called the head of all the wicked in this way, but of some. Therefore it remains to be said that he is the head of all the wicked by reason of the perfection of his wickedness. Hence, on II Thess. 2. 4, Showing himself as if he were God, a gloss says:⁴ "As in Christ dwelt the fulness of the Godhead, so in Antichrist the fulness of all wickedness." Not indeed as if his humanity were assumed by the devil into unity of person, as the humanity of Christ by the Son of God, but that the devil by suggestion infuses his wickedness more copiously into him than into all others. And in this way all the wicked who have gone before are signs of Antichrist, according to II Thess. 2. 7, For the mystery of iniquity already worketh.

Reply Obj. 1. The devil and Antichrist are not two heads, but one, since Antichrist is called the head because as the wickedness of the devil is most fully impressed on him. Hence, on II Thess. 2. 4, Showing himself as if he were God, a gloss says:¹ "The head of all the wicked, namely the devil, who is king over all the children of pride will be in him." Now he is said to be in him not by personal union, nor by indwelling, since "the Trinity alone dwells in the mind" (as is said De Eccles. Dogm. lxxxiii),² but by the effect of wickedness.

Reply Obj. 2. As the head of Christ is God, and yet He is the Head of the Church, as was said above (A. 1. R^{sp} v 2), so likewise Antichrist is a member of the devil and yet is head of the wicked.

Reply Obj. 3. Antichrist is said to be the head of all the wicked not by a likeness of influence, but by a likeness of perfection. For in him the devil, as it were, brings his wickedness to a head, in the same way that anyone is said to bring his purpose to a head when he executes it.

QUESTION IX

OF CHRIST'S KNOWLEDGE IN GENERAL (In Four Articles)

WE must now consider Christ's knowledge, concerning which the consideration will be twofold. First, of Christ's knowledge in general; secondly, of each particular kind of knowledge He had (Q. x).

Under the first head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether Christ had any knowledge besides the Divine? (2) Whether He had the knowledge which the blessed or comprehensors have? (3) Whether He had an imprinted or infused knowledge? (4) Whether He had any acquired knowledge?

ARTICLE 1 Whether Christ Had Any Knowledge Besides the Divine?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that in Christ there was no knowledge except the Divine.

² Gennadius (PL 58, 999).

Objection 1. For knowledge is necessary that things may be known thereby. But by His Divine knowledge Christ knew all things. Therefore any other knowledge would have been superfluous in Him.

Obj. 2. Further, the lesser light is dimmed by the greater. But all created knowledge in comparison with the uncreated knowledge of God is as the lesser to the greater light. Therefore there shone in Christ no other knowledge except the Divine.

Obj. 3. Further, the union of the human nature with the Divine took place in the Person, as is clear from Q. 11, A. 2. Now, according to some³ there is in Christ a certain knowledge of the union, whereby Christ knew what belongs to the mystery of the Incarnation more fully than anyone else. Hence, since the personal union contains two natures, it would seem that there are not two knowledges in Christ, but one only, pertaining to both natures.

On the contrary, Ambrose says (De Incarnat. vii):⁴ "God assumed the perfection of human nature in the flesh; He took upon Himself the sense of man, but not the swollen sense of the flesh." But created knowledge pertains to the sense of man. Therefore in Christ there was created knowledge.

I answer that, As said above (Q. v), the Son of God assumed an entire human nature—that is, not only a body, but also a soul, and not only a sensitive, but also a rational soul. And therefore He had to have created knowledge, for three reasons. First, on account of the soul's perfection. For the soul, considered in itself, is in potency to knowing intelligible things, since it is like a tablet on which nothing is written, and yet it may be written upon through the possible intellect, whereby it may become all things, as is said in the book on the Soul.⁵ Now what is in potency is imperfect unless reduced to act. But it was fitting that the Son of God should assume not an imperfect, but a perfect human nature, since the whole human race was to be brought back to perfection by its means. Hence the soul of Christ had to be perfected by a knowledge which would be its proper perfection. And therefore it was necessary that there should be another knowledge in Christ besides the Divine knowledge, otherwise the soul of Christ would have been more imperfect than the souls of the rest of men.

³ Alexander of Hales, Summa Theol., pt. 111, Q. 13, m. 2 (111, 42rb); cf. m. 5 (111, 43rb). Cf. Pergamo, Studi Francescani (1932) pp. 120–163.

⁵ Aristotle, 111, 4 (430^a1).

Secondly, because, since "everything is on account of its operation," as stated in the book on the Heavens.¹ Christ would have had an intellectual soul to no purpose if He had not understood by it; and this pertains to created knowledge.

Thirdly, because some created knowledge pertains to the nature of the human soul—namely, that whereby we naturally know first principles; since we are here taking knowledge in the wide sense of any cognition of the human intellect. Now nothing natural was wanting to Christ, since He took the whole human nature, as stated above (Q. v). And hence the Sixth Council² condemned the opinion of those who denied that in Christ there are two knowledges or two wisdoms.

Reply Obj. 1. Christ knew all things with the Divine knowledge by an uncreated operation which is the very Essence of God, since God's understanding is His substance, as the Philosopher proves.³ Hence this act could not belong to the human soul of Christ, seeing that it belongs to another nature. Therefore, if there had been no knowledge in the soul of Christ other than the divine it would have known nothing; and thus it would have been assumed to no purpose, since everything is on account of its operation.

Reply Obj. 2. If the two lights are supposed to be in the same order, the lesser is dimmed by the greater, as the light of the sun dims the light of a candle, both being in the class of things giving light. But if we suppose two lights, one of which is in the class of things giving light and the other in the class of things receiving light, the lesser light is not dimmed by the greater, but rather is strengthened, as the light of the air by the light of the sun. And in this manner the light of knowledge is not dimmed, but rather is heightened in the soul of Christ by the light of the Divine knowledge, which is the true light which enlighteneth every man that cometh into this world, as is written John 1. 9.

Reply Obj. 3. On the part of what are united we hold there is a knowledge in Christ, both as to His Divine and as to His human nature, so that, by reason of the union whereby there is one hypostasis of God and man, the things of God are attributed to man, and the things of man are attributed to God, as was said above (Q. III AA. 1 and 6). But on the part of the union itself we cannot admit any knowledge in Christ. For this union is in personal being, and knowledge belongs to a person only by reason of a nature.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Christ Had the Knowledge Which the Blessed or Comprehensors Have?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that in Christ there was not the knowledge of the blessed or comprehensors.

Objection 1. For the knowledge of the blessed is a participation of Divine light, according to Ps. 35. 10: In Thy light we shall see light. Now Christ had not the divine light as a participated light, but He had the Godhead Itself substantially abiding in Him, according to Col. 2. 9: For in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead corporeally. Therefore in Christ there was not the knowledge of the blessed.

Obj. 2. Further, the knowledge of the blessed makes them blessed, according to John 17. 3: This is eternal life: that they may know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ Whom Thou hast sent. But this Man was blessed through being united to God in person, according to Ps. 64. 5: Blessed is He Whom Thou hast chosen and taken to Thee. Therefore it is not necessary to suppose the knowledge of the blessed in Him.

Obj. 3. Further, to man belongs a double knowledge—one by nature, one above nature. Now the knowledge of the blessed, which consists in the vision of God, is not natural to man, but above his nature. But in Christ there was another and much higher supernatural knowledge—that is, the Divine knowledge. Therefore there was no need of the knowledge of the blessed in Christ.

On the contrary, The knowledge of the blessed consists in the knowledge of God. But He knew God fully, even as He was man, according to John 8. 55: I do know Him, and do keep His word. Therefore in Christ there was the knowledge of the blessed.

I answer that, What is in potency is reduced to act by what is in act, for that whereby things are heated must itself be hot. Now man is in potency to the knowledge of the blessed, which consists in the vision of God, and is ordered to it as to an end; for man as a rational creature is capable of that blessed knowledge, since he is made in the image of God. Now men are brought to this end of Happiness by the humanity of Christ, according to Heb. 2. 10: For it became Him, for Whom are all things, and by Whom are all things, Who had brought many children unto glory, to perfect the author of their salvation by His passion. And hence it was necessary that the beatific knowledge, which consists in the vision of God, should belong to the man Christ in a most perfect manner, since the cause ought always to be more powerful than the thing caused.

Reply Obj. 1. The Godhead is united to the manhood of Christ in Person, not in essence or nature; yet with the unity of Person remains the distinction of natures. And therefore the soul of Christ, which is a part of human nature, through a light participated from the Divine Nature, is perfected with the beatific knowledge whereby it sees God in essence.

Reply Obj. 2. By the union this Man is blessed with the uncreated Happiness, even as by the union He is God; yet besides the uncreated Happiness it was necessary that there should be in the human nature of Christ a created Happiness, whereby His soul was established in the last end of human nature.

Reply Obj. 3. The beatific vision or knowledge is to some extent above the nature of the rational soul, since it cannot reach it of its own power; but in another way it is in accordance with its nature, since it is capable of it by nature, having been made to the likeness of God, as stated above. But the uncreated knowledge is in every way above the nature of the human soul.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Christ Had an Imprinted or Infused Knowledge?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that there was not in Christ another infused or imprinted knowledge besides the beatific knowledge.

Objection 1. For all other knowledge compared to the beatific knowledge is like imperfect to perfect. But imperfect knowledge is removed by the presence of perfect knowledge, as the clear face-to-face vision removes the enigmatical vision of faith, as is plain from I Cor. 13. 10, 12. Since, therefore, in Christ there was the beatific knowledge, as stated above (A. 2), it would seem that there could not be any other imprinted knowledge.

Obj. 2. Further, an imperfect mode of knowledge disposes towards a more perfect, as opinion, the result of dialectical syllogisms, disposes towards science, which results from demonstrative syllogisms. Now, when perfection is reached, there is no further need of the disposition, even as on reaching the end motion is no longer necessary. Hence, since every created knowledge is compared to beatific knowledge as imperfect to perfect and as disposition to its term, it seems that since Christ had beatific knowledge, it was not necessary for Him to have any other knowledge.

Obj. 3. Further, as corporeal matter is in potency to the sensible form, so the possible intellect is in potency to the intelligible form. Now corporeal matter cannot receive two sensible forms at once, one more perfect and the other less perfect. Therefore neither can the soul receive a double knowledge at once, one more perfect and the other less perfect. And hence the same conclusion as above.

On the contrary, It is written (Col. 2. 3) that in Christ are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1), it was fitting that the human nature assumed by the Word of God should not be imperfect. Now everything in potency is imperfect unless it be reduced to act. But the possible intellect of man is in potency to all intelligible things, and it is reduced to act by intelligible species, which are its completing forms, as is plain from what is said in the treatise on the Soul.¹ And hence we must admit in Christ an infused knowledge, inasmuch as through the Word of God there is imprinted upon the soul of Christ, which is personally united to Him, the intelligible species of all things to which the possible intellect is in potency; even as in the beginning of the creation of things, the Word of God imprinted intelligible species upon the minds of the angels, as is clear from Augustine (Gen. ad lit. ii, 8).² And therefore, even as in the angels, according to Augustine,³ there is a double knowledge—one the “morning” knowledge, whereby they know things in the Word, the other the “evening” knowledge, whereby they know things in their proper natures by infused species, so likewise, besides the Divine uncreated knowledge in Christ, there is in His soul a beatific knowledge, whereby He knows the Word, and things in the Word; and an infused or imprinted knowledge, whereby He knows things in their proper nature by intelligible species proportioned to the human mind.

Reply Obj. 1. The imperfect vision of faith of its very nature is opposed to manifest vision, seeing that it is of the essence of faith to have reference to the unseen, as was said above (Part II-II, Q. 1, A. 4). But knowledge by infused species includes no opposition to beatific knowledge. Therefore there is no parity.

Reply Obj. 2. Disposition is referred to perfection in two ways: first, as a way leading to perfection, secondly, as an effect proceeding from perfection; thus matter is disposed by heat to receive the form of fire, and, when this comes, the heat does not cease, but remains as an effect of this form. So, too, opinion caused by a dialectical syllogism is a way to science, which is acquired by demonstration; yet, when this has been acquired, there may still remain the knowledge gained by the dialectical syllogism, following, so to say, the demonstrative knowledge, which is through the cause, since he who knows the cause is thereby enabled the better to understand the probable signs from which dialectical syllogisms proceed. So likewise in Christ, together with the beatific knowledge there still remains infused knowledge, not as a way to Happiness, but as strengthened by Happiness.

Reply Obj. 3. The beatific knowledge is not by a species, that is a likeness of the Divine Essence, or of whatever is known in the Divine Essence, as is plain from what has been said in the First Part (Q. XII, AA. 2, 9); but it is a knowledge of the Divine Essence immediately, because the Divine Essence itself is united to the mind of the blessed as an intelligible to an intelligent being; and the Divine Essence is a form exceeding the capacity of any creature whatsoever. Hence, together with this super-exceeding form, there is nothing to hinder from being in the rational mind, intelligible species, proportioned to its nature. , ARTICLE 4. Whether Christ Had Any Acquired Knowledge?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that in Christ there was no acquired experimental knowledge (scientia).

Objection 1. For whatever befitted Christ, He had most perfectly. Now Christ did not possess acquired knowledge most perfectly, since He did not devote Himself to the study of letters, by which knowledge is acquired in its perfection; for it is said (John 7. 15): The Jews wondered, saying: How doth this Man know letters, having never learned? Therefore it seems that in Christ there was no acquired knowledge.

Obj. 2. Further, Nothing can be added to what is full. But the power of Christ's soul was filled with intelligible species divinely infused, as was said above (A. 3). Therefore no acquired species could accrue to His soul.

Obj. 3. Further, he who already has the habit of knowledge acquires no new habit through what he receives from the senses (otherwise two forms of the same species would be in the same thing at the same time), but the habit which previously existed is strengthened and increased. Therefore, since Christ had the habit of infused knowledge, it does not seem that He acquired a new knowledge through what He perceived by the senses.

On the contrary, It is written (Heb. 5. 8): Whereas . . . He was the Son of God, He learned obedience by the things which He suffered—that is, "experienced," says a gloss.¹ Therefore there was in the soul of Christ an experimental knowledge, which is acquired knowledge.

I answer that, As is plain from what was said above (Q. IV, A. 2, arg. 2; Q. V), nothing that God planted in our nature was wanting to the human nature assumed by the Word of God. Now it is manifest that God planted in human nature not only a possible, but an agent intellect. Hence it is necessary to say that in the soul of Christ there was not merely a possible, but also an agent intellect. But if in other things God and nature make nothing in vain, as the Philosopher says,² still less in the soul of Christ is there anything in vain. Now what has not its proper operation is useless, "since everything exists for the sake of its operation," as is said in the book on the Heavens.³ Now the proper operation of the agent intellect is to make intelligible species in act, by abstracting them from phantasms; hence, it is said⁴ that the agent intellect is that by which "everything is made actual." And thus it is necessary to say that in Christ there were intelligible species received in the possible intellect by the action of the agent intellect, which means that there was acquired knowledge in Him, which some call experimental.⁵

And hence, although elsewhere I wrote differently (III, Sent. d. xiv, A. 3; d. xviii, A. 3), it must be said that in Christ there was acquired knowledge, which is properly knowledge in a human manner, both as regards the subject receiving and as regards the active cause. For such knowledge is in Christ according to the light of the agent intellect, which is natural to the human soul. But infused knowledge is attributed to the soul on account of a light infused from on high, and this manner of knowing is proportioned to the angelic nature. But the beatific knowledge, whereby the very Essence of God is seen, is proper and natural to God alone, as was said in the First Part (Q. XII, A. 4).

Reply Obj. 1. Since there is a twofold way of acquiring knowledge—by discovery and by being taught—the way of discovery is the higher, and the way of being taught is secondary. Hence it is said:¹ “He indeed is the best who knows everything by himself; yet on the other hand he is good who obeys him that speaks rightly.” And hence it was more fitting for Christ to possess a knowledge acquired by discovery than by being taught, especially since He was given to be the Teacher of all, according to Joel 2. 23: Be joyful in the Lord your God, because He hath given you a Teacher of justice.

Reply Obj. 2. The human mind has two relations. One is to higher things, and in this respect the soul of Christ was full through infused knowledge. The other relation is to lower things—that is, to phantasms, which naturally move the human mind by virtue of the agent intellect. Now it was necessary that even in this respect the soul of Christ should be filled with knowledge, not that the first fulness was insufficient for the human mind in itself, but that it had to be also perfected with regard to phantasms.

Reply Obj. 3. Acquired and infused habits are not to be classed together; for the habit of knowledge is acquired by the relation of the human mind to phantasms, and hence another habit of the same kind cannot be again acquired. But the habit of infused knowledge is of a different nature, as coming down to the soul from on high and not from phantasms. And hence there is no parity between these habits.

QUESTION X

OF THE BEATIFIC KNOWLEDGE OF CHRIST'S SOUL (In Four Articles)

Now we must consider each of the above knowledges. Since, however, we have treated of the Divine knowledge in the First Part (Q. XIV), it now remains to speak of the three others: (1) of the beatific knowledge; (2) of the infused knowledge (Q. XI); (3) of the acquired knowledge (Q. XII).

¹ Aristotle, Ethics, I, 6 (1095^b10).

But, again, because much has been said in the First Part (Q. XII) of the beatific knowledge, which consists in the vision of God, we shall speak here only of such things as belong properly to the soul of Christ.

Under this head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether the soul of Christ comprehended the Word or the Divine Essence? (2) Whether it knew all things in the Word? (3) Whether the soul of Christ knew the infinite in the Word? (4) Whether it saw the Word or the Divine Essence clearer than did any other creature?

ARTICLE 1. Whether the Soul of Christ Comprehended the Word or the Divine Nature?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that the soul of Christ comprehended and comprehends the Word or Divine Essence.

Objection 1. For Isidore says² that the Trinity is known only to Itself and to the Man assumed. Therefore the Man assumed communicates with the Holy Trinity in that knowledge of Itself which is proper to the Holy Trinity. Now this is the knowledge of comprehension. Therefore the soul of Christ comprehends the Divine Essence.

Obj. 2. Further, to be united to God in personal being is greater than to be united by vision. But as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 6),³ “the whole Godhead in one Person is united to the human nature in Christ.” Therefore much more is the whole Divine Nature seen by the soul of Christ, and hence it would seem that the soul of Christ comprehended the Divine Essence.

Obj. 3. Further, what belongs by nature to the Son of God belongs by grace to the Son of Man, as Augustine says (De Trin. i, 13).⁴ But to comprehend the Divine Essence belongs by nature to the Son of God. Therefore it belongs by grace to the Son of Man, and thus it seems that the soul of Christ comprehended the Divine Essence by grace.

On the contrary, Augustine says (qq. lxxxiii, qu. 15):⁵ “Whatsoever comprehends itself is finite to itself.” But the Divine Essence is not finite with respect to the soul of Christ, since It infinitely exceeds it. Therefore the soul of Christ does not comprehend the Word.

I answer that, As is plain from Q. II, AA. 1, 6, the union of the natures in the Person of Christ took place in such a way that the properties of both natures remained unconfused—in such a way, namely, that, “the uncreated remained uncreated, and the created remained within the limits of the creature,” as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 3).¹ Now it is impossible for any creature to comprehend the Divine Essence, as was shown in the First Part (q. xii, A. 7), seeing that the infinite is not comprehended by the finite. And hence it must be said that the soul of Christ in no way comprehends the Divine Essence.

² Sent., Bk. 1, 3 (PL 83, 543).

Reply Obj. 1. The Man assumed is accounted with the Divine Trinity in the knowledge of Itself, not indeed as regards comprehension, but by reason of a certain most excellent knowledge above the rest of creatures.

Reply Obj. 2. Not even in the union by personal being does the human nature comprehend the Word of God or the Divine Nature, for although it was wholly united to the human nature in the one Person of the Son, yet the whole power of the Godhead was not circumscribed by the human nature. Hence Augustine says (Ep. ad Volusian. cxxxvii):² “I would have you know that it is not the Christian doctrine that God was united to flesh in such a manner as to quit or lose the care of the world’s government, neither did He narrow or reduce it when He transferred it to that little body.” So likewise the soul of Christ sees the whole Essence of God, yet does not comprehend it, since it does not see It totally—that is, not as perfectly as it is knowable, as was said in the First Part (q. xii, A. 7).

Reply Obj. 3. This saying of Augustine is to be understood of the grace of union, by reason of which all that is said of the Son of God in His Divine Nature is also said of the Son of Man on account of the identity of suppositum. And in this way it may be said that the Son of Man is a comprehensor of the Divine Essence, not indeed by His soul, but in His Divine Nature; even as we may also say that the Son of Man is the Creator.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the Soul of Christ Knew All Things in the Word?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that the soul of Christ does not know all things in the Word.

Objection 1. For it is written (Mark 13. 32): But of that day or hour no man knoweth, neither the angels in heaven nor the Son, but the Father. Therefore He does not know all things in the Word.

Obj. 2. Further, the more perfectly anyone knows a principle the more he knows in the principle. But God sees His Essence more perfectly than the soul of Christ does. Therefore He knows more in the Word than the soul of Christ. Therefore the soul of Christ does not know all things in the Word.

Obj. 3. Further, the extent of knowledge depends on the number of things knowable. If, therefore, the soul of Christ knew in the Word all that the Word knows, it would follow that the knowledge of the soul of Christ would equal the Divine knowledge—that is, the created would equal the uncreated, which is impossible.

On the contrary, On Apoc. 5. 12, The Lamb that was slain is worthy to receive . . . divinity and wisdom, a gloss says³—that is, “the knowledge of all things.”

I answer that, When it is inquired whether Christ knows all things in the Word, “all things” may be taken in two ways. First, properly, to stand for all that in any way whatsoever is, will be, or was done, said, or thought, by whomsoever and at any time. And in this way it must be said that the soul of Christ knows all things in the Word. For every created intellect knows in the Word, not all things absolutely, but so many more things the more perfectly it sees the Word. Yet no beatified intellect fails to know in the Word whatever pertains to itself. Now to Christ and to His dignity all things to some extent belong, since all things are subject to Him. Moreover, He has been appointed Judge of all by God, because He is the Son of Man, as is said John 5. 27; and therefore the soul of Christ knows in the Word all things existing in whatever time, and the thoughts of men, of which He is the Judge, so that what is said of Him (John 2. 25), For He knew what was in man, can be understood not merely of the Divine knowledge, but also of His soul’s knowledge, which it had in the Word.

Secondly, “all things” may be taken widely, as extending not merely to such things as are in act at some time, but even to such things as are in potency, and never have been nor ever will be reduced to act. Now some of these are in the Divine power alone, and not all of these does the soul of Christ know in the Word. For this would be to comprehend all that God could do, which would be to comprehend the Divine power, and, consequently, the Divine Essence.

• Glossa ordin. (vi, 248E).

² Chap. 2 (PL 33, 517).

For every power is known from the knowledge of all it can do. Some, however, are not only in the power of God, but also in the power of the creature; and all of these the soul of Christ knows in the Word, for it comprehends in the Word the essence of every creature, and, consequently, its power and virtue, and all things that are in the power of the creature.

Reply Obj. 1. Arius and Eunomius¹ understood this saying not of the knowledge of the soul, which they did not hold to be in Christ, as was said above (Q. v, A. 3), but of the Divine knowledge of the Son, Whom they held to be less than the Father as regards knowledge. But this will not stand, since all things were made by the Word of God, as is said in John 1. 3, and, amongst other things, all times were made by Him. Now He is not ignorant of anything that was made by Him.

He is said, therefore, not to know the day and the hour of the Judgment because He does not make it known, since, on being asked by the apostles (Acts 1. 6), He was unwilling to reveal it; and, on the contrary, we read (Gen. 22. 12): Now I know that thou fearest God—that is, Now I have made thee know. But the Father is said to know because He imparted this knowledge to the Son. Hence, by saying but the Father, we are given to understand that the Son knows not merely in the Divine Nature, but also in the human, because, as Chrysostom argues (Hom. lxxviii in Matt.),² if it is given to Christ as man to know how to judge—which is greater—much more it is given to Him to know the less—namely, the time of Judgment.

Origen, however,³ expounds it “of His body, which is the Church, which is ignorant of this time.” Lastly, some say⁴ this is to be understood of the adoptive, and not of the natural Son of God.

Reply Obj. 2. God knows His Essence so much the more perfectly than the soul of Christ that He comprehends it. And hence He knows all things, not merely whatever are in act at any time, which things He is said to know by knowledge of vision, but also whatever He Himself can do, which He is said to know by simple intelligence, as was shown in the First Part (Q. xiv, A. 9). Therefore the soul of Christ knows all things that God knows in Himself by the knowledge of vision, but not all that God knows in Himself by knowledge of simple intelligence; and thus in Himself God knows many more things than the soul of Christ.

Reply Obj. 3. The extent of knowledge depends not merely on the number of knowable things, but also on the clearness of the knowledge. Therefore, although the knowledge of the soul of Christ which He has in the Word is equal to the knowledge of vision which God has in Himself as regards the number of things known, nevertheless the knowledge of God infinitely exceeds the knowledge of the soul of Christ in clearness of knowledge, since the uncreated light of the Divine intellect infinitely exceeds any created light received by the soul of Christ; although, absolutely speaking, the Divine knowledge exceeds the knowledge of the soul of Christ not only as regards the mode of knowing, but also as regards the number of things knowable, as was stated above.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the Soul of Christ Can Know the Infinite in the Word?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that the soul of Christ cannot know the infinite in the Word.

Objection 1. For that the infinite should be known is contrary to the definition of the infinite, which is said to be that “from which, however much we may take, there always remains something to be taken.”⁵ But it is impossible for the definition to be separated from the thing defined, since this would mean that contradictories exist together. Therefore it is impossible that the soul of Christ knows the infinite.

Obj. 2. Further, the knowledge of the infinite is infinite. But the knowledge of the soul of Christ cannot be infinite, because its capacity is finite, since it is created. Therefore the soul of Christ cannot know the infinite.

Obj. 3. Further, there can be nothing greater than the infinite. But more is contained in the Divine knowledge, absolutely speaking, than in the knowledge of Christ's soul, as stated above (A. 2). Therefore the soul of Christ does not know the infinite.

⁵ Aristotle, Physica, iii, 6 (207^a7).

On the contrary, The soul of Christ knows all its power and all it can do. Now it can cleanse infinite sins, according to I John 2. 2: He is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for those of the whole world. Therefore the soul of Christ knows the infinite.

I answer that, Knowledge regards only being, since being and truth are convertible. Now a thing is said to be a being in two ways. First, absolutely—that is, whatever is a being in act; secondly, relatively—that is, whatever is a being in potency. And because, as is said in the Metaphysics,¹ everything is known as it is in act, and not as it is in potency, knowledge first and principally regards being in act, and secondarily regards being in potency, which is not knowable of itself, but according as that in whose power it exists is known.

Hence, with regard to the first mode of knowledge, the soul of Christ does not know the infinite. Because there is not an infinity of things in act, even though we were to reckon all that are in act at any time whatsoever, since the state of generation and corruption will not last for ever; consequently there is a certain number not only of things lacking generation and corruption, but also of things subject to generation and corruption. But with regard to the other mode of knowing, the soul of Christ knows infinite things in the Word, for it knows, as stated above (A. 2), all that is in the power of the creature. Hence, since in the power of the creature there is an infinite number of things, it knows the infinite, as it were, by a certain knowledge of simple intelligence, and not by a knowledge of vision.

Reply Obj. 1. As we said in the First Part (Q. VII, A. 1), the infinite is taken in two ways. First, on the part of a form, and thus we have the negatively infinite—that is, a form or act not limited by being received into matter or a subject. And this infinite of itself is most knowable on account of the perfection of the act, although it is not comprehensible by the finite power of the creature; for thus God is said to be infinite. And this infinite the soul of Christ knows, yet does not comprehend.

Secondly, there is the infinite as regards matter which is taken privatively—that is, because it has not the form it ought naturally to have, and in his way we have infinite in quantity. Now this infinite is of its very character unknowable, because it is, as it were, matter with privation of form, as is said in the Physics.²

But all knowledge is by form or act. Therefore if this infinite is to be known according to its mode of being, it cannot be known. For its mode is that part be taken after part, as is said in the Physics.³ And in this way it is true that, if we take something from it, that is, taking part after part, there always remains something to be taken. But as material things can be received by the intellect immaterially, and many things unitedly, so can infinite things be received by the intellect, not after the manner of infinite, but as it were finitely; and thus what are in themselves infinite are, in the intellect of the knower, finite. And in this way the soul of Christ knows an infinite number of things, in so far as it knows them not by discoursing from one to another, but in some one thing; for example, in any creature in whose potency infinite things exist, and principally in the Word Himself.

Reply Obj. 2. There is nothing to hinder a thing from being infinite in one way and finite in another, as when in quantities we imagine a surface infinite in length and finite in breadth. Hence, if there were an infinite number of men, they would have a relative infinity—that is, in multitude; but, as regards the essence, they would be finite, since the essence of all would be limited to one specific nature. But what is infinite absolutely in its essence is God, as was said in the First Part (Q. VII, A. 2). Now “the proper object of the intellect is what a thing is,” as is said in the book on the Soul,⁴ to which pertains the notion of the species.

And thus the soul of Christ, since it has a finite capacity, attains to, but does not comprehend, what is absolutely infinite in essence, as stated above (A. 1). But the infinite in potency which is in creatures can be comprehended by the soul of Christ, since it is compared to that soul according to its essence, in which respect it is not infinite. For even our intellect understands a universal,—for example, the nature of a genus or species, which in a manner has infinity, in so far as it can be predicated of an infinite number.

Reply Obj. 3. That which is infinite in every way can be but one. Hence the Philosopher says⁵ that since bodies have dimensions in every part there cannot be several infinite bodies. Yet if anything were infinite in one way only, nothing would hinder that there be several such infinite things, as if we were to suppose several lines of infinite length drawn on a surface of finite breadth. Hence, because infinity is not a substance, but is accidental to things that are said to be infinite, as the Philosopher says,¹ just as the infinite is multiplied by different subjects, so, too, a property of the infinite must be multiplied, in such a way that it belongs to each of them according to that particular subject. Now it is a property of the infinite that nothing is greater than it. Hence, if we take one infinite line, there is nothing greater in it than the infinite; so, too, if we take any one of other infinite lines, it is plain that each has infinite parts. Therefore of necessity in this particular line there is nothing greater than all these infinite parts; yet in another or a third line there will be more infinite parts besides these. We observe this in numbers also, for the species of even numbers are infinite, and likewise the species of odd numbers are infinite; yet there are more even and odd numbers than even.

And thus it must be said that nothing is greater than the absolutely and in every way infinite; but than the infinite which is limited in some respect, nothing is greater in that order, although we may suppose something greater outside that order. In this way, therefore, there are infinite things in the power of the creature, and yet there are more in the power of God than in the power of the creature. So, too, the soul of Christ knows infinite things by the knowledge of simple intelligence, yet God knows more by this manner of knowledge or understanding.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the Soul of Christ Sees the Word or the Divine Essence More Clearly Than Does Any Other Creature?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that the soul of Christ does not see the Word more perfectly than does any other creature.

Objection 1. For the perfection of knowledge depends upon the medium of knowing, just as the knowledge we have by means of a demonstrative syllogism is more perfect than that which we have by means of a probable syllogism. But all the blessed see the Word immediately in the Divine Essence Itself, as was said in the First Part (Q. XII, A. 2). Therefore the soul of Christ does not see the Word more perfectly than any other creature.

Obj. 2. Further, the perfection of vision does not exceed the power of seeing. But the rational power of a soul such as is the soul of Christ is below the intellectual power of an angel, as is plain from Dionysius (Cal. Hier. iv).² Therefore the soul of Christ did not see the Word more perfectly than the angels.

Obj. 3. Further, God sees His Word infinitely more perfectly than does the soul. Hence there are infinite possible mediate degrees between the manner in which God sees His Word, and the manner in which the soul of Christ sees the Word. Therefore we cannot assert that the soul of Christ sees the Word or the Divine Essence more perfectly than does every other creature.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (Eph. 1. 20, 21) that God set Christ on His right hand in the heavenly places, above all principality and power and virtue and dominion, and every name that is named not only in this world, but also in that which is to come. But in that heavenly glory the higher anyone is the more perfectly does he know God. Therefore the soul of Christ sees God more perfectly than does any other creature.

I answer that, The vision of the Divine Essence is granted to all the blessed by a partaking of the Divine light which is shed upon them from the fountain of the Word of God, according to Ecclus. 1. 5: The Word of God on high is the fountain of Wisdom. Now the soul of Christ, since it is united to the Word in person, is more closely joined to the Word of God than any other creature. Hence it more fully receives the light in which God is seen by the Word Himself than any other creature. And therefore more perfectly than the rest of creatures it sees the First Truth itself, which is the Essence of God; hence it is written (John 1. 14): And we saw His glory, the glory as it were of the Only-begotten of the Father, full not only of grace but also of truth.

Reply Obj. 1. Perfection of knowledge, on the part of the thing known, depends on the medium; but as regards the knower, it depends on the power or habit. And hence it is that even amongst men one sees a conclusion in a medium more perfectly than another does. And in this way the soul of Christ, which is filled with a more abundant light, knows the Divine Essence more perfectly than do the other blessed, although all see the Divine Essence in itself.

Reply Obj. 2. The vision of the Divine Essence exceeds the natural power of any creature, as was said in the First Part (Q. XII, A. 4). And hence the degrees thereof depend rather on the order of grace in which Christ is supreme, than on the order of nature, in which the angelic nature is placed before the human.

Reply Obj. 3. As stated above (Q. VII, A. 12), there cannot be a greater grace than the grace of Christ with respect to the union with the Word; and the same is to be said of the perfection of the Divine vision, although, absolutely speaking, there could be a higher and more sublime degree by the infinity of the Divine power.

QUESTION XI

OF THE KNOWLEDGE IMPRINTED OR INFUSED IN THE SOUL OF CHRIST (In Six Articles)

WE must now consider the knowledge imprinted or infused in the soul of Christ, and under this head there are six points of inquiry: (1) Whether Christ knows all things by this knowledge? (2) Whether He could use this knowledge without turning to phantasms? (3) Whether this knowledge was by way of comparison? (4) Of the comparison of this knowledge with the angelic knowledge. (5) Whether it was a habitual knowledge? (6) Whether it was distinguished by various habits?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Christ Knew All Things by Imprinted or Infused Knowledge?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that by this knowledge Christ did not know all things.

Objection 1. For this knowledge is imprinted upon Christ for the perfection of the possible intellect. Now the possible intellect of the human soul does not seem to be in potency to all things absolutely, but only to those things with regard to which it can be reduced to act by the agent intellect, which is its proper active principle; and these are knowable by natural reason. Therefore by this knowledge Christ did not know what exceeded the natural reason.

Obj. 2. Further, phantasms are to the human intellect as colours to sight, as is said in the book on the Soul.¹ But it does not pertain to the perfection of the power of seeing to know what is entirely without colour. Therefore it does not pertain to the perfection of human intellect to know things of which there can be no phantasms, such as separate substances. Hence, since this knowledge was in Christ for the perfection of His intellectual soul, it seems that by this knowledge He did not know separate substances.

Obj. 3. Further, it does not pertain to the perfection of the intellect to know singulars.

Hence it would seem that by this knowledge the soul of Christ did not know singulars.

On the contrary, It is written (Isa. 11. 2) that the Spirit of wisdom and understanding, of knowledge and counsel shall fill Him,² under which are included all knowable things; for the knowledge of all Divine things belongs to wisdom, the knowledge of all immaterial things to understanding, the knowledge of all conclusions to science, the knowledge of all practical things to counsel. Hence it would seem that by the knowledge infused in Him by the Holy Ghost Christ had the knowledge of all things.

I answer that, As was said above (Q. IX, A. 1), it was fitting that the soul of Christ should be wholly perfected by having each of its potentialities reduced to act. Now it must be borne in mind that in the human soul, as in every creature, there is a twofold passive power. one in relation to a natural agent; the other in relation to the first agent, which can reduce any creature to a higher act than a natural agent can reduce it, and this is usually called the obediential power of a creature. Now both powers of Christ's soul were reduced to act by this divinely imprinted knowledge. And hence, by it the soul of Christ knew first, whatever can be known by the power of the light of the agent intellect— as, for example, whatever pertains to human sciences; secondly, by this knowledge Christ knew all things made known to man by Divine revelation, whether they belong to the gift of wisdom or the gift of prophecy, or any other gift of the Holy Ghost; for the soul of Christ knew these things more fully and completely than others. Yet He did not know the Essence Itself of God by this knowledge, but by the first alone, of which we spoke above (Q. X).

Reply Obj. 1. This argument refers to the natural action of an intellectual soul in comparison with its natural agent, which is the agent intellect.

Reply Obj. 2. The human soul in the state of this life, since it is somewhat fettered by the body, so as to be unable to understand without phantasms, cannot understand separate substances. But after the state of this life the separated soul will be able, in a measure, to know separate substances by itself, as was said in the First Part (Q. LXXXIX, A. 2), and this is especially clear as regards the souls of the blessed. Now before His Passion, Christ was not merely a wayfarer but also a comprehensor; hence His soul could know separate substances in the same way that a separated soul could.

Reply Obj. 3. The knowledge of singulars pertains to the perfection of the intellectual soul not in speculative knowledge, but in practical knowledge, which is imperfect without the knowledge of singulars, in which operations exist, as is said in the Ethics.¹ Hence for prudence are required the remembrance of past things, knowledge of present things, and foresight of future things, as Tully says.² Therefore, since Christ had the fulness of prudence by the gift of counsel, He consequently knew all singular things—present, past, and future.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Christ Could Use This Knowledge Without Turning to Phantasms?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that the soul of Christ could not understand by this knowledge except by turning to phantasms.

Objection 1. For, as is stated in the book on the Soul,³ phantasms are related to man's intellectual soul as colours to sight. But Christ's power of seeing could not become actual save by turning to colours. Therefore His intellectual soul could understand nothing except by turning to phantasms.

Obj. 2. Further, Christ's soul is of the same nature as ours; otherwise He would not be of the same species as we, contrary to what the Apostle says (Phil. 2. 7) . . . being made in the likeness of men. But our soul cannot understand except by turning to phantasms. Hence, neither can Christ's soul otherwise understand.

Obj. 3. Further, senses are given to man to help his intellect. Hence, if the soul of Christ could understand without turning to phantasms, which are received by the senses, it would follow that in the soul of Christ the senses were useless, which is not fitting. Therefore it seems that the soul of Christ can only understand by turning to phantasms.

On the contrary, The soul of Christ knew certain things which could not be known through phantasms, namely, separate substances. Therefore it could understand without turning to phantasms.

I answer that, In the state before His Passion Christ was at the same time a wayfarer and a comprehensor, as will be more clearly shown (Q. xv, A. 10). Especially had He the conditions of a wayfarer on the part of the body, which was passible; but the conditions of a comprehensor He had chiefly on the part of the intellectual soul. Now this is the condition of the soul of a comprehensor—namely, that it is in no way subject to its body, or dependent upon it, but wholly dominates it. Hence after the resurrection glory will flow from the soul to the body. But the soul of man on earth needs to turn to phantasms, because it is fettered by the body and in a measure subject to and dependent upon it. And hence the souls of the blessed both before and after the resurrection can understand without turning to phantasms. And this must be said of the soul of Christ, which had fully the capabilities of a comprehensor.

Reply Obj. 1. This likeness which the Philosopher asserts is not with regard to everything. For it is manifest that the end of the power of seeing is to know colours; but the end of the intellectual power is not to know phantasms, but to know intelligible species, which it apprehends from and in phantasms, according to the state of the present life. Therefore there is a likeness in respect of what both powers regard, but not in respect of that in which the condition of both powers is terminated. Now nothing prevents a thing in different states from reaching its end by different ways, although the proper end of a thing is always one. Hence, although the sight knows nothing without colour, nevertheless in a certain state the intellect can know without phantasms, but not without intelligible species.

Reply Obj. 2. Although the soul of Christ was of the same nature as our souls, yet it had a state which our souls have not yet in fact, but only in hope—that is, the state of comprehension.

Reply Obj. 3. Although the soul of Christ could understand without turning to phantasms, yet it could also understand by turning to phantasms. Hence the senses were not useless in it; especially as the senses are not afforded to man solely for intellectual knowledge, but also for the need of animal life.

ARTICLE 3. Whether This Knowledge Was By Way of Comparison?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that the soul of Christ had not this knowledge by way of comparison.

Objection 1. For Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 14):⁴ "We do not uphold counsel

² Rhetoric, ii, 53 (DD 1, 165).

³ Aristotle, iii, 7 (431^a14).

⁴ PG 94, 1044. Cf. ii, 22 (PG 94, 948).

or choice in Christ." Now these things are withheld from Christ only in so far as they imply comparison and discursion. Therefore it seems that there was no knowledge by way of comparison or discursive knowledge in Christ.

Obj. 2. Further, man needs comparison and discursion of reason in order to find out the unknown. But the soul of Christ knew everything, as was said above (Q. X, A. 2). Hence there was no discursive or collative knowledge in Him.

Obj. 3. Further, the knowledge in Christ's soul was like that of comprehensors, who are likened to the angels, according to Matt. 22. 30. Now there is no collative or discursive knowledge in the angels, as Dionysius shows (Div. Nom. vii).¹ Therefore there was no discursive or collative knowledge in the soul of Christ.

On the contrary, Christ had a rational soul, as was shown (Q. v, A. 4). Now the proper operation of a rational soul consists in bringing together and discursion from one thing to another. Therefore there was collative or discursive knowledge in Christ.

I answer that, Knowledge may be discursive or collative in two ways. First, in the acquisition of the knowledge, as happens to us, who proceed from one thing to the knowledge of another, as from causes to effects, and conversely. And in this way the knowledge in Christ's soul was not discursive or collative, since this knowledge which we are now considering was divinely infused in Him, and not acquired by the searching of reasoning.

Secondly, knowledge may be called discursive or collative in use, as at times those who know, conclude to the effect from the causes, not in order to learn anew, but wishing to use the knowledge they already have. And in this way the knowledge in Christ's soul could be collative or discursive, since it could conclude one thing from another as it pleased, as in Matt. 17. 24, 25, when Our Lord asked Peter: Of whom do the kings of the earth receive tribute, of their own children, or of strangers? on Peter replying: Of strangers, He concluded: Then the children are free.

Reply Obj. 1. From Christ is excluded that counsel which is with doubt, and consequently choice, which essentially includes such counsel; but the use of counsel is not excluded from Christ.

Reply Obj. 2. This reason rests upon discursion and comparison, as used to acquire knowledge.

Reply Obj. 3. The blessed are likened to the angels in the gifts of graces, yet there still remains the difference of natures. And hence to use comparison and discursion is connatural to the souls of the blessed, but not to angels.

ARTICLE 4. Whether in Christ This Knowledge Was Greater Than the Knowledge of the Angels?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that this knowledge was not greater in Christ than in the angels.

Objection 1. For perfection is proportioned to the thing perfected. But the human soul in the order of nature is below the angelic nature. Therefore since the knowledge we are now speaking of is imprinted upon Christ's soul for its perfection, it seems that this knowledge is less than the knowledge by which the angelic nature is perfected.

Obj. 2. Further, the knowledge of Christ's soul was in a measure comparative and discursive, which cannot be said of the angelic knowledge. Therefore the knowledge of Christ's soul was less than the knowledge of the angels.

Obj. 3. Further, the more immaterial knowledge is, the greater it is. But the knowledge of the angels is more immaterial than the knowledge of Christ's soul, since the soul of Christ is the act of a body, and turns to phantasms, which cannot be said of the angels. Therefore the knowledge of angels is greater than the knowledge of Christ's soul.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (Heb. 2. 9): For we see Jesus, Who was made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour, from which it is plain that Christ is said to be lower than the angels only in regard to the suffering of death. And hence, not in knowledge.

I answer that, The knowledge imprinted on Christ's soul may be looked at in two ways: first, as regards what it has from the inflowing cause; secondly, as regards what it has from the subject receiving it. Now with regard to the first, the knowledge imprinted upon the soul of Christ was much more excellent than the knowledge of the angels, both in the number of things known and in the certainty of the knowledge, since the spiritual light, which is imprinted on the soul of Christ, is much more excellent than the light which pertains to the angelic nature. But as regards the second, the knowledge imprinted on the soul of Christ is less than the angelic knowledge, in the manner of knowing that is natural to the human soul—that is, by turning to phantasms, and by comparison and discursion.

And thus the reply to the objections is made clear.

ARTICLE 5. Whether This Knowledge Was Habitual?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that in Christ there was no habitual knowledge.

Objection 1. For it has been said (A. 1; Q. 19, A. 1) that the highest perfection of knowledge befitted Christ's soul. But the perfection of an actually existing knowledge is greater than that of a potentially or habitually existing knowledge. Therefore it was fitting for Him to know all things actually. Therefore He had not habitual knowledge.

Obj. 2. Further, since habits are ordered to acts, a habitual knowledge which is never reduced to act would seem in vain. Now, since Christ knew all things, as was said A. 1, He could not have considered all things actually, thinking over one after another, since the infinite cannot be passed over by enumeration. Therefore the habitual knowledge of certain things would have been in vain to Him,—which is unfitting. Therefore He had an actual and not a habitual knowledge of what He knew.

Obj. 3. Further, habitual knowledge is a perfection of the knower. But perfection is more noble than the thing perfected. If, therefore, in the soul of Christ there was any created habit of knowledge, it would follow that this created thing was nobler than the soul of Christ. Therefore there was no habitual knowledge in Christ's soul.

On the contrary, The knowledge of Christ we are now speaking about was univocal with our knowledge, even as His soul was of the same species as ours. But our knowledge is in the genus of habit. Therefore the knowledge of Christ was habitual.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 4), the mode of the knowledge impressed on the soul of Christ befitted the subject receiving it. For the thing received is in the receiver according to the mode of the receiver. Now the connatural mode of the human soul is that it should sometimes be understanding in act, and sometimes in potency. But the medium between a pure power and a completed act is a habit, and extremes and medium are of the same genus. Thus it is plain that it is the connatural mode of the human soul to receive knowledge as a habit. Hence it must be said that the knowledge imprinted on the soul of Christ was habitual, and that He could use it when He pleased.

Reply Obj. 1. In Christ's soul there was a twofold knowledge, each most perfect of its kind. The first exceeded the mode of human nature, as by it He saw the Essence of God, and other things in It, and this was the most perfect, absolutely. Nor was this knowledge habitual, but actual with respect to everything He knew in this way. But the second knowledge was in Christ in a manner proportioned to human nature, that is, according as He knew things by species divinely imprinted upon Him, and of this knowledge we are now speaking. Now this knowledge was not most perfect, absolutely, but merely in the genus of human knowledge; hence it was not necessary for it to be always in act.

Reply Obj. 2. A habit is reduced to act by the command of the will, since a habit is that which we act when we will. Now the will is indeterminate in regard to infinite things. Yet it is not in vain, even when it does not actually tend to all things, provided it actually tends to what is fitting according to the place and time. And hence neither is a habit in vain even if all that it extends to is not reduced to act, provided that that which befits the due end of the will be reduced to act according as the matter in hand and the time require.

Reply Obj. 3. Goodness and being are taken in two ways. First, absolutely, and thus a substance, which subsists in its being and goodness, is a good and a being; secondly, being and goodness are taken relatively, and in this way an accident is a being and a good, not that it has being and goodness, but that its subject is a being and a good. And hence habitual knowledge is not absolutely better or more excellent than the soul of Christ, but relatively, since the whole goodness of habitual knowledge is added to the goodness of the subject.

ARTICLE 6. Whether This Knowledge Was Distinguished By Divers Habits?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that in the soul of Christ there was only one habit of knowledge.

Objection 1. For the more perfect knowledge is, the more united it is; hence the higher angels understand by the more universal forms, as was said in the First Part (Q. LV, A. 3). Now Christ's knowledge was most perfect. Therefore it was most one. Therefore it was not distinguished by several habits.

Obj. 2. Further, our faith is derived from Christ's knowledge; hence it is written (Heb. 12. 2): Looking on Jesus the author and finisher of faith. But there is only one habit of faith about all things subject to belief, as was said in the Second Part (II-II, q. iv, a. 6). Much more, therefore, was there only one habit of knowledge in Christ.

Obj. 3. Further, knowledge is distinguished by the various aspects (ratio) of knowable things. But the soul of Christ knew everything under one aspect—that is, by a divinely infused light. Therefore in Christ there was only one habit of knowledge.

On the contrary, It is written (Zach. 3. 9) that on one stone, that is, Christ, there are seven eyes. Now by the eye is understood knowledge. Therefore it would seem that in Christ there were several habits of knowledge.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 4), the knowledge imprinted on Christ's soul has a mode connatural to a human soul. Now it is connatural to a human soul to receive species of a lesser universality than the angels receive, so that it knows different specific natures by different intelligible species. But it so happens that we have different habits of knowledge because there are different genera of knowable things, inasmuch as what are reduced to one genus are known by the same habit of knowledge; thus it is said (Poster. i. 28),¹ that "one science is of what falls under one genus." And hence the knowledge imprinted on Christ's soul was distinguished by different habits.

Reply Obj. 1. As was said (A. 4), the knowledge of Christ's soul is most perfect, and exceeds the knowledge of angels with regard to what is in it on the part of God's gift; but it is below the angelic knowledge as regards the mode of the recipient. And it pertains to this mode that this knowledge is distinguished by various habits, as if it existed in more particular species.

Reply Obj. 2. Our faith rests upon the First Truth, and hence Christ is the author of our faith by the Divine knowledge, which is absolutely one.

Reply Obj. 3. The divinely infused light is the common aspect for understanding what is divinely revealed, as the light of the understanding is with regard to what is naturally known. Hence, in the soul of Christ there must be the proper species of singular things, in order to know each with proper knowledge; and in this way there must be various habits of knowledge in Christ's soul, as stated above.

QUESTION XII

OF THE ACQUIRED KNOWLEDGE OF CHRIST'S SOUL

(In Four Articles)

WE must now consider the acquired or experimental knowledge of Christ's soul; and under this head there are four points of inquiry. (1) Whether Christ knew all things by this knowledge? (2) Whether He advanced in this knowledge? (3) Whether He learnt anything from man? (4) Whether He received anything from angels?

ARTICLE 1. Whether Christ Knew All Things By this Knowledge?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that Christ did not know everything by this knowledge.

Objection 1. For this knowledge is acquired by experience. But Christ did not experience everything. Therefore He did not know everything by this knowledge.

Obj. 2. Further, man acquires knowledge through the senses. But not all sensible things were subjected to Christ's bodily senses. Therefore Christ did not know everything by this knowledge.

Obj. 3. Further, the extent of knowledge depends on the things knowable. Therefore if Christ knew all things by this knowledge, His acquired knowledge would have been equal to His infused and beatific knowledge, which is not fitting. Therefore Christ did not know all things by this knowledge.

On the contrary, Nothing imperfect was in Christ's soul. Now this knowledge of His would have been imperfect if He had not known all things by it, since the imperfect is that to which addition may be made. Hence Christ knew all things by this knowledge.

I answer that, Acquired knowledge is held to be in Christ's soul, as we have said q. ix, a. 4, by reason of the agent intellect, lest its action, which is to make things intelligible in act, should be useless; even as imprinted or infused knowledge is held to be in Christ's soul for the perfection of the possible intellect. Now "just as the possible intellect is that by which all things are in potency, so the agent intellect is that by which all are in act," as is said in the book on the Soul.² And hence, as the soul of Christ knew by infused knowledge all things to which the possible intellect is in any way in potency, so by acquired knowledge it knew whatever can be known by the action of the agent intellect.

Reply Obj. 1. The knowledge of things may be acquired not merely by experiencing the things themselves, but by experiencing other things, since by the power of the light of the agent intellect man can go on to understand effects from causes, and causes from effects, like from like, contrary from contrary. Therefore Christ, though He did not experience all things, came to the knowledge of all things from what He did experience.

Reply Obj. 2. Although all sensible things were not subjected to Christ's bodily senses, yet other sensible things were subjected to His senses, and from this He could come to know other things by the most excellent power of His reason, in the manner described in the previous reply; just as in seeing heavenly bodies He could comprehend their powers and the effects they have upon things here below, which were not subjected to His senses. And for the same reason, from any other things whatsoever, He could come to the knowledge of yet other things.

Reply Obj. 3. By this knowledge the soul of Christ did not know all things absolutely, but all such as are knowable by the light of man's agent intellect. Hence by this knowledge He did not know the essences of separate substances, nor past, present, or future singulars, which, nevertheless, He knew by infused knowledge, as was said above (Q. XI).

ARTICLE 2. Whether Christ Advanced in This Knowledge?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that Christ did not advance in this knowledge.

Objection 1. For even as Christ knew all things by His beatific and His infused knowledge, so also did He by this acquired knowledge, as is plain from what has been said (A. 1). But He did not advance in these knowledges. Therefore neither in this.

Obj. 2. Further, to advance belongs to the imperfect, since the perfect cannot be added to. Now we cannot suppose an imperfect knowledge in Christ. Therefore Christ did not advance in this knowledge.

Obj. 3. Further, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 22):¹ "Whoever say that Christ advanced in wisdom and grace, as if receiving additional sensations, do not venerate the union which is in hypostasis." But it is impious not to venerate this union. Therefore it is impious to say that His knowledge received increase.

On the contrary, It is written (Luke 2. 52): Jesus advanced in wisdom and age and grace with God and men; and Ambrose says (De Incar. Dom. vii)² that He advanced in human wisdom. Now human wisdom is that which is acquired in a human manner—that is, by the light of the agent intellect. Therefore Christ advanced in this knowledge.

I answer that, There is a twofold advancement in knowledge: one in essence, according as the habit of knowledge is increased; the other in effect—for example, if someone were with one and the same habit of knowledge to prove to someone else some minor truths at first, and afterwards greater and more subtle conclusions. Now in this second way it is plain that Christ advanced in knowledge and grace, even as in age, since as His age increased He wrought greater deeds, and showed greater knowledge and grace. But as regards the habit of knowledge, it is plain that His habit of infused knowledge did not increase, since from the beginning He had perfect infused knowledge of all things; and still less could His beatific knowledge increase; while in the First Part (Q. XIV, A. 15; reply 2) we have already said that His Divine knowledge could not increase.

Therefore, if in the soul of Christ there was no habit of acquired knowledge, beyond the habit of infused knowledge, as appears to some,³ and once appeared to me⁴, no knowledge in Christ increased in essence, but merely by experience—that is, by the comparison of the infused intelligible species with phantasms. And in this way they maintain that Christ's knowledge grew in experience—for example, by comparing the infused intelligible species with what He received through the senses for the first time.

But because it seems unfitting than any natural intelligible action should be wanting to Christ, and because to extract intelligible species from phantasms is a natural action of man's agent intellect, it seems becoming to place even this action in Christ. And it follows from this that in the soul of Christ there was a habit of knowledge which could increase by this abstraction of species, since the agent intellect, after abstracting the first intelligible species from phantasms, could abstract others, and others again.

Reply Obj. 1. Both the infused knowledge and the beatific knowledge of Christ's soul were the effects of an agent of infinite power, which could produce the whole at once; and thus in neither knowledge did Christ advance, since from the beginning He had them perfectly. But the acquired knowledge is caused by the agent intellect which does not produce the whole at once, but successively; and hence by this knowledge Christ did not know everything from the beginning, but step by step, and after a time—that is, in His perfect age; and this is plain from what the Evangelist says, namely, that He increased in knowledge and age together.

Reply Obj. 2. Even this knowledge was always perfect for the time being, although it was not always perfect absolutely and in comparison to the nature; hence it could increase.

Reply Obj. 3. This saying of Damascene regards those¹ who say absolutely that addition was made to Christ's knowledge—that is, as regards any knowledge of His, and especially as regards the infused knowledge which is caused in Christ's soul by union with the Word; but it does not regard the increase of knowledge caused by the natural agent.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Christ Learned Anything from Man?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that Christ learned something from man.

Objection 1. For it is written (Luke 2. 46, 47) that, They found Him in the temple in the midst of the doctors, hearing them, and asking them questions. But to ask questions and to reply pertains to a learner. Therefore Christ learned something from man.

Obj. 2. Further, to acquire knowledge from a man's teaching seems more noble than to acquire it from sensible things, since in the soul of the man who teaches the intelligible species are in act, but in sensible things the intelligible species are only in potency. Now Christ received experimental knowledge from sensible things, as stated above (A. 2; Q. IX,

A. 4). Much more, therefore, could He receive knowledge by learning from men.

Obj. 3. Further, by experimental knowledge Christ did not know everything from the beginning, but advanced in it, as was said above (A. 2). But anyone hearing words which mean something may learn something he does not know. Therefore Christ could learn from men something He did not know by this knowledge.

On the contrary, It is written (Ps. 55. 4): Behold, I have given Him for a witness to the people, for a leader and a master to the Gentiles. Now a master is not taught, but teaches. Therefore Christ did not receive any knowledge by the teaching of any man.

I answer that, In any genus that which is the first mover is not moved according to the same species of movement, just as the first principle of change is not itself changed. Now Christ is established by God the Head of the Church—indeed, of all men, as was said above (Q. VIII., A. 3), so that not only all might receive grace through Him, but that all might receive the doctrine of Truth from Him. Hence He Himself says (John 18. 37): For this was I born, and for this came I into the world; that I should give testimony to the truth. And thus it did not befit His dignity that He should be taught by any man.

Reply Obj. 1. As Origen says (Hom. xix in Luc.):² "Our Lord asked questions not in order to learn anything, but in order to teach by questioning. For from the same well of knowledge came the question and the wise reply." Hence the Gospel goes on to say that all that heard Him were astonished at His wisdom and His answers.

Reply Obj. 2. Whoever learns from man does not receive knowledge immediately from the intelligible species which are in his mind, but through sensible words, which are signs of intelligible concepts. Now as words formed by a man are signs of his intellectual knowledge, so are creatures, formed by God, signs of His wisdom. Hence it is written (Ecclus. 1. 10) that God poured wisdom out upon all His works. Hence, just as it is better to be taught by God than by man, so it is better to receive our knowledge from sensible creatures and not by man's teaching.

Reply Obj. 3. Jesus advanced in experimental knowledge, as in age, as stated above (A. 2). Now as a fitting age is required for a man to acquire knowledge by discovery, so also that he may acquire it by being taught. But our Lord did nothing unbecoming to His age, and hence He did not give ear to hearing the lessons of doctrine until such time as He was able to have reached that grade of knowledge by way of experience. Hence Gregory says (Sup. Ezech. Lib. i, Hom. ii):¹ "In the twelfth year of His age He deigned to question men on earth, since in the course of reason, the word of doctrine is not vouchsafed before the age of perfection."

ARTICLE 4. Whether Christ Received Knowledge from the Angels?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that Christ received knowledge from the angels.

Objection 1. For it is written (Luke 22. 43) that there appeared to Him an angel from heaven, strengthening Him. But we are strengthened by the comforting words of a teacher, according to Job. 4. 3, 4: Behold thou hast taught many and hast strengthened the weary hand. Thy words have confirmed them that were staggering. Therefore Christ was taught by angels.

Obj. 2 Further, Dionysius says (Cæl. Hier. iv):² "For I see that even Jesus,—the super-substantial substance of supercelestial substances—when without change He took our substance upon Himself, was subject in obedience to the instructions of the Father and God by the angels." Hence it seems that even Christ wished to be subject to the decrees of the Divine law, whereby men are taught by means of angels.

Obj. 3. Further, as in the natural order the human body is subject to the celestial bodies, so likewise is the human mind to angelic minds. Now Christ's body was subject to the impressions of the heavenly bodies, for He felt the heat in summer and the cold in winter, and other human passions. Therefore His human mind was subject to the illuminations of supercelestial spirits.

On the contrary, Dionysius says (Cæl. Hier. vii)³ that "the highest angels question Jesus, and learn the knowledge of His Divine work, and of the flesh assumed for us; and Jesus teaches them directly." Now to teach and to be taught do not belong to the same. Therefore Christ did not receive knowledge from the angels.

I answer that, Since the human soul is midway between spiritual substances and corporeal things, it is perfected naturally in two ways. First by knowledge received from sensible things; secondly, by knowledge imprinted or infused by the illumination of spiritual substances. Now in both these ways the soul of Christ was perfected; first by experimental knowledge of sensible things, for which there is no need of angelic light, since the light of the agent intellect suffices; secondly, by the higher impression of infused knowledge, which He received directly from God. For as His soul was united to the Word above the common mode, in unity of person, so above the common manner of men was it filled with knowledge and grace by the Word of God Himself, and not by the medium of angels, who in their beginning received the knowledge of things by the influence of the Word, as Augustine says (Gen. ad lit. ii, 8).⁴

Reply Obj. 1. This strengthening by the angel was for the purpose not of instructing Him, but of proving the truth of His human nature. Hence Bede says (on Luke 22. 43):⁵ "In testimony of both natures are the angels said to have ministered to Him and to have strengthened Him. For the Creator did not need help from His creature; but having become man, even as it was for our sake that He was sad, so was it for our sake that He was strengthened"—that is, in order that our faith in the Incarnation might be strengthened.

Reply Obj. 2. Dionysius says that Christ was subject to the angelic instructions not by reason of Himself, but by reason of what happened at His Incarnation, and as regards the care of Him whilst He was a child. Hence in the same place he adds that Jesus' withdrawal to Egypt decreed by the Father is announced to Joseph by angels, and again His return to Judæ from Egypt.

Reply Obj. 3. The Son of God assumed a passible body (as will be said hereafter, Q. xiv, A. 1) and a soul perfect in knowledge and grace (Q. xiv, A. 1, reply 1; A. 4). Hence His body was rightly subject to the impression of heavenly bodies; but His soul was not subject to the impression of heavenly spirits.

QUESTION XIII

OF THE POWER OF CHRIST'S SOUL (In Four Articles)

We must now consider the power of Christ's soul; and under this head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether He had omnipotence absolutely? (2) Whether He had omnipotence with regard to corporeal creatures? (3) Whether He had omnipotence with regard to His own body? (4) Whether He had omnipotence as regards the execution of His own will?

ARTICLE 1. Whether the Soul of Christ Had Omnipotence Absolutely?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that the soul of Christ had omnipotence.

Objection 1. For Ambrose says on Luke 1. 32:¹ "The power which the Son of God had naturally, the Man was about to receive in time." Now this would seem to regard the soul principally, since it is the chief part of man. Hence since the Son of God had omnipotence from all eternity, it would seem that the soul of Christ received omnipotence in time.

Obj. 2. Further, as the power of God is infinite, so is His knowledge. But the soul of Christ in a manner had the knowledge of all that God knows, as was said above (Q. X, A. 2). Therefore He had all power, and thus He was omnipotent.

Obj. 3. Further, the soul of Christ has all knowledge. Now knowledge is either practical or speculative. Therefore He has a practical knowledge of what He knows—that is, He knew how to do what He knows; and thus it seems that He can do all things.

On the contrary, What is proper to God cannot belong to any creature. But it is proper to God to be omnipotent, according to Exod. 15. 2, 3: He is my God and I will glorify Him, and further on, Almighty is His name. Therefore the soul of Christ, as being a creature, has not omnipotence.

I answer that, As was said above (Q. II, A. 1; Q. X, A. 1) in the mystery of the Incarnation the union in person so took place that there still remained the distinction of natures, each nature still retaining what belonged to it. Now the active power of a thing follows its form, which is the principle of action. But the form is either the very nature of the thing, as in simple things, or is the constituent of the nature of the thing, as in such as are composed of matter and form. Hence it is clear that the active power of anything follows from its nature. And it is in this way that omnipotence is something that follows upon the Divine Nature. For since the Divine Nature is the very uncircumscribed Being of God, as is plain from Dionysius (Div. Nom. v).² It has an active power over everything that can have the nature of being, and this is to have omnipotence; just as every other thing has an active power over such things as the perfection of its nature extends to, as for instance what is hot gives heat. Therefore since the soul of Christ is a part of human nature, it cannot possibly have omnipotence.

Reply Obj. 1. By union with the Person, the Man receives omnipotence in time, which the Son of God had from eternity. The result of this union is that as the Man is said to be God, so is He said to be omnipotent; not that the omnipotence of the Man is distinct (as neither is His Godhead) from that of the Son of God, but because there is one Person of God and man.

Reply Obj. 2. According to some,³ knowledge and active power are not of the same character; for an active power flows from the very nature of the thing, for the reason that action is considered to come forth from the agent; but knowledge is not always possessed by the very essence of the knower, since it may be had by assimilation of the knower to the thing known by the aid of likenesses that are received.

But this reason seems not to be enough, because even as we may understand by a likeness obtained from another, so also may we act by a form obtained from another, as water or iron heats, by heat borrowed from fire. Hence there would be no reason why the soul of Christ, as it can know all things by the likenesses of all things impressed upon it by God, cannot do these things by the same likenesses.

It has, therefore, to be further considered that what is received in the lower nature from the higher is possessed in an inferior manner; for heat is not received by water in the perfection and strength it had in fire. Therefore, since the soul of Christ is of an inferior nature to the Divine Nature, the likenesses of things are not received in the soul of Christ in the perfection and strength they had in the Divine Nature. And hence it is that the knowledge of Christ's soul is inferior to Divine knowledge as regards the manner of knowing, for God knows things more perfectly than the soul of Christ; and also as regards the number of things known, since the soul of Christ does not know all that God can do, and these God knows by the knowledge of simple intelligence (although it knows all things present, past, and future which God knows by the knowledge of vision). So, too, the likenesses of things infused into Christ's soul do not equal the Divine power in acting—that is, so as to do all that God can do, or to do in the same manner as God does, Who acts with an infinite might wherof the creature is not capable. Now there is no thing to know which in some way an infinite power is needed, although a certain kind of knowledge belongs to an infinite power; yet there are things which can be done only by an infinite power, as creation and the like, as is plain from what has been said in the First Part (Q. XLV, A. 5, reply 3; Q. LXV, A. 3, reply 3; Q. XXV, A. 3, reply 4). Hence Christ's soul which, being a creature, is finite in power, can know, indeed, all things, but not in every way. Yet it cannot do all things, which pertains to the nature of omnipotence; and, amongst other things, it is clear that it cannot create itself.

Reply Obj. 3. Christ's soul has practical and speculative knowledge, yet it is not necessary that it should have practical knowledge of all those things of which it has speculative knowledge. Because for speculative knowledge a mere conformity or assimilation of the knower to the thing known suffices, whereas for practical knowledge it is required that the forms of the things in the intellect should be operative. Now to have a form and to impress this form upon something else is more than merely to have the form; as to shine and to illuminate is more than merely to shine. Hence the soul of Christ has a speculative knowledge of creation (for it knows how God creates), but it has no practical knowledge of this mode, since it has no knowledge operative of creation.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the Soul of Christ Had Omnipotence With Regard To the Changing of Creatures?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that the soul of Christ had omnipotence with regard to the changing of creatures.

Objection 1. For He Himself says (Matt. 28, 18): All power is given to Me in heaven and on earth. Now by the words "heaven and earth" are meant all creatures, as is plain from Gen. 1, 1: In the beginning God created heaven and earth. Therefore it seems that the soul of Christ had omnipotence with regard to the changing of creatures.

Obj. 2. Further, the soul of Christ is the most perfect of all creatures. But every creature can be moved by another creature; for Augustine says (De Trin. iii, 4)¹ that "even as the denser and lower bodies are ruled in a fixed way by the subtler and stronger bodies, so are all bodies by the spirit rational of life; and the truant and sinful rational spirit of life by the rational, loyal and righteous spirit of life." But the soul of Christ moves even the highest spirits, enlightening them, as Dionysius says (Cæl. Hier. vii)² Therefore it seems that the soul of Christ has omnipotence with regard to the changing of creatures.

Obj. 3. Further, Christ's soul had in its highest degree the grace of miracles or works of power as well as the rest of the graces. But every change of the creature can belong to the grace of miracles, since even the heavenly bodies were miraculously changed from their course, as Dionysius proves (Ep. ad Polycarp.)³ Therefore Christ's soul had omnipotence with regard to the changing of creatures.

On the contrary, To transmute creatures belongs to Him Who conserves them. Now this belongs to God alone, according to Heb. 1, 3: Upholding all things by the word of His power. Therefore God alone has omnipotence with regard to the changing of creatures. Therefore this does not belong to Christ's soul.

I answer that, Two distinctions are here needed. Of these the first is with respect to the changing of creatures, which is threefold. The first is natural, being brought about by the proper agent according to the order of nature; the second is miraculous, being brought about by a supernatural agent above the accustomed order and course of nature, as to raise the dead; the third is according as every creature may be brought to nothing.

The second distinction has to do with Christ's soul, which may be looked at in two ways: first in its proper nature and with its power of nature or of grace; secondly, as it is the instrument of the Word of God, personally united to Him.

Therefore if we speak of the soul of Christ in its proper nature and with its power whether of nature or of grace, it had power to cause those effects proper to a soul (for example, to rule the body and direct human acts, and also, by the fulness of grace and knowledge to enlighten all rational creatures falling short of its perfection), in a manner befitting a rational creature.

But if we speak of the soul of Christ as it is the instrument of the Word united to Him, it had an instrumental power to effect all the miraculous changes which can be ordered to the end of the Incarnation, which is to re-establish all things that are in heaven and on earth.

But the changings of creatures according as they may be brought to nothing corresponds to the creation of things, whereby they were brought from nothing. And hence even as God alone can create, so, too, He alone can return creatures to nothing, and He alone upholds them in being, lest they fall back to nothing. And thus it must be said that the soul of Christ had not omnipotence with regard to the changing of creatures.

³ Epist., vii, 2 (PG 3, 1080).

Reply Obj. 1. As Jerome says:¹ "Power is given Him"—that is, to Christ as man—"Who a little while before was crucified, buried in the tomb, and afterwards rose again." But all power is said to have been given Him by reason of the union, whereby it was brought about that a Man was omnipotent, as was said above (A. 1, reply 1). And although this was made known to the angels before the Resurrection, yet after the Resurrection it was made known to all men, as Remigius says.² Now, things are said to happen when they are made known. Hence after the Resurrection our Lord says that all power is given to Him in heaven and on earth.

Reply Obj. 2. Although every creature can be changed by some other creature, except, indeed, the highest angel, and even it can be enlightened by Christ's soul, yet not every change that can be made in a creature can be made by a creature, since some changes can be made by God alone. Yet all changes that can be made in creatures can be made by the soul of Christ, as the instrument of the Word, but not in its proper nature and power, since some of these changes pertain to the soul neither in the order of nature nor in the order of grace.

Reply Obj. 3. As was said in the Second Part (II-II, Q. CLXXVIII, A. 1, reply 1), the grace of mighty works or miracles is given to the soul of a saint, so that these miracles are wrought not by his own, but by Divine power. Now this grace was bestowed on Christ's soul most excellently—that is, not only that He might work miracles, but also that He might communicate this grace to others. Hence it is written (Matt. 10. 1) that, having called His twelve disciples together, He gave them power over unclean spirits, to cast them out, and to heal all manner of diseases, and all manner of infirmities.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the Soul of Christ Had Omnipotence With Regard To His Own Body?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that Christ's soul had omnipotence with regard to His own body.

Objection 1. For Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 20)³ that all natural things were voluntary to Christ; "He willed to hunger, He willed to thirst, He willed to fear, He willed to die, etc." Now God is called omnipotent because He hath done all things whatsoever He would (Ps. 113. 11). Therefore it seems that Christ's soul had omnipotence with regard to the natural operations of His own body.

Obj. 2. Further, human nature was more perfect in Christ than in Adam, who had a body entirely subject to the soul, so that nothing could happen to the body against the will of the soul—and this on account of the original justice which it had in the state of innocence. Much more, therefore, had Christ's soul omnipotence with regard to His body.

Obj. 3. Further, the body is naturally changed by the imagination of the soul, and so much more changed the stronger the soul's imagination, as was said in the First Part (Q. cxvii, A. 3, reply 2, 3). Now the soul of Christ had most perfect strength as regards both the imagination and the other powers. Therefore the soul of Christ was omnipotent with regard to His own body.

On the contrary, It is written (Heb. 2. 17) that it behoved Him in all things to be made like unto His brethren, and especially as regards what belongs to the condition of human nature. But it belongs to the condition of human nature that the health of the body and its nourishment and growth are not subject to the bidding of reason or will, since natural things are subject to God alone Who is the author of nature. Therefore they were not subject in Christ. Therefore Christ's soul was not omnipotent with regard to His own body.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 2), Christ's soul may be viewed in two ways. First, in its proper nature and power; and in this way, as it was incapable of making exterior bodies change from the course and order of nature, so, too, was it incapable of changing its own body from its natural disposition, since the soul, of its own nature, has a determinate relation to its body. Secondly Christ's soul may be viewed as an instrument united in person to God's Word; and thus every disposition of His own body was wholly subject to His power. Nevertheless, since the power of an action is not properly attributed to the instrument, but to the principal agent, this omnipotence is attributed to the Word of God rather than to Christ's soul.

Reply Obj. 1. This saying of Damascene refers to the Divine will of Christ, since, as he says in the preceding chapter (ch. 19, cf. 14, 15),¹ "it was by the consent of the Divine will that the flesh was allowed to suffer and do what was proper to it."

Reply Obj. 2. It was no part of the original justice which Adam had in the state of innocence that a man's soul should have the power of changing his own body to any form, but that it should keep it from any hurt. Yet Christ could have assumed even this power if He had wished. But since man has three states—namely, innocence, sin, and glory, even as from the state of glory He assumed comprehension, and from the state of innocence, freedom from sin, so also from the state of sin did He assume the necessity of being under the penalties of this life, as will be said (Q. XIV, A. 2).

Reply Obj. 3. If the imagination be strong, the body obeys naturally in some things—for example, as regards falling from a beam set on high—since the imagination was formed to be a principle of local motion, as is said in the treatise on the Soul.² So, too, as regards alteration in heat and cold and their consequences, for the passions of the soul, according to which the heart is moved, naturally follow the imagination, and thus by arousing the spirits the whole body is altered. But the other corporeal dispositions which have no natural relation to the imagination are not changed by the imagination, however strong it is—for example, the shape of the hand, or foot, or such-like.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the Soul of Christ Had Omnipotence As Regards the Execution of His Will?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that the soul of Christ had not omnipotence as regards the execution of His own will.

Objection 1. For it is written (Mark 7. 24) that entering into a house, He would that no man should know it, and He could not be hid. Therefore He could not carry out the purpose of His will in all things.

Obj. 2. Further, a command is a sign of will, as was said in the First Part (Q. XIX, A. 12). But our Lord commanded certain things to be done, and the contrary came to pass, for it is written (Matt. 9. 30, 31) that Jesus strictly charged them whose eyes had been opened, saying: See that no man know this. But they going out spread His fame abroad in all that country. Therefore He could not carry out the purpose of His will in everything.

Obj. 3. Further, a man does not ask from another for what he can do himself. But our Lord besought the Father, praying for what He wished to be done, for it is written (Luke 6. 12): He went out into a mountain to pray, and He passed the whole night in the prayer of God. Therefore He could not carry out the purpose of His will in all things.

On the contrary, Augustine says (qq. Nov. et Vet. Test., qu. 77):³ It is impossible for the will of the Saviour not to be fulfilled: nor is it possible for Him to will what He knows ought not to come to pass.

I answer that, Christ's soul willed things in two ways. First, what was to be brought about by Himself; and it must be said that He was capable of whatever He willed thus, since it would not befit His wisdom if He willed to do anything of Himself that was not subject to His power. Secondly, He wished things to be brought about by the Divine power, as the resurrection of His own body and such miraculous deeds, which He could not effect by His own power, except as the instrument of the Godhead, as was said above (A. 2).

Reply Obj. 1. As Augustine says:⁴ "What came to pass, this Christ must be said to have willed. For it must be remarked that this happened in the country of the Gentiles, to whom it was not yet time to preach. Yet it would have been invidious not to welcome such as came spontaneously for the faith. Hence He did not wish to be heralded by His own, and yet He wished to be sought; and so it came to pass." Or it may be said that this will of Christ was not with regard to what was to be carried out by it but with regard to what was to be done by others, which did not come under His human will. Hence in the letter of Pope Agatho,⁵ which was approved in the Sixth Council,⁶ we read: "When He, the Creator and Redeemer of all, wished to be hid and could not, must not this be referred only to His human will which He deigned to assume in time?"

Reply Obj. 2. As Gregory says (Moral. xix, 23).⁷ by the fact that Our Lord charged His mighty works to be kept secret, "He gave an example to His servants coming after Him that they should wish their miracles to be hidden; and yet, that others may profit by their example, they are made public against their will." And thus this command signified His will to fly from human glory, according to John 8, 50, I seek not My own glory. Yet He wished absolutely, and especially by His Divine will, that the miracle wrought should be published for the good of others.

Reply Obj. 3. Christ prayed both for things that were to be brought about by the Divine power, and for what He Himself was to do by His human will, since the power and operation of Christ's soul depended on God, Who works in all (Vulg., you), both to will and to accomplish (Phil. 2, 13).

QUESTION XIV

OF THE DEFECTS OF BODY ASSUMED

BY THE SON OF GOD

(In Four Articles)

WE must now consider the defects Christ assumed in the human nature; and, first, of the defects of body; secondly, of the defects of soul (Q. xv.).

Under the first head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether the Son of God should have assumed in human nature defects of body? (2) Whether He assumed the necessity of being subject to these defects? (3) Whether He contracted these defects? (4) Whether He assumed all these defects?

ARTICLE 1. Whether the Son of God in Human Nature Ought To Have Assumed Defects, of Body?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that the Son of God ought not to have assumed human nature with defects of body.

Objection 1. For as His soul is personally united to the Word of God, so also is His body. But the soul of Christ had every perfection, both of grace and truth, as was said above (Q. vii, A. 9; Q. ix, seqq.). Hence, His body also ought to have been in every way perfect, not having any imperfection in it.

Obj. 2. Further, the soul of Christ saw the Word of God by the vision wherein the blessed see, as was said above (Q. ix, A. 2), and thus the soul of Christ was blessed. Now by the beatification of the soul the body is glorified; since, as Augustine says (Ep. ad Dios. cxviii),¹ "God made the soul of a nature so strong that from the fulness of its blessedness there pours over even into the lower nature (that is, the body), not indeed the bliss proper to the beatific fruit-tion and vision, but the fulness of health" (that is, the vigour of incorruptibility). Therefore the body of Christ was incorruptible and without any defect.

Obj. 3. Further, penalty is the consequence of fault. But there was no fault in Christ, according to I Pet. 2, 22: Who did no guile. Therefore defects of body, which are penalties, ought not have been in Him.

Obj. 4. Further, no reasonable man assumes what keeps him from his proper end. But by such bodily defects the end of the Incarnation seems to be hindered in many ways. First, because by these infirmities men were kept back from knowing Him, according to Isa. 53, 2, 3: [There was no sightliness] that we should be desirous of Him. Despised and the most abject of men, a man of sorrows and acquainted with infirmity, and His look was, as it were, hidden and despised, whereupon we esteemed Him not. Secondly, because the desire of the holy Fathers would not seem to be fulfilled, in whose person it is written (Isa 51, 9): Arise, arise, put on Thy strength, O Thou Arm of the Lord. Thirdly, because it would seem more fitting for the devil's power to be overcome and man's weakness healed, by strength than by weakness. Therefore it does not seem to have been fitting that the Son of God assumed human nature with infirmities or defects of body.

On the contrary, It is written (Heb 2, 18): For in that wherein He Himself hath suffered and been tempted, He is able to succour them also that are tempted. Now He came to succour us; hence David said of Him (Ps. 120, 1): I have lifted up my eyes to the mountains, from whence help shall come to me. Therefore it was fitting for the Son of God to assume flesh subject to human infirmities, in order to suffer and be tempted in it and so bring succour to us.

I answer that, It was fitting for the body assumed by the Son of God to be subject to human infirmities and defects; and especially for three reasons. First, because it was in order to satisfy for the sin of the human race that the Son of God, having taken flesh, came into the world. Now one satisfies for another's sin by taking on himself the punishment due to the sin of the other. But these bodily defects, namely, death, hunger, thirst, and the like, are the punishment of sin, which was brought into the world by Adam, according to Rom. 5, 12: By one man sin entered into this world, and by sin death. Hence it was useful for the end of the Incarnation that He should assume these penalties in our flesh and in our stead, according to Isa. 53. 4, Surely He hath borne our infirmities.

Secondly, in order to cause belief in the Incarnation. For since human nature is known to men only as it is subject to these defects, if the Son of God had assumed human nature without these defects, He would not have seemed to be true man, nor to have true, but imaginary, flesh, as the Manicheans held.¹ And so, as is said, Phil. 2. 7: He . . . emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men, and in habit found as a man. Hence, Thomas, by the sight of His wounds, was recalled to the faith, as related John. 20. 26.

Thirdly, in order to show us an example of patience by valiantly bearing up against human sufferings and defects. Hence it said (Heb. 12. 3) that He endured such opposition from sinners against Himself, that you be not wearied, fainting in your minds.

Reply Obj. 1. The penalties one suffers for another's sin are the matter, as it were, of the satisfaction for that sin; but the principle is the habit of soul whereby one is inclined to wish to satisfy for another, and from which the satisfaction has its efficacy, for satisfaction would not be efficacious unless it proceeded from charity, as will be explained (Suppl. q. xiv, a. 2). Hence, the soul of Christ had to be perfect as regards the habit of knowledge and virtue, in order to have the power of satisfying, but His body was subject to infirmities, that the matter of satisfaction should not be wanting.

Reply Obj. 2. From the natural relationship which is between the soul and the body, glory flows into the body from the soul's glory. Yet this natural relationship in Christ was subject to the will of His Godhead, and thereby it came to pass that the Happiness remained in the soul, and did not flow into the body, but the flesh suffered what belongs to a nature capable of suffering; thus Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 19)² that, "it was by the consent of the Divine will that the flesh was allowed to suffer and do what was proper to it."

Reply Obj. 3. Punishment always follows sin actual or original, sometimes of the one punished, sometimes of the one for whom he who suffers the punishment satisfies. And so it was with Christ, according to Isa. 53. 5: He was wounded for our iniquities, He was bruised for our sins.

Reply Obj. 4. The infirmity assumed by Christ did not impede, but greatly furthered the end of the Incarnation, as above stated. And although these infirmities concealed His Godhead, they made known His Manhood, which is the way of coming to the Godhead, according to Rom. 5. 1, 2: By Jesus Christ we have access to God. Moreover, the ancient Fathers did not desire bodily strength in Christ, but spiritual strength, with which He vanquished the devil and healed human weakness.

ARTICLE 2. Whether Christ Assumed the Necessity of Being Subject to These Defects.

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that Christ was not of necessity subject to these defects.

Objection 1. For it is written (Isa. 53. 7): He was offered because it was His own will, and the prophet is speaking of the offering of the Passion. But will is opposed to necessity. Therefore Christ was not of necessity subject to bodily defects.

Obj. 2. Further, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 20):³ "Nothing forced is seen in Christ: all is voluntary." Now what is voluntary is not necessary. Therefore these defects were not of necessity in Christ.

Obj. 3. Further, necessity is induced by something more powerful. But no creature is more powerful than the soul of Christ, to which it pertained to preserve its own body. Therefore these defects were not of necessity in Christ.

On the contrary, The Apostle says (Rom. 8. 3) that God sent His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh. Now it is a condition of sinful flesh to be under the necessity of dying, and suffering other like passions. Therefore the necessity of suffering these defects was in Christ's flesh.

I answer that, Necessity is twofold. One is a necessity of constraint, brought about by an external agent, and this necessity is contrary to both nature and will, since these flow from an internal principle. The other is natural necessity, resulting from the natural principles—either the form (as it is necessary for fire to heat), or the matter (as it is necessary for a body composed of contraries to be dissolved). Hence, with this necessity, which results from the matter, Christ's body was subject to the necessity of death and other like defects, since, as was said⁴ "it was by the consent of the Divine will that the flesh was allowed to do and suffer what was proper to it." And this necessity results from the principles of human flesh, as was said above in this article. But if we speak of necessity of constraint, as contrary to the bodily nature, thus again was Christ's body in its own natural condition subject to necessity in regard to the nail that pierced and the scourge that struck. Yet according as such necessity is contrary to the will, it is clear that in Christ these defects were not of necessity as regards either the Divine will, or the human will of Christ considered absolutely, as following the deliberation of reason, but only as regards the natural movement of the will, according as it naturally shrinks from death and bodily hurt.

Reply Obj. 1. Christ is said to be offered because it was His own will—that is, Divine will and deliberate human will, although death was contrary to the natural movement of His human will, as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 23, 24).¹

Reply Obj. 2. This is plain from what has been said.

Reply Obj. 3. Nothing was more powerful than Christ's soul, absolutely; yet there was nothing to hinder a thing being more powerful in regard to this or that effect, as a nail for piercing. And this I say, in so far as Christ's soul is considered in its own proper nature and power.

ARTICLE 3. Whether Christ Contracted Bodily Defects?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that Christ contracted bodily defects.

Objection 1. For we are said to contract what we derive with our nature from birth. But Christ, together with human nature, derived His bodily defects and infirmities through His birth from His mother, whose flesh was subject to these defects. Therefore it seems that He contracted these defects.

Obj. 2. Further, what is caused by the principles of nature is derived together with nature, and hence is contracted. Now these penalties are caused by the principles of human nature. Therefore Christ contracted them.

Obj. 3. Further, Christ is likened to other men in these defects, as is written Heb. 2. 17. But other men contract these defects. Therefore it seems that Christ contracted these defects.

On the contrary, These defects are contracted through sin, according to Rom. 5. 12: By one man sin entered into this world, and by sin, death. Now sin had no place in Christ. Therefore Christ did not contract these defects.

I answer that, In the verb "to contract" is understood the order of effect to cause—that is, that is said to be contracted which is derived of necessity together with its cause. Now the cause of death and the like defects in human nature is sin, since by sin death entered into this world, according to Rom. 5. 12. And hence they who incur these defects as due to sin, are properly said to contract them. Now Christ had not these defects as due to sin, since, as Augustine, expounding John 3. 31, He that cometh from above, is above all, says:² "Christ came from above—that is, from the height of human nature, which it had before the fall of the first man." For He received human nature without sin, in the purity which it had in the state of innocence. In the same way He might have assumed human nature without defects. Thus it is clear that Christ did not contract these defects as if taking them upon Himself as due to sin, but by His own will.

Reply Obj. 1. The flesh of the Virgin was conceived in original sin, and therefore contracted these defects. But from the Virgin, Christ's flesh assumed the nature without fault, and He might likewise have assumed the nature without its penalty. But He wished to bear its penalty in order to carry out the work of our redemption, as stated above (A 1). Therefore He had these defects—not that He contracted them, but that He assumed them.

Reply Obj. 2. The cause of death and other corporeal defects of human nature is twofold: the first is remote, and results from the material principles of the human body, because it is made up of contraries. But this cause was held in check by original justice. Hence the proximate cause of death and other defects is sin, whereby original justice is withdrawn. And thus, because Christ was without sin, He is said not to have contracted these defects, but to have assumed them.

Reply Obj. 3. Christ was made like other men in the quality and not in the cause of these defects; and hence, unlike others, He did not contract them.

ARTICLE 4. Whether Christ Ought To Have Assumed All the Bodily Defects of Men?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that Christ ought to have assumed all the bodily defects of men.

Objection 1. For Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 6, 18):³ "What is unassumable is incurable." But Christ came to cure all our defects. Therefore He ought to have assumed all our defects.

² Cf. Hugh of St. Cher, In Univ. Test., on John 3.31 (vi, 307a).

³ PG 94, 1005, 1071.

Obj. 2. Further, it was said (A. 1, Reply 1), that in order to satisfy for us, Christ ought to have had perfective habits of soul and defects of body. Now as regards the soul, He assumed the fulness of all grace. Therefore as regards the body, He ought to have assumed all defects.

Obj. 3. Further, amongst all bodily defects death holds the chief place. Now Christ assumed death. Much more, therefore, ought He to have assumed other defects.

On the contrary, Contraries cannot take place simultaneously in the same. Now some infirmities are contrary to each other, being caused by contrary principles. Hence it could not be that Christ assumed all human infirmities.

I answer that, As stated above (A. 1), Christ assumed human defects in order to satisfy for the sin of human nature, and for this it was necessary for Him to have the fulness of knowledge and grace in His soul. Hence Christ ought to have assumed those defects which flow from the common sin of the whole nature, yet are not incompatible with the perfection of knowledge and grace.

And thus it was not fitting for Him to assume all human defects or infirmities. For there are some defects that are incompatible with the perfection of knowledge and grace, as ignorance, a proneness towards evil, and an obstinacy toward well-doing.

Some other defects do not flow from the whole of human nature in common on account of the sin of our first parent, but are caused in some men by certain particular causes, as leprosy, epilepsy, and the like; and these defects are sometimes brought about by the fault of the man—for example, from inordinate eating; sometimes by a defect in the formative power. Now neither of these pertains to Christ, since His flesh was conceived of the Holy Ghost, Who has infinite wisdom and power, and cannot err or fail; and He Himself did nothing wrong in the order of His life.

But there are some third defects, to be found amongst all men in common, by reason of the sin of our first parent, as death, hunger, thirst, and the like; and all these defects Christ assumed, which Damascene (De Fide Orthod. i, 11; iii, 20)¹ calls "natural and non-detracting passions"—natural, as following all human nature in common; non-detracting, as implying no defect of knowledge or grace.

Reply Obj. 1. All particular defects of men are caused by the corruptibility and capacity for suffering of the body, some particular causes being added; and hence, since Christ healed the capacity for suffering and corruptibility of our body by assuming it, He consequently healed all other defects.

Reply Obj. 2. The fulness of all grace and knowledge was due to Christ's soul of itself, from the fact of its being assumed by the Word of God; and hence Christ assumed all the fulness of wisdom and grace absolutely. But He assumed our defects as a steward, in order to satisfy for our sin, and not that they belonged to Him of Himself. Hence it was not necessary for Him to assume them all, but only such as sufficed to satisfy for the sin of the whole nature.

Reply Obj. 3. Death comes to all men from the sin of our first parent; but not other defects, although they are less than death. Hence there is no parity.

QUESTION XV

OF THE DEFECTS OF SOUL ASSUMED

BY CHRIST

(In Ten Articles)

WE must now consider the defects pertaining to the soul; and under this head there are ten points of inquiry: (1) Whether there was sin in Christ? (2) Whether there was the fomes of sin in Him? (3) Whether there was ignorance? (4) Whether His soul was passible? (5) Whether in Him there was sensible pain? (6) Whether there was sorrow? (7) Whether there was fear? (8) Whether there was wonder? (9) Whether there was anger? (10) Whether He was at once wayfarer and comprehensor?

ARTICLE 1. Whether There Was Sin in Christ?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that there was sin in Christ.

Objection 1. For it is written (Ps. 21. 2): O God, My God, look upon me: why hast Thou forsaken Me? Far from My salvation are the words of My sins. Now these words are said in the person of Christ Himself, as appears from His having uttered them on the cross. Therefore it would seem that in Christ there were sins.

Obj. 2. Further, the Apostle says (Rom. 5. 12) that in Adam all have sinned—namely, because all were in Adam by origin. Now Christ also was in Adam by origin. Therefore He sinned in him.

Obj. 3. Further, the Apostle says (Heb. 2. 18) that in that, wherein He Himself hath suffered and been tempted, He is able to succour them also that are tempted. Now above all do we require His help against sin. Therefore it seems that there was sin in Him.

Obj. 4. Further, it is written (II Cor. 5. 21) that Him that knew no sin (that is, Christ), for us God hath made sin. But that really is, which has been made by God. Therefore there was really sin in Christ.

Obj. 5. Further, as Augustine says (De Agone Christ. xi),¹ "in the man Christ the Son of God gave Himself to us as a pattern of living." Now man needs a pattern not merely of right living, but also of repentance for sin. Therefore it seems that in Christ there ought to have been sin, that He might repent of His sin, and thus afford us a pattern of repentance.

On the contrary, He Himself says (John 8. 46): Which of you shall convince Me of sin?

I answer that, As was said above (Q. xiv, A. 1), Christ assumed our defects that He might satisfy for us, that He might prove the truth of His human nature, and that He might become an example of virtue to us. Now it is plain that by reason of these three things He ought not to have assumed the defect of sin. First, because sin in no way works our satisfaction; rather, it impedes the power of satisfying, since, as it is written (Ecclus. 34. 23), The Most High approveth not the gifts of the wicked. Secondly, the truth of His human nature is not proved by sin, since sin does not belong to human nature, of which God is the cause, but rather has been sown in it against its nature by the devil, as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 20).² Thirdly, because by sinning He could afford no example of virtue, since sin is opposed to virtue. Hence Christ in no way assumed the defect of sin—either original or actual—according to what is written (I Pet. 2. 22): Who did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth.

Reply Obj. 1. As Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 25),³ things are said of Christ in two ways: first, with reference to His natural and hypostatic property, as when it is said that God became man, and that He suffered for us; secondly, with reference to His personal and relative property, when things are said of Him in our person which in no way belong to Him of Himself. Hence, in the seven rules of Tichonius⁴ which Augustine quotes,⁵ the first regards "Our Lord and His Body," since "Christ and His Church are taken as one person." And thus Christ, speaking in the person of His members, says (Ps. 21. 2): The words of My sins—not that there were any sins in the Head.

Reply Obj. 2. As Augustine says (Gen. ad lit. x, 20),⁶ Christ was in Adam and the other fathers not altogether as we were. For we were in Adam as regards both seminal principle and bodily substance, since, as he goes on to say: "As in the seed there is a visible bulk and an invisible virtue, both have come from Adam. Now Christ took the visible substance of His flesh from the Virgin's flesh; but the principle of His conception did not spring from the seed of man, but far otherwise—from on high." Hence He was not in Adam according to seminal principle, but only according to bodily substance. And therefore Christ did not receive human nature from Adam actively, but only materially—and from the Holy Ghost actively; even as Adam received his body materially from the slime of the earth, actively from God. And thus Christ did not sin in Adam, in whom He was only as regards His matter.

Reply Obj. 3. In His temptation and passion Christ has succoured us by satisfying for us. Now sin does not further satisfaction, but hinders it, as has been said. Hence, it was not necessary for Him to have sin, but He was wholly free from sin; otherwise the punishment He bore would have been due to Him for His own sin.

Reply Obj. 4. God made Christ sin,—not, indeed, in such sort that He had sin in Himself, but that He made Him a victim for sin, even as it is written (Osee 4. 8): They shall eat the sins of My people—they—that is, the priests, who by the law ate the victims offered for sin. And in that way it is written (Isa. 53. 6) that the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all (that is, He gave Him up to be a victim for the sins of all men); or He made Him sin (that is, made Him to have the likeness of sinful flesh), as is written (Rom. 8. 3), and this on account of the passible and mortal body He assumed.

Reply Obj. 5. A penitent can give a praiseworthy example not by having sinned, but by freely bearing the punishment of sin. And hence Christ set the highest example to penitents, since He willingly bore the punishment, not of His own sin, but of the sins of others.

ARTICLE 2. Whether There Was the "Fomes" of Sin in Christ?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that in Christ there was the fomes of sin.

Objection 1. For the fomes of sin, and the passibility and mortality of the body spring from the same principle, namely, from the withdrawal of original justice, whereby the inferior powers of the soul were subject to the reason, and the body to the soul. Now passibility and mortality of body were in Christ. Therefore there was also the fomes of sin.

Obj. 2. Further, as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 19),¹ "it was by consent of the Divine will that the flesh of Christ was allowed to suffer and do what was proper to it." But it is proper to the flesh to lust after its pleasures. Now since the fomes of sin is nothing more than concupiscence, as the gloss says² on Rom. 7. 8, it seems that in Christ there was the fomes of sin.

Obj. 3. Further 't is by reason of the fomes of sin that the flesh lusteth against the spirit, as is written (Gal. 5. 17). But the spirit is shown to be so much the stronger and worthier to be crowned according as the more completely it overcomes its enemy—namely, the concupiscence of the flesh, according to II Tim. 2, 5, he is not crowned except he strive lawfully. Now Christ had a most valiant and conquering spirit, and one most worthy of a crown, according to Apoc. 6. 2: There was a crown given Him, and He went forth conquering that He might conquer. Therefore it would especially seem that the fomes of sin ought to have been in Christ.

On the contrary, It is written (Matt. 1. 20): That which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost. Now the Holy Ghost drives out sin and the inclination to sin, which is implied in the word fomes. Therefore in Christ there ought not to have been the fomes of sin.

I answer that, As was said above (Q. VII, AA. 2, 9), Christ had grace and all the virtues most perfectly. Now moral virtues, which are in the irrational part of the soul, make it subject to reason, and so much the more as the virtue is more perfect; thus, temperance controls the concupiscible appetite, fortitude and meekness the irascible appetite, as was said in the Second Part (I-II, Q. LVI, A. 4). But there belongs to the very nature of the fomes of sin an inclination of the sensual appetite to what is contrary to reason. And hence it is plain that the more perfect the virtues are in any man, the weaker the fomes of sin becomes in him. Hence, since in Christ the virtues were in their highest degree, the fomes of sin was not in Him; because also this defect cannot be ordered to satisfaction, but rather inclined to what is contrary to satisfaction.

Reply Obj. 1. The inferior powers pertaining to the sensitive appetite have a natural capacity to be obedient to reason; but not the bodily powers, nor those of the bodily humours, nor those of the vegetative soul, as is made plain in the Ethics.³ And hence perfection of virtue, which is in accordance with right reason, does not exclude passibility of body; yet it excludes the fomes of sin, the nature of which consists in the resistance of the sensitive appetite to reason.

Reply Obj. 2. The flesh naturally desires what is pleasing to it by the concupiscence of the sensitive appetite; but the flesh of man, who is a rational animal, desires this after the manner and order of reason. And thus with the concupiscence of the sensitive appetite Christ's flesh naturally sought food, drink, and sleep, and all else that is sought according to right reason, as is plain from Damascene (De Fide Orthod. iii, 14).⁴ Yet it does not therefore follow that in Christ there was the fomes of sin, for this implies the lust after pleasurable things against the order of reason.

Reply Obj. 3. The spirit gives evidence of fortitude to some extent by resisting that concupiscence of the flesh which is opposed to it; yet a greater fortitude of spirit is shown if by its strength the flesh is thoroughly overcome, so as to be incapable of lusting against the spirit. And hence this belonged to Christ, whose spirit reached the highest degree of fortitude. And although He suffered no internal assault on the part of the fomes of sin, He sustained an external assault on the part of the world and the devil, and won the crown of victory by overcoming them.

ARTICLE 3. Whether in Christ There Was Ignorance?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that there was ignorance in Christ.

Objection 1. For that is truly in Christ which belongs to Him in His human nature, although it does not belong to Him in His Divine Nature, as suffering and death. But ignorance belongs to Christ in His human nature; for Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 21)¹ that "He assumed an ignorant and enslaved nature." Therefore ignorance was truly in Christ.

Obj. 2. Further, one is said to be ignorant through defect of knowledge. Now some kind of knowledge was wanting to Christ, for the Apostle says (II Cor. 5, 21) Him that knew no sin, for us He hath made sin. Therefore there was ignorance in Christ.

Obj. 3. Further, it is written (Isa. 8, 4): For before the child know to call his father and his mother, the strength of Damascus . . . shall be taken away. Therefore in Christ there was ignorance of certain things.

On the contrary, Ignorance is not taken away by ignorance. But Christ came to take away our ignorance; for He came to enlighten them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death (Luke 1, 79). Therefore there was no ignorance in Christ.

I answer that, As there was the fulness of grace and virtue in Christ, so too there was the fulness of all knowledge, as is plain from what has been said above (Q. VII, AA. 2, 5, 7, 8; QQ. IX-XII). Now as the fulness of grace and virtue in Christ excluded the fomes of sin, so the fulness of knowledge excluded ignorance, which is opposed to knowledge. Hence, even as the fomes of sin was not in Christ, neither was there ignorance in Him.

Reply Obj. 1. The nature assumed by Christ may be viewed in two ways. First, in its specific nature, and thus Damascene calls it "ignorant and enslaved"; hence he adds: "For man's nature is a slave of Him (that is, God) Who made it; and it has no knowledge of future things." Secondly, it may be considered with regard to what it has from its union with the Divine hypostasis, from which it has the fulness of knowledge and grace, according to John 1, 14: We saw Him (Vulg., His glory) as it were the Only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth; and in this way the human nature in Christ was not affected with ignorance.

Reply Obj. 2. Christ is said not to have known sin, because He did not know it by experience; but He knew it by simple knowledge.

Reply Obj. 3. The prophet is speaking in this passage of the human knowledge of Christ; for he says: Before the Child (that is, in His human nature) know to call His father (that is, Joseph, who was His reputed father), and His mother (that is, Mary), the strength of Da- mascus . . . shall be taken away. Nor are we to understand this as if He had been some time a man without knowing it, but before He know (that is, before He is a man having human knowledge),—literally, the strength of Damascus and the spoils of Samaria shall be taken away by the King of the Assyrians—or spiritually, "before His birth He will save His people solely by invocation," as a gloss expounds it.²

Augustine however says³ that this was fulfilled in the adoration of the Magi. For he says: "Before He uttered human words in human flesh, He received the strength of Damascus, that is, the riches which Damascus vaunted (for in riches the first place is given to gold). They themselves were the spoils of Samaria. Because Samaria is taken to signify idolatry, since this people, having turned away from the Lord, turned to the worship of idols. Hence these were the first spoils which the child took from the domination of idolatry." And in this way "before the child know" may be taken to mean "before he show himself to know."

ARTICLE 4. Whether Christ's Soul Was Passible?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that the soul of Christ was not passible.

Objection 1 For nothing suffers except by reason of something stronger, since "the agent is greater than the patient," as is clear from Augustine (Gen. ad lit. xii, 16),⁴ and from the Philosopher.⁵ Now no creature was stronger than Christ's soul. Therefore Christ's soul could not suffer at the hands of any creature; and hence it was not passible, for its capability of suffering would have been to no purpose if it could not have suffered at the hands of anything.

Obj. 2. Further, Tully (De Tusc. Quæst. III, 10)⁶ says that the soul's passions are ailments. But Christ's soul had no ailment; for the soul's ailment results from sin, as is plain from Ps. 40, 5: Heal my soul, for I have sinned against Thee. Therefore in Christ's soul there were no passions.

Obj. 3. Further, the soul's passions would seem to be the same as the fomes of sin, hence the Apostle (Rom. 7, 5) calls them the passions of sins. Now the fomes of sin was not in Christ, as was said (A. 2). Therefore it seems that there were no passions in His soul; and hence His soul was not passible.

² Glossa interl. (IV, 22v); Jerome, In Isaiam (PL 24, 118).

³ Serm., CCII, 2 (PL 38, 1034).

⁵ Soul, III, 5 (430^a18).

⁴ PL 34, 467.

⁶ DD IV, 7.

On the contrary, It is written (Ps. 87. 4) in the person of Christ: My soul is filled with evils—not sins, indeed, but human evils—that is, “pains,” as a gloss expounds it.¹ Hence the soul of Christ was passible.

I answer that, A soul placed in a body may suffer in two ways: first with a bodily passion; secondly, with an animal passion. It suffers with a bodily passion through bodily hurt; for since the soul is the form of the body, soul and body have but one being, and hence, when the body is disturbed by any bodily passion, the soul, too, must be accidentally disturbed—that is, in the being which it has in the body. Therefore, since Christ's body was passible and mortal, as was said above (Q. XIV, AA. 1, 2), His soul also was of necessity passible in like manner.

But the soul is said to suffer with an animal passion in its operation,—either as it is proper to the soul, or as it is of the soul more than of the body. And although the soul is said to suffer in this way through sensation and understanding, as was said in the Second Part (I-II, Q. XXII, A. 3; Q. XXV, A. 1), nevertheless the affections of the sensitive appetite are most properly called passions of the soul. Now these were in Christ, even as all else pertaining to man's nature. Hence Augustine says:² “Our Lord having designed to live in the form of a servant, took these upon Himself whenever He judged they ought to be assumed; for there was no false human affection in Him Who had a true body and a true human soul.”

Nevertheless we must know that these passions were in Christ otherwise than in us, in three ways. First, as regards the object, since in us these passions very often tend towards what is unlawful, but not so in Christ. Secondly, as regards the principle, since these passions in us frequently forestall the judgment of reason, but in Christ all movements of the sensitive appetite sprang from the disposition of the reason. Hence Augustine says³ that “Christ assumed these movements in His human soul by an unfailing dispensation, when He willed; even as He became man when He willed.” Thirdly, as regards the effect, because in us these movements, at times, do not remain in the sensitive appetite, but deflect the reason; but not so in Christ, since by His disposition the movements that are naturally becoming to human flesh so remained in the sensitive appetite that the reason was in no way hindered in doing what was right. Hence Jerome says⁴ that “Our Lord, in order to prove the reality of the assumed manhood, ‘was sorrowful’ in very deed; yet lest a passion should hold sway over His soul, it is by a propassion that He is said to have ‘begun to grow sorrowful and to be sad’”; so that it is a perfect passion when it dominates the soul—that is, the reason; and a propassion when it has its beginning in the sensitive appetite, but goes no further.

Reply Obj. 1. The soul of Christ could have prevented these passions from coming upon it, and especially by the Divine power; yet of His own will He subjected Himself to these corporeal and animal passions.

Reply Obj. 2. Tully is speaking there according to the opinions of the Stoics,⁵ who did not give the name of passions to all but only to the disorderly movements of the sensitive appetite. Now, it is manifest that passions like these were not in Christ.

Reply Obj. 3. The passions of sins are movements of the sensitive appetite that tend to unlawful things; and these were not in Christ, as neither was the fomes of sin.

ARTICLE 5. Whether There Was Sensible Pain in Christ?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that there was no true sensible pain in Christ.

Objection 1. For Hilary says (De Trin. x):⁶ “Since with Christ to die was life, what pain may He be supposed to have suffered in the sacrament of His death, Who bestows life on such as die for Him?” And further on he says:⁷ “The Only-begotten assumed true man, not ceasing to be God; and although blows struck Him and wounds were inflicted on Him, and scourges fell upon Him, and the cross lifted Him up, yet these wrought in deed the vehemence of the passion, but brought no pain.” Hence there was no true pain in Christ.

Obj. 2. Further, it would seem to be proper to flesh conceived in original sin to be subject to the necessity of pain. But the flesh of Christ was not conceived in sin, but of the Holy Ghost in the Virgin's womb. Therefore it lay under no necessity of suffering pain.

Obj. 3. Further, the delight of the contemplation of Divine things dulls the sense of pain; hence the martyrs in their passions bore up more patiently by thinking of the Divine love. But Christ's soul was in the perfect enjoyment of contemplating God, Whom He saw in essence, as was said above (Q. IX, A. 2). Therefore He could feel no pain.

On the contrary, It is written (Isa. 53. 4): Surely He hath borne our infirmities and carried our sorrows.

I answer that, As is plain from what has been said in the Second Part (I-II, Q. xxxv, A. 7), for true bodily pain are required bodily hurt and the sense of hurt. Now Christ's body was able to be hurt, since it was passible and mortal, as above stated (Q. XIV, AA. 1, 2); neither was the sense of hurt wanting to it, since Christ's soul possessed perfectly all natural powers. Therefore no one should doubt but that in Christ there was true pain.

Reply Obj. 1. In all these and similar words, Hilary does not intend to exclude the reality of the pain, but the necessity of it. Hence after the foregoing he adds:¹ "Nor, when He thirsted, or hungered, or wept, was the Lord seen to drink, or eat, or grieve. But in order to prove the reality of the body, the body's customs were assumed, so that the custom of our body was atoned for by the custom of our nature. Or when He took drink or food, He acceded, not to the body's necessity, but to its custom." And he uses the word "necessity" in reference to the first cause of these defects, which is sin, as above stated (Q. XIV, AA. 1, 3), so that Christ's flesh is said not to have lain under the necessity of these defects, in the sense that there was no sin in it. Hence he adds: "For He (that is, Christ) had a body—one proper to His origin, which did not exist through the unholiness of our conception, but subsisted in the form of our body by the strength of His power." But as regards the proximate cause of these defects, which is composition of contraries, the flesh of Christ lay under the necessity of these defects, as was said above (Q. XIV, A. 2).

Reply Obj. 2. Flesh conceived in sin is subject to pain, not merely on account of the necessity of its natural principles, but from the necessity of the guilt of sin. Now this necessity was not in Christ, but only the necessity of natural principles.

Reply Obj. 3. As was said above (Q. XIV, A. 1, reply 2), by the power of the Godhead of Christ Happiness was kept in the soul, so as not to overflow into the body, lest His passibility and mortality should be taken away; and for the same reason the delight of contemplation was so kept in the mind as not to overflow into the sensitive powers, lest sensible pain should thereby be prevented.

ARTICLE 6. Whether There Was Sorrow in Christ?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that in Christ there was no sorrow.

Objection 1. For it is written of Christ (Isa. 42. 4): He shall not be sad nor troublesome.

Obj. 2. Further, it is written (Prov. 12. 21): Whatever shall befall the just man, it shall not make him sad. And the reason of this the Stoics asserted² to be that no one is saddened save by the loss of his goods. Now the just man esteems only justice and virtue as his goods, and these he cannot lose; otherwise the just man would be subject to fortune if he was saddened by the loss of the goods fortune has given him. But Christ was most just, according to Jer. 23. 6: This is the name that they shall call Him: The Lord, our just one. Therefore there was no sorrow in Him.

Obj. 3. Further, the Philosopher says³ that "all sorrow is evil, and to be shunned." But in Christ there was no evil to be shunned. Therefore there was no sorrow in Christ.

Obj. 4. Furthermore, as Augustine says:⁴ "Sorrow regards the things we suffer unwillingly." But Christ suffered nothing against His will, for it is written (Isa. 53. 7): He was offered because it was His own will. Hence there was no sorrow in Christ.

On the contrary, Our Lord said (Matt. 26. 38): My soul is sorrowful even unto death. And Ambrose says (De Trin. ii, 7)⁵ that "as a man He had sorrow; for He bore my sorrow. I call it sorrow, fearlessly, since I preach the cross."

I answer that, As was said above (A. 5, reply 3), by Divine dispensation the joy of contemplation remained in Christ's mind so as not to overflow into the sensitive powers, and thereby shut out sensible pain. Now even as sensible pain is in the sensitive appetite, so also is sorrow. But there is a difference of motive or object; for the object and motive of pain is hurt perceived by the sense of touch, as when anyone is wounded, but the object and motive of sorrow is anything hurtful or evil interiorly apprehended either by the reason or the imagination, as was said in the Second Part (I-II, Q. xxxv, AA. 2, 7), as when anyone grieves over the loss of grace or money. Now Christ's soul could apprehend things inwardly as hurtful either to Himself, as His passion and death,—or to others, as the sin of His disciples, or of the Jews that killed Him. And hence, as there could be true pain in Christ, so too could there be true sorrow; otherwise, indeed, than in us, in the three ways above stated (A. 4), when we were speaking of the passions of Christ's soul in general.

Reply Obj. 1. Sorrow was not in Christ, as a perfect passion; yet it was in Him in a state of beginning as a propassion. Hence it is written (Matt. 26. 37): He began to grow sorrowful and to be sad. For "it is one thing to be sorrowful and another to grow sorrowful," as Jerome says, on this text.¹

Reply Obj. 2. As Augustine says,² for the three passions, desire, joy, and fear, the Stoics held three εὐπαθείας—that is, good passions—in the soul of the wise man: namely, for desire, will; for joy, delight; for fear, caution. But as regards sorrow, they denied it could be in the soul of the wise man... for sorrow regards evil already present, and they thought that no evil could befall a wise man; and they denied this because they believed that only the virtuous is good, since it makes men good, and that nothing is evil except what is sinful, whereby men become wicked.

Now although what is virtuous is man's chief good, and what is sinful is man's chief evil, since these pertain to reason, which is supreme in man, yet there are certain secondary goods of man, which pertain to the body, or to the exterior things that minister to the body. And hence in the soul of the wise man there may be sorrow in the sensitive appetite by his apprehending these evils, without this sorrow disturbing the reason. And in this way are we to understand that whatsoever shall befall the just man, it shall not make him sad, because his reason is troubled by no misfortune. And thus Christ's sorrow was a propassion, and not a passion.

Reply Obj. 3. All sorrow is an evil of punishment; but it is not always an evil of fault, except only when it proceeds from an inordinate affection. Hence Augustine says:³ "Whenever these affections follow reason, and are caused when and where needed, who will dare to call them diseases or vicious passions?"

Reply Obj. 4. There is no reason why a thing may not of itself be contrary to the will, and yet be willed by reason of the end to which it is ordered, as bitter medicine is not of itself desired, but only as it is ordered to health. And thus Christ's death and passion were of themselves involuntary, and caused sorrow, although they were voluntary as ordered to the end, which is the redemption of the human race.

ARTICLE 7. Whether There Was Fear in Christ?

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It would seem that there was no fear in Christ.

Objection 1. For it is written (Prov. 28. 1): The just, bold as a lion, shall be without dread. But Christ was most just. Therefore there was no fear in Christ.

Obj. 2. Further, Hilary says (De Trin. x):⁴ "I ask those who think thus, does it stand to reason that He should dread to die, Who by expelling all dread of death from the Apostles, encouraged them to the glory of martyrdom?" Therefore it is unreasonable that there should be fear in Christ.

Obj. 3. Further, fear seems only to regard what a man cannot avoid. Now Christ could have avoided both the evil of punishment which He endured, and the evil of fault which befell others. Therefore there was no fear in Christ.

On the contrary, It is written (Mark 14. 33): Jesus began to fear and to be heavy.

I answer that, As sorrow is caused by the apprehension of a present evil, so also is fear caused by the apprehension of a future evil. Now the apprehension of a future evil, if the evil be quite certain, does not arouse fear. Hence the Philosopher says⁵ that we do not fear a thing unless there is some hope of avoiding it. For when there is no hope of avoiding it the evil is considered present, and thus it causes sorrow rather than fear. Hence fear may be considered in two ways. First, according as the sensitive appetite naturally shrinks from bodily hurt, by sorrow if it is present, and by fear if it is future; and thus fear was in Christ, even as sorrow. Secondly, fear may be considered in the uncertainty of the future event, "as when at night we are frightened at a sound, not knowing what it is"; and in this way there was no fear in Christ, as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii. 23).⁶

Reply Obj. 1. The just man is said to be without dread in so far as dread implies a perfect passion drawing man from what reason dictates. And thus fear was not in Christ, but only as a propassion. Hence it is said (Mark 14. 33) that Jesus began to fear and to be heavy, with a passion, as Jerome expounds.¹

Reply Obj. 2. Hilary² excludes fear from Christ in the same way that he excludes sorrow—that is, as regards the necessity of fearing. And yet to show the reality of His human nature, He voluntarily assumed fear, even as sorrow.

Reply Obj. 3. Although Christ could have avoided future evils by the power of His Godhead, yet they were unavoidable, or not easily avoidable by the weakness of the flesh.

ARTICLE 8. Whether There Was Wonder in Christ?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It would seem that in Christ there was no wonder.

Objection 1. For the Philosopher says³ that wonder results when we see an effect without knowing its cause; and thus wonder belongs only to the ignorant. Now there was no ignorance in Christ, as was said (A. 3). Therefore there was no wonder in Christ.

Obj. 2. Further, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. ii, 15)⁴ that “wonder is fear springing from the imagination of something great”; and hence the Philosopher says⁵ that “the magnanimous man does not wonder.” But Christ was most magnanimous. Therefore there was no wonder in Christ.

Obj. 3. Further, no man wonders at what he himself can do. Now Christ could do whatsoever was great. Therefore it seems that He wondered at nothing.

On the contrary, It is written (Matt. 8. 10): Jesus hearing this—that is, the words of the centurion—marvelled.

I answer that, Wonder properly regards what is new and unusual. Now there could be nothing new and unusual as regards Christ's Divine knowledge; nor as regards the human knowledge whereby He knew things in the Word, or by which He saw things by infused species. Yet things could be new and unusual with regard to His experimental knowledge, in regard to which new things could occur to Him day by day. Hence, if we speak of Christ with respect to His Divine knowledge, and His beatific and even His infused knowledge, there was no wonder in Christ. But if we speak of Him with respect to experimental knowledge, wonder could be in Him; and He assumed this affection for our instruction—that is, in order to teach us to wonder at what He Himself wondered at. Hence Augustine says (Super Gen. cont. Manich. i, 8)⁶: “Our Lord wondered in order to show us that we, who still need to be so affected, must wonder. Hence all these emotions are not signs of a disturbed mind, but of a Master teaching.”

Reply Obj. 1. Although Christ was ignorant of nothing, yet new things might occur to His experimental knowledge, and thus wonder would be caused.

Reply Obj. 2. Christ did not marvel at the Centurion's faith as if it was great with respect to Himself, but because it was great with respect to others.

Reply Obj. 3. He could do all things by the Divine power, for with respect to this there was no wonder in Him, but only with respect to His human experimental knowledge, as was said above.

ARTICLE 9. Whether There Was Anger in Christ?

We proceed thus to the Ninth Article: It would seem that there was no anger in Christ.

Objection 1. For it is written (Jas. 1. 20): The anger of man worketh not the justice of God. Now whatever was in Christ pertained to the justice of God, since of Him it is written (I Cor. 1. 30): For He (Vulg., Who) of God is made unto us . . . justice. Therefore it seems that there was no anger in Christ.

Obj. 2. Further, anger is opposed to meekness, as is plain from the Ethics.⁷ But Christ was meek. Therefore there was no anger in Him.

Obj. 3. Further, Gregory says (Moral. v, 45)⁸ that “anger that comes of evil blinds the eye of the mind, but anger that comes of zeal disturbs it.” Now the mind's eye in Christ was neither blinded nor disturbed. Therefore in Christ there was neither sinful anger nor zealous anger.

On the contrary, It is written (John 2. 17) that the words of Ps. 68. 10, the zeal of Thy house hath eaten me up, were fulfilled in Him.

I answer that, As was said in the Second Part (I-II, Q. XLVI, A. 3, reply 3, and II-II, Q. CLVIII, A. 2, reply 3), anger is an effect of sorrow. For when sorrow is inflicted upon someone, there arises within him a desire of the sensitive appetite to repel this injury brought upon himself or others. Hence anger is a passion composed of sorrow and the desire of revenge. Now it was said (A. 6) that sorrow could be in Christ. As to the desire of revenge it is sometimes with sin—that is, when anyone seeks revenge beyond the order of reason; and in this way anger could not be in Christ, for this kind of anger is called sinful anger.¹ Sometimes, however, this desire is without sin—indeed is praiseworthy—for example, when anyone seeks revenge according to the order justice, and this is called zealous anger.² For Augustine says³ that “he is eaten up by zeal for the house of God, who seeks to better whatever He sees to be evil in it, and if he cannot right it, bears with it and sighs.” Such was the anger that was in Christ.

Reply Obj. 1. As Gregory says (Moral. v., 45),⁴ anger is in man in two ways.—sometimes it forestalls reason, and causes it to operate, and in this way it is properly said “to work.” for operations are attributed to the principal agent. It is in this way that we must understand that the anger of man worketh not the justice of God. Sometimes anger follows reason, and is, as it were, its instrument, and then the operation, which pertains to justice, is not attributed to anger but to reason.

Reply Obj. 2. It is the anger which outsteps the bounds of reason that is opposed to meekness, and not the anger which is controlled and brought within its proper bounds by reason, for meekness holds the mean in anger.

Reply Obj. 3. In us the natural order is that the soul's powers mutually impede each other—that is, if the operation of one power is intense, the operation of the other is weakened. This is the reason why any movement whatsoever of anger, even if it be tempered by reason, dims the mind's eye of him who contemplates. But in Christ, by control of the Divine power, every power was allowed to do what was proper to it, and one power was not impeded by another. Hence, as the joy of His mind in contemplation did not impede the sorrow or pain of the inferior part, so, conversely, the passions of the inferior part in no way impeded the act of reason.

ARTICLE 10. Whether Christ Was At Once a Wayfarer and a Comprehensor?

We proceed thus to the Tenth Article: It would seem that Christ was not at once a wayfarer and a comprehensor.

Objection 1. For it belongs to a wayfarer to be moving toward the end of Happiness, and to a comprehensor it belongs to be resting in the end. Now to be moving towards the end and to be resting in the end cannot belong to the same. Therefore Christ could not be at once wayfarer and comprehensor.

³ Tract., x, on John 2.17 (PL 35, 1471). ⁴ PL 75, 725.

Obj. 2. Further, to tend to Happiness, or to obtain it, does not pertain to man's body, but to his soul; hence Augustine says (Ep. ad Dios. cxviii.)⁵ that “upon the inferior nature, which is the body, there overflows, not indeed the Happiness which belongs to such as enjoy and understand, the fulness of health, that is, the vigour of incorruption.” Now although Christ had a passible body, He fully enjoyed God in His mind. Therefore Christ was not a wayfarer but a comprehensor.

Obj. 3. Further, the Saints, whose souls are in heaven and whose bodies are in the tomb, enjoy Happiness in their souls, although their bodies are subject to death, yet they are called not wayfarers, but only comprehensors. Hence, with equal reason would it seem that Christ was a pure comprehensor and in no way a wayfarer, since His mind enjoyed God although His body was mortal.

On the contrary, It is written (Jer. 14. 8): Why wilt Thou be as a stranger in the land, and as a wayfaring man turning in to lodge?

I answer that, A man is called a wayfarer from tending to Happiness, and a comprehensor from having already obtained Happiness, according to I Cor. 9. 24: So run that you may comprehend (Douay, obtain); and Phil 3. 12: I follow after, if by any means I may comprehend (Douay, obtain). Now man's perfect Happiness consists in both soul and body, as stated in the Second Part (I-II, q. iv, a. 6). In the soul, as regards what is proper to it, according as the mind sees and enjoys God; in the body, according as the body will rise spiritual in power and glory and incorruption, as is written I Cor. 15. 42. Now before His passion Christ's mind saw God fully, and thus He had Happiness as far as it regards what is proper to the soul; but Happiness was wanting with regard to all else, since His soul was passible, and His body both passible and mortal, as is clear from the above (A. 4; Q. XIV, AA. 1, 2). Hence He was at once comprehensor, since He had the Happiness proper to the soul, and at the same time wayfarer, since He was tending to Happiness as regards what was wanting to His Happiness.

Reply Obj. 1. It is impossible to be moving towards the end and resting in the end in the same respect; but there is nothing against this under a different respect, as when a man is at once a knower with regard to what he already knows, and yet is a learner with regard to what he does not know.

Reply Obj. 2. Happiness principally and properly belongs to the soul with regard to the mind, yet secondarily and, so to say, instrumentally, bodily goods are required for Happiness; thus the Philosopher says¹ that exterior goods minister organically to Happiness.

Reply Obj. 3. There is no parity between the soul of a saint and of Christ, for two reasons: first, because the souls of saints are not passible, as Christ's soul was; secondly, because their bodies do nothing by which they tend to Happiness, as Christ by His bodily sufferings tended to Happiness as regards the glory of His body.

QUESTION XVI

OF THE CONSEQUENCES OF THE UNION WITH REGARD TO THOSE THINGS WHICH ARE APPLICABLE TO CHRIST IN HIS BEING AND BECOMING
(In Twelve Articles)

WE must now consider the consequences of the union: and first as to what belongs to Christ in Himself; secondly, as to what belongs to Christ in relation to God the Father (Q. xx); thirdly, as to what belongs to Christ in relation to us (Q. xxv).

Concerning the first, there occurs a twofold consideration. The first is about such things as belong to Christ according to being and becoming; the second regards such things as belong to Christ by reason of unity (Q. xvii).

Under the first head there are twelve points of inquiry: (1) Whether this is true: God is man? (2) Whether this is true: Man is God? (3) Whether Christ may be called a lordly man? (4) Whether what belongs⁴ to the Son of Man may be predicated of the Son of God, and conversely? (5) Whether what belongs to the Son of Man may be predicated of the Divine Nature, and what belongs to the Son of God of the human nature? (6) Whether this is true: The Son of God was made man? (7) Whether this is true: Man was made God? (8) Whether this is true: Christ is a creature? (9) Whether this is true: This man, pointing out Christ, began to be? or always was? (10) Whether this is true: Christ as man is a creature? (11) Whether this is true: Christ as man is God? (12) Whether this is true: Christ as man is a hypostasis or person?

ARTICLE 1. Whether This Is True: "God Is Man"?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that this is false: God is man.

¹ Ethics, I, 8 (1090³⁰).

Objection 1. For every affirmative proposition in remote matter is false. Now this proposition, God is man, is in remote matter, since the forms signified by the subject and predicate are most widely apart. Therefore, since the aforesaid proposition is affirmative, it would seem to be false.

Obj. 2. Further, the three Divine Persons are in greater mutual agreement than the human nature and the Divine. But in the mystery of the Incarnation one Person is not predicated of another; for we do not say that the Father is the Son, or conversely. Therefore it seems that the human nature ought not to be predicated of God by saying that God is man.

Obj. 3. Further, Athanasius says (Symb. Fid.)² that, "as the soul and the flesh are one man, so are God and man one Christ." But this is false: The soul is the body. Therefore this also is false: God is man.

Obj. 4. Further, it was said in the First Part (Q. xxxix, A. 4) that what is predicated of God not relatively but absolutely, belongs to the whole Trinity and to each of the Persons. But this word man is not relative, but absolute. Hence, if it is predicated of God, it would follow that the whole Trinity and each of the Persons is man; and this is clearly false.

On the contrary, It is written (Phil. 2 6, 7): Who being in the form of God, . . . emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of man, and in habit found as a man; and thus He Who is in the form of God is man. Now He Who is in the form of God is God. Therefore God is man.

I answer that, This proposition, God is man, is admitted by all Christians, yet not in the same way by all. For some admit the proposition, but not in the proper acceptance of the terms. Thus the Manicheans say³ the Word of God is man, not indeed true, but fictitious man, since they say that the Son of God assumed an imaginary body, and thus God is called man as a bronze figure is called man if it has the figure of a man. So, too, those who held that Christ's body and soul were not united⁴ could not say that God is true man, but that He is figuratively called man by reason of the parts. Now both these opinions were disproved above (Q. II, A. 5; Q. V, AA. 1, 2).

Some, on the contrary, hold the reality on the part of man, but deny the reality on the part of ² Cf. Creed "Quicumque" (MA II, 1355; DZ 40).

³ Cf. Augustine, Confessions, v, 20 (PL 32, 716); De Haeres, XLVI (PL 42, 37); cf. above, Q. V, A. 2.

⁴ Cf. Q. II, A. 6.

God. For they say¹ that Christ, Who is God and man, is God not naturally, but by participation—that is, by grace, even as all other holy men are called gods, Christ being more excellently so than the rest, on account of His more abundant grace. And thus, when it is said that God is man, God does not stand for the true and natural God. And this is the heresy of Photinus, which was disproved above (Q. 11, A. 11).

But some admit this proposition, together with the reality of both terms, holding that Christ is true God and true man; yet they do not preserve the truth of the predication. For they say that man is predicated of God by reason of a certain conjunction either of dignity, or of authority, or of affection or indwelling. It was thus that Nestorius held God to be man,² nothing further being meant than that God is joined to man by such a conjunction that man is dwelt in by God, and united to Him in affection, and in a share of the Divine authority and honour. And into the same error fall those who suppose two supposita or hypostases in Christ,³ since it is impossible to understand how, of two things distinct in suppositum or hypostasis, one can be properly predicated of the other, except by a figurative expression, in so far as they are united in something, as if we were to say that Peter is John because they are somehow mutually joined together. And these opinions also were disproved above (Q. 11, AA. 3, 6).

Hence, supposing the truth of the Catholic belief, that the true Divine Nature is united with true human nature not only in person, but also in suppositum or hypostasis, we say that this proposition is true and proper, God is man—not only by the truth of its terms—that is, because Christ is true God and true man, but by the truth of the predication. For a word signifying the common nature in the concrete may stand for all contained in the common nature, as this word man may stand for any individual man. And thus this word God, from its very mode of signification, may stand for the Person of the Son of God, as was said in the First Part (Q. xxxix, A. 4). Now of every suppositum of any nature we may truly and properly predicate a word signifying that nature in the concrete, as man may properly and truly be predicated of Socrates and Plato. Hence, since the Person of the Son of God for Whom this word God stands, is a suppositum of human nature, this word man may be truly and properly predicated of this word God, as it stands for the Person of the Son of God.

Reply Obj. 1. When different forms cannot come together in one suppositum, the proposition is necessarily in remote matter, the subject signifying one form and the predicate another. But when two forms can come together in one suppositum, the matter is not remote, but natural or contingent, as when I say: Something white is musical. Now the Divine and human natures, although most widely apart, nevertheless come together by the mystery of the Incarnation in one suppositum, in which neither exists accidentally, but [both] essentially. Hence this proposition, God is man, is neither in remote nor in contingent, but in natural matter; and man is not predicated of God accidentally, but essentially, as being predicated of its hypostasis—not, indeed, by reason of the form signified by this word God, but by reason of the suppositum, which is a hypostasis of human nature.

Reply Obj. 2. The three Divine Persons agree in one Nature, and are distinguished in suppositum; and hence they are not predicated one of another. But in the mystery of the Incarnation the natures, being distinct, are not predicated one of the other in the abstract. For the Divine Nature is not the human nature. But because they agree in suppositum, they are predicated of each other in the concrete.

Reply Obj. 3. "Soul" and "flesh" are taken in the abstract, even as Godhead and manhood; but in the concrete we say "animate" and "carnal" or "corporeal," as, on the other hand, "God" and "man." Hence in both cases the abstract is not predicated of the abstract, but only the concrete of the concrete.

Reply Obj. 4. This word man is predicated of God because of the union in person, and this union implies a relation. Hence it does not follow the rule of those words which are absolutely predicated of God from eternity.

ARTICLE 2. Whether This Is True: "Man Is God"?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that this is false: Man is God.

Objection 1. For God is an incommunicable name; hence (Wisd. 13. 10; 14. 21) idolaters are rebuked for giving the name of God, which is incommunicable, to wood and stones. Hence with equal reason does it seem unbecoming that this word God should be predicated of man.

Obj. 2. Further, whatever is predicated of the predicate may be predicated of the subject. But this is true: God is the Father, or: God is the Trinity. Therefore, if it is true that Man is God, it seems that this also is true: Man is the Father, or: Man is the Trinity. But these are false. Therefore the first is false.

Obj. 3. Further, it is written (Ps. 80. 10): There shall be no new God in thee. But man is something new, for Christ was not always man. Therefore this is false: Man is God.

On the contrary. It is written (Rom. 9. 5): Of whom is Christ according to the flesh, Who is over all things, God blessed for ever. Now Christ, according to the flesh, is man. Therefore this is true. Man is God.

I answer that, Granted the reality of both natures—that is, Divine and human—and of the union in person and hypostasis, this is true and proper: Man is God, even as this: God is man. For this word man may stand for any hypostasis of human nature, and thus it may stand for the Person of the Son of God, Whom we say is a hypostasis of human nature. Now it is manifest that the word God is truly and properly predicated of the Person of the Son of God, as was said in the First Part (q. xxxix, A. 4). Hence it remains that this is true and proper: Man is God.

Reply Obj. 1. Idolaters attributed the name of the Deity to stones and wood considered in their own nature, because they thought there was something divine in them. But we do not attribute the name of the Deity to the man in His human nature, but in the eternal suppositum, which by union is also a suppositum of human nature, as stated above.

Reply Obj. 2. This word Father is predicated of this word God according as this word God stands for the Person of the Father. And in this way it is not predicated of the Person of the Son, because the Person of the Son is not the Person of the Father. And, consequently, it is not necessary that this word Father be predicated of this word Man, of which the word God is predicated, since Man stands for the Person of the Son.

Reply Obj. 3. Although the human nature in Christ is something new, yet the suppositum of the human nature is not new, but eternal. And because this word God is predicated of man not on account of the human nature, but by reason of the suppositum, it does not follow that we assert a new God. But this would follow, if we held that Man stands for a created suppositum; even as must be said by those who assert that there are two supposita in Christ.¹

ARTICLE 3. Whether Christ Can Be Called a Lordly Man?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that Christ can be called a lordly man.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (Qq. lxxxiii. qu. 36)² that “we are to be counselled to hope for the goods that were in the Lordly Man,” and he is speaking of Christ. Therefore it seems that Christ was a lordly man.

Obj. 2. Further, as lordship belongs to Christ by reason of His Divine Nature, so does manhood belong to the human nature. Now God is said to be humanized, as is plain from Damascene (De Fide Orthod. iii, 11),⁴ where he says that “being humanized manifests the conjunction with man.” Hence with like reason may it be said denominatively that this man is lordly.

Obj. 3. Further, as lordly is derived from lord, so is Divine derived from Deus (God). But Dionysius (Eccl. Hier. iv)⁵ calls Christ “the most Divine Jesus.” Therefore with like reason may Christ be called a lordly man.

On the contrary, Augustine says (Retract. i, 19):⁶ “I do not see that we may rightly call Jesus Christ a lordly man, since He is the Lord Himself.”

I answer that, As was said above (A. 2, reply 3), when we say “the Man Christ Jesus,” we signify the eternal suppositum, which is the Person of the Son of God, because there is only one suppositum of both natures. Now God and Lord are predicated essentially of the Son of God, and hence they ought not to be predicated denominatively, since this takes away from the truth of the union. Hence, since we say lordly denominatively from lord, it cannot truly and properly be said that this Man is lordly, but rather that He is Lord. But if, when we say “the Man Christ Jesus,” we mean a created suppositum, as those who assert two supposita in Christ,⁷ this man might be called lordly, since he is assumed to a participation of Divine honour, as the Nestorians said.⁸ And, even in this way, the human nature is not called “divine”

² The question is hardly apposite in English. S. Thomas explains why we can say in Latin, e.g., oratio dominica (the Lord's Prayer) or passio dominica (Our Lord's Passion), but not speak of our Lord as homo dominicus (a lordly man).

⁸ Cf. Nestorius, in Cyril of Alexandria, Dial. cum Nestorio (PG 76, 252); John Damascene, De Fide Orth., III, 2 (PG 94, 988).

by essence, but "deified"—not, indeed, by its being converted into the Divine Nature, but by its conjunction with the Divine Nature in one hypostasis, as is plain from Damascene (De Fide Orthod. iii, 11, 17).¹

Reply Obj. 1. Augustine retracts these and the like words (Retract. i, 19);² hence, after the foregoing words (Retract. ibid.), he adds: "Wherever I have said this"—namely, that Christ Jesus is a lordly man—"I wish it unsaid, having afterwards seen that it ought not to be said, although it may be defended with some reason"—that is, because one might say that He was called a lordly man by reason of the human nature, which this word man signifies, and not by reason of the suppositum.

Reply Obj. 2. This one suppositum, which is of the human and Divine natures, was first of the Divine Nature—that is, from eternity. Afterwards in time it was made a suppositum of human nature by the Incarnation. And for this reason it is said to be humanized—not that it assumed a man, but that it assumed human nature. But the converse of this is not true—namely, that a suppositum of human nature assumed the Divine Nature; hence we may not say a deified or lordly man.

Reply Obj. 3. This word Divine is usually predicated even of things of which the word God is predicated essentially; thus we say that "the Divine Essence is God," by reason of identity; and that "the Essence belongs to God," or is "Divine," on account of the different way of signifying; and we speak of the "Divine Word," though the Word is God. So, too, we say "a Divine Person," just as we say "the person of Plato," on account of its different mode of signification. But lordly is not predicated of those of which lord is predicated; for we are not accustomed to call a man who is a lord, lordly, but whatsoever belongs to a lord is called lordly, as the lordly will, or the lordly hand, or the lordly possession. And hence the man Christ, Who is Our Lord, cannot be called lordly; yet His flesh can be called lordly flesh and His passion the lordly passion.

ARTICLE 4. Whether What Belongs to the Son of Man Can Be Predicated of the Son of God, and Conversely?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that what belongs to the human nature cannot be said of God.

Objection 1. For opposites cannot be said of the same. Now, what belongs to human nature is contrary to what is proper to God, since God is uncreated, immutable, and eternal, and it belongs to the human nature to be created, temporal and mutable. Therefore what belongs to the human nature cannot be said of God.

Obj. 2. Further, to attribute to God what is defective seems to take away from the Divine honour, and to be a blasphemy. Now what pertains to the human nature contains a kind of defect, as to suffer, to die, and the like. Hence it seems that what pertains to the human nature can in no way be said of God.

Obj. 3. Further, to be assumed pertains to the human nature; yet it does not pertain to God. Therefore what belongs to the human nature cannot be said of God.

On the contrary, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 4)³ that "God assumed the idioms" that is, the properties—"of flesh, since God is said to be passible, and the God of glory was crucified."

I answer that, On this question there was a difference of opinion between Nestorians and Catholics. The Nestorians wished to divide words predicated of Christ, in this way—namely, that such as pertained to human nature should not be predicated of God, and that such as pertained to the Divine Nature should not be predicated of the Man. Hence Nestorius said:⁴ "If anyone attempt to attribute sufferings to the Word, let him be anathema." But if there are any words applicable to both natures, of them they predicated what pertained to both natures, as the name "Christ" or "Lord." Hence they granted that Christ was born of a Virgin, and that He was from eternity, but they did not say that God was born of a Virgin, or that the Man was from eternity.

Catholics on the other hand maintained that words which are said of Christ either in His Divine or in His human nature may be said either of God or of man. Hence Cyril says:⁵ "If anyone ascribes to two persons or substances"—that is, hypostases—"such words as are in the evangelical and apostolic Scriptures, or have been said of Christ by the Saints, or by Himself of Himself, and believes that some are to be applied to the Man, and apports some to the Word alone—let him be anathema." And the reason of this is that, since there is one hypostasis of both natures, the same hypostasis is signified by the name of either nature. Thus whether we say man or God, the hypostasis of Divine and human nature is signified. And hence, of the Man may be said what belongs to the Divine Nature, as of a hypostasis of the Divine Nature; and of God may be said what belongs to the human nature, as of a hypostasis of human nature.

Nevertheless, it must be borne in mind that in a proposition in which something is predicated of another, we must not merely consider what the predicate is predicated of, but also the reason of its being predicated. Thus, although we do not distinguish things predicated of Christ, yet we distinguish that by reason of which they are predicated, since those things that belong to the Divine Nature are predicated of Christ in His Divine Nature, and those that belong to the human nature are predicated of Christ in His human nature. Hence Augustine says (De Trin. i, 11):¹ "We must distinguish what is said by Scripture in reference to the form of God, and what in reference to the form of a servant"; and further on he says (13):² "The prudent, careful, and devout reader will discern the reason and point of view of what is said."

Reply Obj. 1. It is impossible for opposites to be predicated of the same in the same respects, but nothing prevents their being predicated of the same in different aspects. And thus opposites are predicated of Christ, not in the same, but in different natures.

Reply Obj. 2. If the things pertaining to defect were attributed to God in His Divine Nature, it would be a blasphemy, since it would be a lessening of His honour. But there is no kind of wrong done to God if they are attributed to Him in His assumed nature. Hence in a discourse of the Council of Ephesus³ it is said: "God accounts nothing a wrong which is the occasion of man's salvation. For no lowliness that He assumed for us injures that Nature which can be subject to no injury, yet makes lower things Its own, to save our nature. Therefore, since these lowly and worthless things do no harm to the Divine Nature but bring about our salvation, how dost thou maintain that what was the cause of our salvation was the occasion of harm to God?"

Reply Obj. 3. To be assumed pertains to human nature not in its suppositum, but in itself; and thus it does not belong to God.

ARTICLE 5. Whether What Belongs to the Son of Man Can Be Predicated of the Divine Nature and What Belongs to the Son of God Predicated of the Human Nature?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that what belongs to the human nature can be said of the Divine Nature.

Objection 1. For what belongs to the human nature is predicated of the Son of God, and of God. But God is His own Nature. Therefore, what belongs to the human nature may be predicated of the Divine Nature.

Obj. 2. Further, the flesh pertains to human nature. But as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 6),⁴ "we say, after the blessed Athanasius and Cyril, that the Nature of the Word was incarnate." Therefore it would seem with equal reason that what belongs to the human nature may be said of the Divine Nature.

Obj. 3. Further, what belongs to the Divine Nature belongs to Christ's human nature, such as to know future things and to possess saving power. Therefore it would seem with equal reason that what belongs to the human may be said of the Divine Nature.

On the contrary, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 4):⁵ "When we mention the Godhead we do not predicate of it the idioms"—that is, the properties—"of the humanity; for we do not say that the Godhead is passible or creatable." Now the Godhead is the Divine Nature. Therefore what is proper to the human nature cannot be said of the Divine Nature.

I answer that, What belongs to one cannot be said of another, unless they are both the same; thus capable of laughter can be predicated only of man. Now in the mystery of the Incarnation the Divine and human natures are not the same, but the hypostasis of the two natures is the same. And hence what belongs to one nature cannot be predicated of the other if they are taken in the abstract. Now concrete words stand for the hypostasis of the nature; and hence of concrete words we may predicate indifferently what belongs to either nature—whether the word of which they are predicated refers to each nature, as the word Christ, by which is signified "both the Godhead anointing and the manhood anointed"; or to the Divine Nature alone, as this word "God" or "the Son of God"; or to the manhood alone, as this word "Man" or "Jesus." Hence Pope Leo says (Ep. ad Paläst. cxxiv):⁶ "It is of no consequence from what substance we name Christ; because since the unity of person remains inseparably, one and the same is altogether Son of Man by His flesh, and altogether Son of God by the Godhead which He has with the Father."

Reply Obj. 1. In God, Person and Nature are really the same, and by reason of this identity the Divine Nature is predicated of the Son of God. Nevertheless, its mode of predication is different, and hence certain things are said of the Son of God which are not said of the Divine Nature; thus we say that the Son of God is born, yet we do not say that the Divine Nature is born, as was said in the First Part (Q. xxxix, A. 5). So, too, in the mystery of the Incarnation we say that the Son of God suffered, yet we do not say that the Divine Nature suffered.

Reply Obj. 2. Incarnation implies union with flesh, rather than any property of flesh. Now in Christ each nature is united to the other in person; and by reason of this union the Divine Nature is said to be incarnate and the human nature deified, as stated above (Q. II, A. 1, Reply 3).

Reply Obj. 3. What belongs to the Divine Nature is predicated of the human nature—not, indeed, as it belongs essentially to the Divine Nature, but as it is participated by the human nature. Hence, whatever cannot be participated by the human nature (as to be uncreated and omnipotent), is in no way predicated of the human nature. But the Divine Nature received nothing by participation from the human nature; and hence what belongs to the human nature can in no way be predicated of the Divine Nature.

ARTICLE 6. Whether This Is True: "God Was Made Man"?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that this is false: God was made man.

Objection 1. For since man signifies a substance, to be made man is to be made absolutely. But this is false: "God was made absolutely." Therefore this is false: God was made man.

Obj. 2. Further, to be made man is to be changed. But God cannot be the subject of change, according to Mal. 3. 6: I am the Lord, and I change not. Hence this is false: God was made man.

Obj. 3. Further, man as predicated of Christ stands for the Person of the Son of God. But this is false: God was made the Person of the Son of God. Therefore this is false: God was made man.

On the contrary, It is written (John 1. 14): The Word was made flesh; and as Athanasius says (Ep. ad Epictetum),¹ "when he said, 'The Word was made flesh,' it is as if it were said that God was made man."

I answer that, A thing is said to be made that which begins to be predicated of it for the first time. Now to be man is truly predicated of God, as stated above (A. 1), yet in such sort that it pertains to God to be man, not from eternity, but from the time of His assuming human nature. Hence, this is true, God was made man, though it is understood differently by some, even as this, God is man, as we said above (A. 1).

Reply Obj. 1. To be made man is to be made absolutely in all those in whom human nature begins to be in a newly created suppositum. But God is said to have been made man because the human nature began to be in an eternally pre-existing suppositum of the Divine Nature. And hence for God to be made man does not mean that God was made absolutely.

Reply Obj. 2. As stated above, to be made implies that something is newly predicated of another. Hence, whenever anything is predicated for the first time of another, and there is a change in that of which it is predicated, then to be made is to be changed; and this takes place in whatever is predicated absolutely, for whiteness or greatness cannot newly affect anything, unless it be newly changed to whiteness or greatness. But whatever is predicated relatively can be newly predicated of anything without its change, as a man may be made to be on the right side without being changed, and merely by the change of him on whose left side he was. Hence in such cases not all that is said to be made is changed, since it may happen by the change of something else. And it is thus we say of God: Lord, Thou art made (Douay, hast been) our refuge (Ps. 89. 1). Now to be man belongs to God by reason of the union, which is a relation. And hence to be man is newly predicated of God without any change in Him, by a change in the human nature, which is assumed to a Divine Person. And hence, when it is said, God was made man, we understand no change on the part of God, but only on the part of the human nature.

Reply Obj. 3. Man stands not for the bare Person of the Son of God, but according as it subsists in human nature. Hence, although this is false, "God was made the Person of the Son of God," yet this is true, "God was made man" by being united to human nature.

ARTICLE 7. Whether This Is True: "Man Was Made God?"

We proceed thus to the Seventh Article: It would seem that this is true: Man was made God.

Objection 1. For it is written (Rom. 1. 2, 3): Which He had promised before by His prophets in the holy Scriptures, concerning His Son Who was made to Him of the seed of David according to the flesh. Now Christ, as man, is of the seed of David according to the flesh. Therefore man was made the Son of God.

Obj. 2. Further, Augustine says (De Trin. 1, 13)¹ that "such was this assumption, which made God man, and man God." But by reason of this assumption this is true: God was made man. Therefore, in like manner, this is true: Man was made God.

Obj. 3. Further, Gregory Nazianzen says (Ep. ad Chelid. ci):² "God was humanized and man was deified, or whatever else one may like to call it." Now God is said to be humanized by being made man. Therefore with equal reason man is said to be deified by being made God; and thus it is true that "Man was made God."

Obj. 4. Further, when it is said that "God was made man," the subject of the making or change is not God, but human nature, which the word man signifies. Now that seems to be the subject of the making to which the making is attributed. Hence Man was made God is truer than God was made man.

On the contrary, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 2):³ "We do not say that man was deified, but that God was humanized." Now to be made God is the same as to be deified. Hence this is false: Man was made God.

I answer that, This proposition. Man was made God, may be understood in three ways. First, so that the participle "made" absolutely determines either the subject or the predicate; and in this sense it is false, since neither the Man of Whom it is predicated was made, nor is God made, as will be said (AA. 8, 9). And in the same sense this is false: God was made man. But it is not of this sense that we are now speaking.

Secondly, it may be so understood that the word "made" determines the composition, with this meaning: Man was made God—that is, it was brought about that Man is God. And in this sense both are true—namely, that Man was made God and that God was made Man. But this is not the proper sense of these phrases; unless, indeed, we are to understand that "man" has not a personal, but a simple suppositum. For although "this man" was not made God, because this suppositum—namely, the Person of the Son of God—was eternally God, yet man, speaking commonly, was not always God.

Thirdly, properly understood, this participle "made" attaches making to man with respect to God, as the term of the making. And in this sense, granted that the Person or hypostasis in Christ are the same as the suppositum of God and Man, as was shown (Q. II, AA. 2, 3), this proposition is false, because, when it is said, Man was made God, "man" has a personal suppositum; because to be God is not verified of the Man in His human nature, but in His suppositum. Now the suppositum of human nature, of Whom "to be God" is verified, is the same as the hypostasis or Person of the Son of God, Who was always God. Hence it cannot be said that this Man began to be God, or is made God, or that He was made God.

But if there were a different person or hypostasis of God and man, so that "to be God" was predicated of the man, and, conversely, by reason of a certain conjunction of supposita, or of personal dignity, or of affection or indwelling, as the Nestorians said,⁴ then with equal reason might it be said that Man was made God—that is, joined to God—and that God was made Man—that is, joined to man.

Reply Obj. 1. In these words of the Apostle the relative "Who" which refers to the Person of the Son of God ought not to be considered as affecting the predicate, as if someone already existing of the seed of David according to the flesh was made the Son of God—and it is in this sense that the objection takes it. But it ought to be taken as affecting the subject, with this meaning—that the Son of God was made to Him ("namely, to the honour of the Father," as a gloss expounds it),⁵ being of the seed of David according to the flesh, as if to say "the Son of God having flesh of the seed of David to the honour of God."

Reply Obj. 2. This saying of Augustine is to be taken in the sense that by the assumption that took place in the Incarnation it was brought about that Man is God and God is Man; and in this sense both sayings are true, as stated above.

The same is to be said in the reply to the third, since to be deified is the same as to be made God.

Reply Obj. 4. A term placed in the subject is taken materially—that is, for the suppositum; placed in the predicate it is taken formally—that is, for the nature signified. Hence when it is said that Man was made God, the being made is not attributed to the human nature but to the suppositum of the human nature, Which is God from eternity, and hence it does not befit Him to be made God. But when it is said that God was made Man, the making is taken to be terminated in the human nature. Hence, properly speaking, this is true: God was made Man, and this is false: Man was made God; even as if Socrates, who was already a man, were made white, and were pointed out, this would be true: This man was made white to-day, and this would be false: This white thing was made man to-day.

Nevertheless, if on the part of the subject there is added some word signifying human nature in the abstract, it might be taken in this way for the subject of the making—for example, if it were said that “human nature was made the Son of God’s.”

ARTICLE 8. Whether This Is True: “Christ Is a Creature”?

We proceed thus to the Eighth Article: It would seem that this is true: Christ is a creature.

Objection 1. For Pope Leo says:¹ “A new and unheard of covenant: God Who is and was, is made a creature.” Now we may predicate of Christ whatever the Son of God became by the Incarnation. Therefore this is true: Christ is a creature.

Obj. 2. Further, the properties of both natures may be predicated of the common hypostasis of both natures, no matter by what word they are signified, as stated above (A. 5). But it is the property of human nature to be created, as it is the property of the Divine Nature to be Creator. Hence both may be said of Christ—namely, that He is a creature and that he is uncreated and Creator.

Obj. 3. Further, the principal part of a man is the soul rather than the body. But Christ, by reason of the body which He took from the Virgin, is said absolutely to be born of the Virgin. Therefore by reason of the soul which is created by God, it ought to be said absolutely that He is a creature.

On the contrary, Ambrose says:² “Was Christ made by a word? Was Christ created by a command?” as if to say: No! Hence he adds: “How can there be a creature in God? For God has a simple not a composite Nature.” Therefore it must not be granted that “Christ is a creature.”

I answer that, As Jerome says,³ “words spoken out of order lead to heresy”; hence with us and heretics the very words ought not to be in common, lest we seem to countenance their error. Now the Arian heretics said⁴ that Christ was a creature and less than the Father, not only in His human nature, but even in His Divine Person. And hence we must not say absolutely that Christ is a creature or less than the Father, but with a qualification—namely, in His human nature. But such things as could not be considered to belong to the Divine Person in Itself may be predicated absolutely of Christ by reason of His human nature; thus we say absolutely that Christ suffered, died and was buried, even as in corporeal and human beings, things of which we may doubt whether they belong to the whole or the part, if they are observed to exist in a part, are not predicated of the whole absolutely—that is, without qualification, for we do not say that the Ethiopian is white but that he is white as regards his teeth; but we say without qualification that he is curly, since this can only belong to him as regards his hair.

Reply Obj. 1. Sometimes, for the sake of brevity, the holy doctors use the word “creature” of Christ without any qualifying term; we should however take as understood the qualification, “as man.”

Reply Obj. 2. All the properties of the human, just as of the Divine Nature, may be predicated equally of Christ. Hence Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 4)⁵ that “Christ, Who is God and Man, is called created and uncreated, divisible and indivisible.” Nevertheless things of which we may doubt to what nature they belong are not to be predicated without a qualification. Hence he afterwards adds (De Fide Orthod. iv, 5)⁶ that “the one hypostasis”—that is, of Christ—“is uncreated in its Godhead and created in its manhood”; even so conversely, we may not say without qualification, "Christ is incorporeal" or "impassible," in order to avoid the error of Manes,¹ who held that Christ had not a true body, nor truly suffered, but we must say, with a qualification, that Christ was incorporeal and impassible in His Godhead.

Reply Obj. 3. There can be no doubt how the birth from the Virgin applies to the Person of the Son of God, as there can be in the case of creation; and hence there is no parity.

ARTICLE 9. Whether This Is True: "This Man, Pointing Out Christ, Began To Be"?

We proceed thus to the Ninth Article: It would seem that this Man, pointing out Christ, began to be.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (Tract. cv in Joann.)² that "before the world was, neither were we, nor the Mediator of God and men—the Man Jesus Christ." But what was not always, has begun to be. Therefore this Man, pointing to Christ, began to be.

Obj. 2. Further, Christ began to be Man. But to be man is to be absolutely. Therefore this man began to be, absolutely.

Obj. 3. Further, "man" implies a suppositum of human nature. But Christ was not always a suppositum of human nature. Therefore this Man began to be.

On the contrary, It is written (Heb. 13. 8): Jesus Christ yesterday and to-day: and the same for ever.

I answer that, We must not say that "this Man"—pointing to Christ—"began to be," unless we add something. And this for a two-fold reason. First, for this proposition is false absolutely, in the judgment of the Catholic Faith, which affirms that in Christ there is one suppositum and one hypostasis, as also one Person. For according to this, when we say "this Man," pointing to Christ, the eternal suppositum is necessarily meant, with Whose eternity to begin to be is incompatible. Hence this is false: This Man began to be. Nor does it matter that to begin to be refers to the human nature, which is signified by this word man, because the term placed in the subject is not taken formally so as to signify the nature, but is taken materially so as to signify the suppositum, as was said (A. 7; reply 4).

Secondly, because even if this proposition were true, it ought not to be made use of without qualification, in order to avoid the heresy of Arius, who, since he pretended that the Person of the Son of God is a creature and less than the Father, so he maintained that He began to be, saying there was a time when He was not.³

Reply Obj. 1. The words quoted must be qualified—that is, we must say that the Man Jesus Christ was not, before the world was, in His humanity.

Reply Obj. 2. With this word "begin" we cannot argue from the lower to the higher. For it does not follow if this began to be white, that therefore it began to be coloured. And this because "to begin" implies being now and not before; for it does not follow if This was not white before that therefore it was not coloured before. Now, to be absolutely is higher than to be man. Hence this does not follow: Christ began to be Man—therefore He began to be.

Reply Obj. 3. This word Man, as it is taken for Christ, although it signifies the human nature, which began to be, nevertheless stands for the eternal suppositum which did not begin to be. Hence, since it signifies the suppositum when placed in the subject, and refers to the nature when placed in the predicate, therefore this is false: The Man Christ began to be; but this is true: Christ began to be Man.

ARTICLE 10. Whether This Is True: "Christ as Man Is a Creature"?

We proceed thus to the Tenth Article: It would seem that this is false: "Christ as Man is a creature," or "began to be."

Objection 1. For nothing in Christ is created except the human nature. But this is false: Christ as Man is the human nature. Therefore this is also false: Christ as Man is a creature.

Obj. 2. Further, the predicate is predicated of the term placed in reduplication, rather than of the subject of the proposition; as when I say: A body as coloured is visible, it follows that the coloured is visible. But as stated (A. 8,) we must not absolutely grant that the Man Christ is a creature; nor consequently that Christ as Man is a creature.

Obj. 3. Further, whatever is predicated of a man as man is predicated of him per se and absolutely, for per se is the same as "in virtue of itself," as is said in the Metaphysics.⁴ But this is false: Christ is per se and absolutely a creature. Hence this, too, is false: Christ as Man is a creature.

On the contrary, Whatever is, is either Creator or creature. But this is false: Christ as Man is Creator. Therefore this is true: Christ as Man is a creature.

I answer that, When we say "Christ as Man" this word "man" may be added in the reduplication either by reason of the suppositum or by reason of the nature. If it be added by reason of the suppositum, since the suppositum of the human nature in Christ is eternal and uncreated, this will be false: Christ as Man is a creature. But if it be added by reason of the human nature, it is true, since by reason of the human nature or in the human nature, it belongs to Him to be a creature, as was said (A. 8).

It must however be borne in mind that the term thus added by the reduplication signifies the nature rather than the suppositum, since it is added as a predicate, which is taken formally, for it is the same to say Christ as Man and to say Christ as He is a Man. Hence this is to be granted rather than denied: Christ as Man is a creature. But if something further be added whereby [the term covered by the reduplication] is attracted to the suppositum, this proposition is to be denied rather than granted, for instance were one to say: Christ as "this" Man is a creature.

Reply Obj. 1. Although Christ is not the human nature, He has human nature. Now the word creature is naturally predicated not only of abstract but also of concrete things, since we say that manhood is a creature and that man is a creature.

Reply Obj. 2. Man as placed in the subject refers to the suppositum but, as placed in the reduplication refers rather to the nature, as was stated above. And because the nature is created and the suppositum uncreated, therefore, although it is not granted absolutely that "this man is a creature," yet it is granted that "Christ as Man is a creature."

Reply Obj. 3. It belongs to every man who is a suppositum of human nature alone to have his being only in human nature. Hence of every such suppositum it follows that if it is a creature as man, it is a creature absolutely. But Christ is a suppositum not merely of human nature but also of the Divine Nature, in which He has an uncreated being. Hence it does not follow that if He is a creature as Man He is a creature absolutely.

ARTICLE 11. Whether This Is True: "Christ as Man Is God"?

We proceed thus to the Eleventh Article: It would seem that Christ, as Man, is God.

Objection 1. For Christ is God by the grace of union. But Christ, as Man, has the grace of union. Therefore Christ as Man is God.

Obj. 2. Further, to forgive sins is proper to God, according to Isa. 43. 25: I am He that blot out thy iniquities for My own sake. But Christ as Man forgives sin, according to Matt. 9. 6: But that you may know that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins, etc. Therefore Christ as Man is God.

Obj. 3. Further, Christ is not Man in general, but is this particular Man. Now Christ, as this Man, is God, since by "this Man" we signify the eternal suppositum which is God naturally. Therefore Christ as Man is God.

On the contrary, Whatever belongs to Christ as Man belongs to every man. Now, if Christ as Man is God, it follows that every man is God—which is clearly false.

I answer that, This term man when placed in reduplication may be taken in two ways. First as referring to the nature, and in this way it is not true that Christ as Man is God, because the human nature is distinct from the Divine by a difference of nature. Secondly it may be taken by reason of the suppositum, and in this way, since the suppositum of the human nature in Christ is the Person of the Son of God, to Whom it belongs per se to be God, it is true that Christ, as Man, is God. Nevertheless because the term placed in the reduplication signifies the nature rather than the suppositum, as stated above (A. 10), hence this is to be denied rather than granted: Christ as Man is God.

Reply Obj. 1. It is not with regard to the same respect that a thing moves towards, and that it is, something; for to move belongs to a thing by reason of its matter or subject, and to be in act belongs to it by reason of its form. So too it is not with regard to the same respect that it belongs to Christ to be ordered to be God by the grace of union, and to be God. For the first belongs to Him in His human nature, and the second, in His Divine Nature. Hence this is true: Christ as Man has the grace of union; yet not this: Christ as Man is God.

Reply Obj. 2. The Son of Man has on earth the power of forgiving sins, not by virtue of the human nature, but by virtue of the Divine Nature, in which Divine Nature resides the power of forgiving sins by authority, whereas in the human nature it resides instrumentally and ministerially. Hence Chrysostom expounding this passage says:¹ "He said pointedly 'on earth to forgive sins,' in order to show that by an indivisible union He united human nature to the power of the Godhead, since although He was made Man, yet He remained the Word of God."

Reply Obj. 3. When we say "this man," the demonstrative pronoun "this" attracts "man" to the suppositum; and hence "Christ as this Man, is God," is a true proposition rather than "Christ as Man is God."

ARTICLE 12. Whether This Is True: "Christ as Man Is a Hypostasis or Person"?

We proceed thus to the Twelfth Article: It would seem that Christ as Man is a person.

Objection 1. For what belongs to every man belongs to Christ as Man, since He is like other men according to Phil. 2. 7: Being made in the likeness of men. But every man is a person. Therefore Christ as Man is a person.

Obj. 2. Further, Christ as Man is a substance of rational nature. But He is not a universal substance; therefore He is an individual substance. Now a person is nothing else than an individual substance of rational nature, as Boëthius says (De Duab. Nat.).² Therefore Christ as Man is a person.

Obj. 3. Further, Christ as Man is a being of human nature, and a suppositum and a hypostasis of the same nature. But every hypostasis and suppositum and being of human nature is a person. Therefore Christ as Man is a person.

On the contrary, Christ as Man is not an eternal person. Therefore if Christ as Man is a person it would follow that in Christ there are two persons—one temporal and the other eternal, which is erroneous, as was said above (q. II, A. 6; q. IV, A. 2).

I answer that, As was said (AA. 10, 11), the term Man placed in the reduplication may refer either to the suppositum or to the nature. Hence when it is said: Christ as Man is a person, if it is taken as referring to the suppositum, it is clear that Christ as Man is a person, since the suppositum of human nature is nothing else than the Person of the Son of God. But if it be taken as referring to the nature, it may be understood in two ways. First, we may so understand it as if it belonged to human nature to be in a person, and in this way it is true, for whatever subsists in human nature is a person.

Secondly it may be taken that in Christ a proper personality, caused by the principles of the human nature, is due to the human nature; and in this way Christ as Man is not a person, since the human nature does not exist of itself apart from the Divine Nature, and yet the notion of person requires this.

Reply Obj. 1. It belongs to every man to be a person, according as everything subsisting in human nature is a person. Now, this is proper to the Man Christ that the Person subsisting in His human nature is not caused by the principles of the human nature, but is eternal. Hence in one way He is a person, as Man, and in another way He is not, as stated above.

Reply Obj. 2. The individual substance which is included in the definition of a person means a complete substance subsisting of itself and separate from all else. Otherwise, a man's hand might be called a person, since it is a kind of individual substance; nevertheless, because it is an individual substance existing in something else, it cannot be called a person; nor, for the same reason, can the human nature in Christ, although it may be called something individual and singular.

Reply Obj. 3. As a person signifies something complete and self-subsisting in rational nature, so a hypostasis, suppositum, and being of nature in the genus of substance, signify something that subsists of itself. Hence, as human nature is not of itself a person apart from the Person of the Son of God, so likewise it is not of itself a hypostasis or suppositum or a being of nature. Hence in the sense in which we deny that "Christ as Man is a person" we must deny all the other propositions.

QUESTION XVII

OF WHAT PERTAINS TO CHRIST'S UNITY FROM THE STANDPOINT OF BEING (In Two Articles)

WE must now consider what pertains to Christ's unity in general. For, in their proper place, we must determine what pertains to unity and plurality in detail; thus we determined (q. IX) that there is only one knowledge in Christ, and it will be concluded hereafter (q. xxxv, A. 2) that there is not only one nativity in Christ.

Hence we must consider Christ's unity (1) of being; (2) of will (q. xviii); (3) of operation (q. xix).

Under the first head there are two points of inquiry: (1) Whether Christ is one or two? (2) Whether there is only one being in Christ?

² Chap. 4 (PL 64, 1343).

ARTICLE 1. Whether Christ Is One or Two?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that Christ is not one, but two.

Objection 1. For Augustine says (De Trin. i, 7):¹ "Because the form of God took the form of a servant, both are God by reason of God Who assumed, yet both are Man by reason of the man assumed." Now "both" may only be said when there are two. Therefore Christ is two.

Obj. 2. Further, where there is one thing and another there are two. Now Christ is one thing and another; for Augustine says (Enchir. xxxv):² "Being in the form of God . . . He took the form of a servant . . . being both in one; but He was one of these as Word, and the other as man." Therefore Christ is two.

Obj. 3. Further, Christ is not only man; for, thus He would be a mere man. Therefore He is something else than man, and thus in Christ there is one thing and another. Therefore Christ is two.

Obj. 4. Further, Christ is something that the Father is, and something that the Father is not. Therefore Christ is one thing and another. Therefore Christ is two.

Obj. 5. Further, as in the mystery of the Trinity there are three Persons in one Nature, so in the mystery of the Incarnation there are two natures in one Person. But on account of the unity of the Nature, notwithstanding the distinction of Person, the Father and Son are one, according to John 10. 30: I and the Father are one. Therefore, notwithstanding the unity of Person, Christ is two on account of the duality of nature.

Obj. 6. Further, the Philosopher says³ that "one" and "two" are predicated denominatively. Now Christ has a duality of nature. Therefore Christ is two.

Obj. 7. "Further, as accidental form makes a thing otherwise (alterum) so does substantial form make another thing (aliud)" as Porphyry says.⁴ Now in Christ there are two substantial natures, the human and the Divine. Therefore Christ is one thing and another. Therefore Christ is two.

On the contrary, Boëthius says (De Duab. Nat.):⁵ "Whatever is, in so far as it is, is one." But we confess that Christ is. Therefore Christ is one.

I answer that, Nature, considered in itself, as it is used in the abstract,⁶ cannot truly be predicated of the suppositum or person, except in God, in Whom "what it is" and "that by which it is" do not differ, as stated in the First Part (Q. xxix, A. 4, reply 1). But in Christ, since there are two natures—namely, the Divine and the human—one of them—namely, the Divine—may be predicated of Him both in the abstract and in the concrete, for we say that the Son of God, Who is signified by the word Christ, is the Divine Nature and is God. But the human nature cannot be predicated of Christ in the abstract, but only in the concrete—that is, as it is signified by the suppositum. For we cannot truly say that Christ is human nature, because human nature is not naturally predicated of its suppositum. But we say that Christ is a man, even as Christ is God. Now God signifies one having Godhead, and man signifies one having manhood. Yet one having manhood is differently signified by the word man and by the word Jesus or Peter. For this word man implies one having manhood indistinctly, even as the word God implies indistinctly one having the Godhead; but the word Peter or Jesus implies one having manhood distinctly—that is, with its determinate individual properties—as Son of God implies one having the Godhead under a determinate personal property.

Now the dual number is placed in Christ with regard to the natures. Hence, if both the natures were predicated in the abstract of Christ, it would follow that Christ is two. But because the two natures are not predicated of Christ except as they are signified in the suppositum, it must be by reason of the suppositum that "one" or "two" is predicated of Christ. Now some placed two supposita in Christ, and one Person, which, in their opinion, would seem to be the suppositum completed with its final completion.⁷ Hence, since they placed two supposita in Christ, they said that God is two, in the neuter. But because they asserted one Person, they said that Christ is one, in the masculine, for the neuter gender signifies something unformed and imperfect, whereas the masculine signifies something formed and perfect.⁸ On the other hand, the Nestorians, who asserted two Persons in Christ,⁹ said that Christ is two not only in the neuter, but also in the masculine.⁹ But since we maintain one person and one suppositum in Christ, as is clear from Q. II, AA. 2, 3, it follows that we say that Christ is one not merely in the masculine, but also in the neuter.

Reply Obj. 1. This saying of Augustine is not to be taken as if "both" referred to the predicate, so as to mean that Christ is both, but it refers to the subject. And thus "both" does not stand for two supposita, but for two words signifying two natures in the concrete. For I can say that "both"—namely, God and Man—"are God" on account of God Who assumes; and "both"—namely, God and Man—"are Man on account of the man assumed."

Reply Obj. 2. When it is said that "Christ is one thing and another," this saying is to be explained in this sense—"having this nature and another." And it is in this way that Augustine explains it (Contra Felic. xi).¹ where, after saying, "In the mediator of God and man, the Son of God is one thing, and the Son of Man another," he adds, "I say another thing by reason of the difference of substance, and not another thing by reason of the unity of person." Hence Gregory Nazianzen says (Ep. ad Chelid. ci):² "If we must speak briefly, that of which the Saviour is, is one thing and another; thus the invisible is not the same as the visible, and what is without time is not the same as what is in time. Yet they are not one and another; far from it. For both these are one."

Reply Obj. 3. This is false: "Christ is only man," because it does not exclude another suppositum, but another nature, since terms placed in the predicate are taken formally. But if anything is added whereby it is drawn to the suppositum, it would be a true proposition—for instance, "Christ is only that which is man." Nevertheless, it would not follow that He is "any other thing than man," because "another thing" since it refers to a diversity of substance, properly refers to the suppositum, even as all relative things bearing a personal relation. But it does follow: Therefore He has another nature.

Reply Obj. 4. When it is said, "Christ is something that the Father is," "something" signifies the Divine Nature, which is predicated even in the abstract of the Father and Son. But when it is said, "Christ is something that is not the Father," "something" signifies not the human nature as it is in the abstract, but as it is in the concrete; not, indeed, in a distinct, but in an indistinct suppositum—that is, according as it underlies the nature and not the individuating properties. Hence it does not follow that Christ is one thing and another, or that He is two, since the suppositum of the human nature in Christ, which is the Person of the Son of God, is not accounted numerically with the Divine Nature, which is predicated of the Father and Son.

Reply Obj. 5. In the mystery of the Divine Trinity the Divine Nature is predicated even in the abstract of the three Persons; hence it may be said absolutely that the three Persons are one. But in the mystery of the Incarnation both natures are not predicated in the abstract of Christ; hence it cannot be said absolutely that Christ is two.

Reply Obj. 6. Two signifies what has duality, not in another, but in the same thing of which "two" is predicated. Now what is predicated is said of the suppositum, which is implied by the word Christ. Hence, although Christ has duality of nature, yet, because He has not duality of suppositum, it cannot be said that Christ is two.

Reply Obj. 7. "Otherwise" implies diversity of accident. Hence diversity of accident suffices for anything to be called "otherwise" absolutely. But "another thing" implies diversity of substance. Now not merely the nature, but also the suppositum is said to be a substance, as is said in the Metaphysics.³ Hence diversity of nature does not suffice for anything to be called "another thing" absolutely unless there is diversity of suppositum. But diversity of nature makes "another thing" relatively—that is, in nature—if there is no diversity of suppositum.

ARTICLE 2. Whether There Is Only One Being in Christ?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that in Christ there is not only one being, but two.

Objection 1. For Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 13-15)⁴ that whatever follows the nature is doubled in Christ. But being follows the nature, for being is from the form. Hence in Christ there are two beings.

Obj. 2. Further, the being of the Son of God is the Divine Nature itself, and is eternal, whereas the being of the Man Christ is not the Divine Nature, but is a temporal being. Therefore there is not only one being in Christ.

Obj. 3. Further, in the Trinity, although there are three Persons, yet on account of the unity of nature there is only one being. But in Christ there are two natures, though there is one Person. Therefore in Christ there is not only one being but two.

Obj. 4. Further, in Christ the soul gives some being to the body, since it is its form. But it does not give the Divine being, since this is uncreated. Therefore in Christ there is another being besides the Divine being; and thus in Christ there is not only one being.

On the contrary, Everything is said to be a being, in so far as it is one, for one and being are convertible. Therefore, if there were two beings in Christ and not one only, Christ would be two and not one.

I answer that, Because in Christ there are two natures and one hypostasis, it follows that things belonging to the nature in Christ must be two, and that those belonging to the hypostasis in Christ must be only one. Now being pertains both to nature and to hypostasis; to hypostasis as to that which has being, and to nature as to that by which something has being. For nature is taken after the manner of a form, which is said to be a being because something is by it; as for instance by whiteness a thing is white, and by manhood a thing is man. Now it must be borne in mind that if there is a form or nature which does not pertain to the personal being of the subsisting hypostasis, this being is not said to belong to the person absolutely, but relatively; just as to be white is the being of Socrates not as he is Socrates, but as he is white. And there is no reason why this being should not be multiplied in one hypostasis or person, for the being whereby Socrates is white is distinct from the being whereby he is a musician. But the being which belongs to the very hypostasis or person in itself cannot possibly be multiplied in one hypostasis or person, since it is impossible that there should not be one being for one thing.

If, therefore, the human nature accrued to the Son of God not hypostatically or personally, but accidentally, as some maintained,¹ it would be necessary to assert two beings in Christ—one according as He is God—the other according as He is Man; just as in Socrates we place one being according as he is white, and another according as he is a man, since “being white” does not pertain to the personal being of Socrates. But being possessed of a head, being corporeal, being animated,—all these pertain to the one person of Socrates, and hence there arises from these only the one being of Socrates. And if it so happened that after the person of Socrates was constituted there accrued to him hands or feet or eyes, as happened to him who was born blind, no new being would be thereby added to Socrates, but only a relation to these—because, that is, he would be said to be not only with reference to what he had previously, but also with reference to what accrued to him afterwards.

And thus, since the human nature is united to the Son of God hypostatically or personally as was said above (Q. II, A. 6), and not accidentally, it follows that by the human nature there accrued to Him no new personal being, but only a new relation of the pre-existing personal being to the human nature, in such a way that the Person is said to subsist not only in the Divine, but also in the human nature.

Reply Obj. 1. Being is consequent upon nature not as upon that which has being but as upon that whereby a thing is, whereas it is consequent upon person or hypostasis as upon that which has being. Hence it has unity from the unity of hypostasis rather than duality from the duality of the nature.

Reply Obj. 2. The eternal being of the Son of God, which is the Divine Nature, becomes the being of man, in so far as the human nature is assumed by the Son of God to unity of Person.

Reply Obj. 3. As was said in the First Part (Q. I, A. 2, reply 3; Q. LXXV, A. 5, reply 4), since the Divine Person is the same as the Nature, there is no distinction in the Divine Persons between the being of the Person and the being of the Nature, and, consequently, the three Persons have only one being. But they would have a triple being if the being of the Person were distinct in them from the being of the Nature.

Reply Obj. 4. In Christ the soul gives being to the body, since it makes it actually animated, which is to give it the fulfilment of its nature and species. But if we consider the body perfected by the soul without the hypostasis having both—this whole, composed of soul and body, as signified by the word humanity, does not signify “what is,” but “that by which it is.” Hence being belongs to the subsisting person, according as it has a relation to such a nature, and of this relation the soul is the cause, in so far as it perfects human nature by informing the body.

QUESTION XVIII

OF WHAT PERTAINS TO THE UNITY IN CHRIST FROM THE STANDPOINT OF WILL
(In Six Articles)

WE must now consider unity as regards the will; and under this head there are six points of inquiry: (1) Whether the Divine will and the human are different in Christ? (2) Whether in Christ's human nature the will of sensuality is distinct from the will of reason? (3) Whether as regards the reason there were several wills in Christ? (4) Whether there was free choice in Christ? (5) Whether Christ's human will was always conformed to the Divine will in the thing willed? (6) Whether there was any contrariety of wills in Christ?

ARTICLE 1. Whether There Are Two Wills in Christ?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that in Christ there are not two wills, one Divine, the other human.

Objection 1. For the will is the first mover and ruler in whoever wills. But in Christ the first mover and ruler was the Divine will, since in Christ everything human was moved by the Divine will. Hence it seems that in Christ there was only one will, namely, the Divine.

Obj. 2. Further, an instrument is not moved by its own will but by the will of its mover. Now the human nature of Christ was the instrument of His Godhead. Hence the human nature of Christ was not moved by its own will, but by the Divine will.

Obj. 3. Further, that alone is multiplied in Christ which belongs to the nature. But the will does not seem to pertain to nature, for natural things are of necessity, whereas what is voluntary is not of necessity. Therefore there is but one will in Christ.

Obj. 4. Further, Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 14)¹ that "to will in this or that way belongs not to our nature but to our intellect—that is, to our personal intellect." But every will is this or that will, since there is nothing in a genus which is not at the same time in some one of its species. Therefore all will belongs to the person. But in Christ there was and is but one person. Therefore in Christ there is only one will.

On the contrary, Our Lord says (Luke 22. 42): Father if Thou wilt, remove this chalice from Me. But yet not My will but Thine be done. And Ambrose, quoting this to the Emperor Gratian (De Fide ii, 7)² says: "As He assumed my will, He assumed my sorrow"; and on Luke (loc. cit.)³ he says: "His will He refers to the Man—the Father's, to the Godhead. For the will of man is temporal, and the will of the Godhead eternal."

I answer that, Some placed only one will in Christ, but they seem to have had different motives for holding this. For Apollinaris did not hold an intellectual soul in Christ, but maintained that the Word was in place of the soul,⁴ or even in place of the intellect.⁵ Hence since "the will is in the reason," as the Philosopher says,⁶ it followed that in Christ there was no human will, and thus there was only one will in Him. So, too, Eutyches and all who held one composite nature in Christ⁷ were forced to place one will in Him. Nestorius,⁸ too, who maintained that the union of God and man was one of affection and will, held only one will in Christ.

But later on, Macarius, Patriarch of Antioch,⁹ Cyrus of Alexandria,¹⁰ and Sergius of Constantinople¹¹ and some of their followers,¹² held that there is one will in Christ, although they held that in Christ there are two natures united in a hypostasis; because they believed that Christ's human nature never moved with its own motion, but only in so far as it was moved by the Godhead, as is plain from the council letter of Pope Agatho.¹³ And hence in the sixth Council held at Constantinople¹⁴ it was decreed that it must be said that there are two wills in Christ, in the following passage: "In accordance with what the Prophets of old taught us concerning Christ, and as He taught us Himself, and the Symbol of the Holy Fathers has handed down to us, we confess two natural wills in Him and two natural operations."

And this much it was necessary to say. For it is manifest that the Son of God assumed a perfect human nature, as was shown above (Q. IV, A. 2; Q. V; Q. IX, A. 1). Now the will pertains to the perfection of human nature, being one of its natural powers, even as the intellect, as was stated in the First Part (Q. LXXIX, A. 1, reply 2; Q. LXXX, A. 2). Hence we must say that the Son of God assumed a human will, together with human nature. Now by the assumption of human nature the Son of God suffered no diminution of what pertains to His Divine Nature, to which it belongs to have a will, as was said in the First Part (Q. XIX, A. 1). Hence it must be said that there are two wills in Christ—that is, one human, the other Divine.

Reply Obj. 1. Whatever was in the human nature of Christ was moved at the bidding of the Divine will; yet it does not follow that in Christ there was no movement of the will proper to human nature, for the good wills of other saints are moved according to the will of God, Who worketh in them both to will and to accomplish, as is written Phil. 2. 13. For although the will cannot be inwardly moved by any creature, yet it can be moved inwardly by God, as was said in the First Part (Q. CV, A. 4; Q. CVI, A. 2; Q. CXI, A. 2). And thus, too, Christ by His human will followed the Divine will according to Ps. 39. 9; That I should do Thy will, O my God, I have desired it. Hence Augustine says (Contra Maxim. ii, 20):¹ "Where the Son says to the Father, 'Not what I will, but what Thou wilt,' what do you gain by adding your own words and saying 'He shows that His will was truly subject to His Father,' as if we denied that man's will ought to be subject to God's will?"

Reply Obj. 2. It is proper to an instrument to be moved by the principal agent, yet diversely, according to the property of its nature. For an inanimate instrument, as an axe or a saw, is moved by the craftsman with only a corporeal movement; but an instrument animated by a sensitive soul is moved by the sensitive appetite, as a horse by its rider, and an instrument animated with a rational soul is moved by its will, as by the command of his lord the servant is moved to act, the servant being like an animate instrument, as the Philosopher says.² And hence it was in this manner that the human nature of Christ was the instrument of the Godhead, and was moved by its own will.

Reply Obj. 3. The power of the will itself is natural, and necessarily follows upon the nature. But the movement or act of this power—which is also called will—is sometimes natural and necessary—for example, with respect to Happiness; and sometimes springs from the free choice of reason and is neither necessary nor natural, as is plain from what has been stated in the Second Part (I-II, Q. X, AA. 1, 2).³ And yet even reason itself, which is the principle of this movement, is natural. Hence besides the Divine will it is necessary to place in Christ a human will, not only as a natural power, or a natural movement, but also as a rational movement.

Reply Obj. 4. When we say "to will in a certain way," we signify a determinate mode of willing. Now a determinate mode regards the thing of which it is the mode. Hence since the will pertains to the nature, "to will in a certain way" belongs to the nature, not indeed considered absolutely, but as it is in a hypostasis of such a kind. Hence the human will of Christ had a determinate mode from the fact of being in a Divine hypostasis—that is, it was always moved in accordance with the bidding of the Divine will.

ARTICLE 2. Whether in Christ There Was Any Will of Sensuality Besides the Will of Reason?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that in Christ there was no will of sensuality besides the will of reason.

Objection 1. For the Philosopher says⁴ that "the will is in the reason, and in the sensitive appetite are the irascible and concupiscible parts." Now sensuality signifies the sensitive appetite. Hence in Christ there was no will of sensuality.

Obj. 2. Further, according to Augustine (De Trin. xii, 12, 13)⁵ the sensuality is signified by the serpent. But there was nothing serpent-like in Christ, for He had the likeness of a venomous animal without the venom, as Augustine says (De Pecc. Merit. et Remiss. i, 32)⁶ commenting on John 3. 14, As Moses lifted up the serpent in the desert. Hence in Christ there was no will of sensuality.

Obj. 3. Further, will is consequent upon nature, as was said (A. 1, reply 3). But in Christ there was only one nature besides the Divine. Hence in Christ there was only one human will.

On the contrary, Ambrose says (De Fide ii, 7):⁷ "Mine is the will which He calls His own, because as Man He assumed my sorrow." From this we are given to understand that sorrow pertains to the human will of Christ. Now sorrow pertains to the sensuality, as was said in the Second Part (I-II, q. xxiii, a. 1; q. xxv, a. 1). Therefore it seems, in Christ there is a will of sensuality besides the will of reason.

I answer that, As was said (q. iv, a. 2; q. v, a. 9; q. ix, a. 1), the Son of God assumed human nature together with everything pertaining to the perfection of human nature. Now in human nature is included animal nature, as the genus in its species. Hence the Son of God must have assumed together with the human nature whatever pertains to the perfection of animal nature, one of which things is the sensitive appetite, which is called sensuality. Consequently it must be allowed that there was sensuality in Christ. But it must be borne in mind that sensuality or the sensual appetite, since it is made to obey reason, is said to be rational by participation, as is clear from the Philosopher.¹ And because "the will is in the reason," as stated above (arg. 1), it may equally be said that the sensuality is a will by participation.

Reply Obj. 1. This argument is based on the will, essentially so called, which is only in the intellectual part; but the will so-called by participation can be in the sensitive part, in so far as it obeys reason.

Reply Obj. 2. Sensuality is signified by the serpent—not as regards the nature of the sensuality, which Christ assumed, but as regards the corruption of the fomes, which was not in Christ.

Reply Obj. 3. Where there is one thing on account of another, there seems to be only one; thus a surface which is visible by colour is one visible thing with the colour. So, too, because the sensuality is called the will only because it partakes of the rational will, there is said to be but one human will in Christ, even as there is but one human nature.

ARTICLE 3. Whether in Christ There Were Two Wills As Regards the Reason?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that in Christ there were two wills as regards the reason.

Objection 1. For Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. ii, 22)² that there is a double will in man—namely, the natural will which is called θέλησις, and the rational will which is called βούλησις. Now Christ in His human nature had whatever belongs to the perfection of human nature. Hence both the foregoing wills were in Christ.

Obj. 2. Further, the appetitive power is diversified in man by the difference of the apprehensive power, and hence according to the difference of sense and intellect is the difference of sensitive and intellectual appetite in man. But in the same way as regards man's apprehension, we hold the difference of reason and intellect, both of which were in Christ. Therefore there was a double will in Him, one intellectual and the other rational.

Obj. 3. Further, some³ ascribe to Christ a will of piety, which can only be on the part of reason. Therefore in Christ on the part of reason there are several wills.

On the contrary, In every order there is one first mover. But the will is the first mover in the genus of human acts. Therefore in one man there is only one will, properly speaking, which is the will of reason. But Christ is one man. Therefore in Christ there is only one human will.

I answer that, As stated above (a. 1, reply 3), the will is sometimes taken for the power, and sometimes for the act. Hence if the will is taken for the act, it is necessary to place two wills—that is, two species of acts of the will in Christ on the part of the reason. For the will, as was said in the Second Part (I-II, q. viii, aa. 2, 3), regards both the end and the means, and is affected differently towards both. For towards the end it is borne simply and absolutely, as towards what is good in itself; but towards the means it is borne under a certain relation, as the goodness of the means depends on something else. Hence the act of the will, according as it is drawn to anything desired of itself, as health, which act is called by Damascene⁴ θέλησις—that is, simple will—and by the Masters⁵ will as nature, is different from the act of the will as it is drawn to anything that is desired only in order to something else, as to take medicine; and this act of the will Damascene calls⁶ βούλησις—that is, counselling will, and the Masters,⁷ will as reason. But this diversity of acts does not diversify the power, since both acts regard the one common aspect of the object, which is goodness. Hence we must say that if we are speaking of the power of the will, in Christ there is but one human will, essentially so called and not by participation; but if we are speaking of the will as an act, we thus distinguish in Christ a will as nature, which is called θέλησις, and a will as reason, which is called βούλησις.

Reply Obj. 1. These two wills are not diversified according to the power but only according to the difference of act, as we have said.

Reply Obj. 2. The intellect and the reason are not distinct powers, as was said in the First Part (Q. LXXIX, A. 8).

Reply Obj. 3. The will of piety would not seem to be distinct from the will considered as nature, since it flees from another's evil absolutely considered.

ARTICLE 4. Whether There Was Free Choice in Christ?

We proceed thus to the Fourth Article: It would seem that in Christ there was no free choice.

Objection 1. For Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii, 14)¹ that γνώμη—that is, opinion, thinking or cogitation, and προαίρεσις—that is, election, “cannot possibly be attributed to Our Lord, if we wish to speak with accuracy.” But in the things of faith especially we must speak with accuracy. Therefore there was no election in Christ and consequently no free choice, of which election is the act.

Obj. 2. Further, the Philosopher says² that “choice is a desire of something after taking counsel.” Now counsel does not appear to be in Christ, because we do not take counsel concerning such things as we are certain of. But Christ was certain of everything. Hence there was no counsel and consequently no free choice in Christ.

Obj. 3. Further, free choice is indifferent. But Christ's will was determined to good, since He could not sin, as stated above (Q. XV, AA. 1, 2). Hence there was no free choice in Christ.

On the contrary, It is written (Isa. 7. 15): He shall eat butter and honey, that He may know to refuse the evil and to choose the good, which is an act of free choice. Therefore there was free choice in Christ.

I answer that, As was said above (A. 3), there was a twofold act of the will in Christ: one whereby His will was drawn to anything willed in itself, which pertains to the nature of an end;

the other whereby His will was drawn to anything willed on account of its being ordered to another—which pertains to the nature of means. Now, as the Philosopher says³ choice differs from will in this, that will of itself regards the end, while choice regards the means. And thus simple will is the same as the will as nature, but choice (electio) is the same as the will as reason, and is the proper act of free choice (liberum arbitrium), as was said in the First Part (Q. LXXXIII, A. 3). Hence, since will as reason is placed in Christ, we must also place choice, and consequently free choice, whose act is choice, as was said in the First Part (ibid.; cf. I-II, Q. XIII, A. 1).

Reply Obj. 1. Damascene excludes choice from Christ in so far as he considers that doubt is implied in the word choice. Nevertheless doubt is not necessary to choice, since it belongs even to God Himself to choose, according to Eph. 1. 4: He chose us in Him before the foundation of the world, although in God there is no doubt. Yet doubt is accidental to choice when it is in an ignorant nature. We may also say the same of whatever else is mentioned in the authority quoted.

Reply Obj. 2. Choice presupposes counsel, yet it follows counsel only as determined by judgment. For what we judge to be done, we choose, after the inquiry of counsel, as is stated.⁴ Hence if anything is judged necessary to be done without any preceding doubt or inquiry, this suffices for choice. Therefore it is plain that doubt or inquiry belong to choice not essentially, but only when it is in an ignorant nature.

Reply Obj. 3. The will of Christ, though determined good, is not determined to this or that good. Hence it pertains to Christ, even as to the blessed, to choose with a free choice confirmed in good.

ARTICLE 5. Whether the Human Will of Christ Was Altogether Conformed to the Divine Will in the Thing Willed?

We proceed thus to the Fifth Article: It would seem that the human will in Christ did not will anything except what God willed.

Objection 1. For it is written (Ps. 39. 9) in the person of Christ: That I should do Thy will: O my God, I have desired it. Now he who desires to do another's will, wills what the other wills. Hence it seems that Christ's human will willed nothing but what was willed by His Divine will.

Obj. 2. Further, Christ's soul had most perfect charity, which, indeed, surpasses the comprehension of all our knowledge, according to Eph. 3. 19, the charity of Christ, which surpasseth all knowledge. Now charity makes men will what God wills; hence the Philosopher says¹ that one mark of friendship is to will and choose the same. Therefore the human will in Christ willed nothing else than was willed by His Divine will.

Obj. 3. Further, Christ was a true comprehensor. But the Saints who are comprehensors in heaven will only what God wills, otherwise they would not be happy, because they would not obtain whatever they will, for blessed is he "who has what he wills, and wills nothing amiss," as Augustine says (De Trin. xiii, 5).² Hence in His human will Christ wills nothing else than does the Divine will.

On the contrary, Augustine says (Contra Maxim. ii, 20):³ "When Christ says 'Not what I will, but what Thou wilt, He shows Himself to have willed something else than did His Father; and this could only have been by His human heart, since He did not transfigure our weakness into His Divine but into His human will.'"

I answer that, As was said (AA. 2, 3), in Christ according to His human nature there is a manifold will—namely, the will of sensuality, which is called will by participation, and the rational will, whether considered after the manner of nature, or after the manner of reason. Now it was said above (Q. XIII, A. 3, reply 1; Q. XIV, A. 1, reply 2) that by a certain dispensation the Son of God before His Passion "allowed His flesh to do and suffer what was proper to it." And in like manner He allowed all the powers of His soul to do and suffer what belonged to them. Now it is clear that the will of sensuality naturally shrinks from sensible pains and bodily hurt. In like manner, the will as nature turns from what is against nature and what is evil in itself, as death and the like; yet the will as reason may at times choose these things in relation to an end, as in a mere man the sensuality and the will absolutely considered shrink from burning, which, nevertheless, the will as reason may choose for the end of health. Now it was the will of God that Christ should undergo pain, suffering, and death, not that these of themselves were willed by God, but for the sake of man's salvation. Hence it is plain that in His will of sensuality and in His rational will considered as nature, Christ could will what God did not; but in His will as reason He always willed the same as God, which appears from what He says (Matt. 26. 39): Not as I will, but as Thou wilt. For He willed in His reason that the Divine will should be fulfilled although He said that He willed something else by another will.

Reply Obj. 1. By His rational will Christ willed the Divine will to be fulfilled; but not by His will of sensuality, the movement of which does not extend to the will of God—nor by His will considered as nature which is borne towards things absolutely considered, and not in relation to the Divine Will.

Reply Obj. 2. The conformity of the human will to the Divine regards the will of reason, according to which the wills even of friends agree, in so far, that is, as reason considers something useful in its relation to the will of a friend.

Reply Obj. 3. Christ was at once comprehensor and wayfarer, since He was enjoying God in His mind and had a passible body. Hence things repugnant to His natural will and to His sensitive appetite could happen to Him in His passible flesh.

ARTICLE 6. Whether There Was Contrariety of Wills in Christ?

We proceed thus to the Sixth Article: It would seem that there was contrariety of wills in Christ.

Objection 1. For contrariety of wills regards contrariety of objects, just as contrariety of movements springs from contrariety of terms, as is plain from the Philosopher.⁴ Now Christ in His different wills wished contrary things. For in His Divine will He wished for death, from which He shrank in His human will, hence Athanasius says:⁵ "When Christ says 'Father, if it be possible, let this chalice pass from Me; yet not My will, but Thine be done,'⁶ and again, 'The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh weak,'⁷ He denotes two wills—the human, which through the weakness of the flesh shrank from the passion—and His Divine will eager for the passion." Hence there was contrariety of wills in Christ.

Obj. 2. Further, it is written (Gal. 5. 17) that the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh. Now when the spirit desires one thing, and the flesh another, there is contrariety of wills. But this was in Christ; for by the will of charity which the Holy Spirit was causing in His mind, He willed the passion, according to Isa. 53. 7; He was offered because it was His own will, yet in His flesh He shrank from the passion. Therefore there was contrariety of wills in Him.

Obj. 3. Further, it is written (Luke 22. 43) that being in an agony, He prayed the longer. Now agony seems to imply a certain struggle in a soul drawn to contrary things. Hence it seems that there was contrariety of will in Christ.

On the contrary, In the decisions of the Sixth Council¹ it is said: "We confess two natural wills, not in opposition, as evil-minded heretics assert,² but following His human will, and neither withstanding nor striving against, but rather being subject to, His Divine and omnipotent will."

I answer that, Contrariety can exist only where there is opposition in the same and as regards the same. For if the diversity exists as regards diverse things, and in diverse subjects, this would not suffice for the nature of contrariety, nor even for the nature of contradiction—for example, if a man were well formed or healthy as regards his hand, but not as regards his foot.

Hence for there to be contrariety of wills in anyone it is necessary, first, that the diversity of wills should regard the same. For if the will of one regards the doing of something with reference to some universal reason, and the will of another regards the not doing the same with reference to some particular reason, there is not complete contrariety of will—for example, when a judge wishes a brigand to be hanged for the good of the commonwealth, and one of the latter's kindred wishes him not to be hanged on account of a private love, there is no contrariety of wills; unless, indeed, the desire of the private good went so far as to wish to hinder the public good for the private good—in that case the opposition of wills would regard the same.

Secondly, for contrariety of wills it is necessary that it should be in the same will. For if a man wishes one thing with his rational appetite and wishes another thing with his sensitive appetite, there is no contrariety, unless the sensitive appetite so far prevailed as to change or at least keep back the rational appetite; for in this case something of the contrary movement of the sensitive appetite would reach the rational will.

And hence it must be said that although the natural will and the sensitive will in Christ wished what the Divine will and His rational will did not wish, yet there was no contrariety of wills in Him. First, because neither His natural will nor the will of sensuality rejected the reason for which the Divine will and the will of the human reason in Christ wished the passion. For the absolute will of Christ wished the salvation of the human race, although it did not pertain to it to will this for the sake of something further, but the movement of sensuality was not able to extend so far. Secondly, because neither the Divine will nor the will of reason in Christ was impeded or retarded by the natural will or the appetite of sensuality. So, too, on the other hand, neither the Divine will nor the will of reason in Christ shrank from or retarded the movement of the natural human will and the movement of the sensuality in Christ. For it pleased Christ, in His Divine will, and also in His will of reason, that His natural will and will of sensuality should be moved according to the order of their nature. Hence it is clear that in Christ there was no opposition or contrariety of wills.

Reply Obj. 1. The fact of any will in Christ willing something else than did the Divine will proceeded from the Divine will itself, by whose permission the human nature in Christ was moved by its proper movements, as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii., 14, 19).³

Reply Obj. 2. In us the desires of the spirit are impeded or retarded by the desires of the flesh; this did not occur in Christ. Hence in Christ there was no contrariety of flesh and spirit, as in us.

Reply Obj. 3. The agony in Christ was not in the rational part of the soul, in as far as it implies a struggle in the will arising from a diversity of motives, as when anyone, on his reason considering one, wishes one thing, and on its considering another, wishes the contrary. For this springs from the weakness of the reason, which is unable to judge which is the best absolutely. Now this did not occur in Christ, since by His reason He judged it to be best absolutely that the Divine will regarding the salvation of the human race should be fulfilled by His passion. Nevertheless, there was an agony in Christ as regards the sensitive part, in so far as it implied a dread of coming trial, as Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. ii, 15; iii, 18, 23)⁴

QUESTION XIX

OF WHAT PERTAINS TO THE POWER OF CHRIST WITH REGARD TO OPERATION

(In Four Articles)

WE must now consider the unity of Christ's operation; and under this head there are four points of inquiry: (1) Whether in Christ there was one or several operations of the Godhead and Manhood? (2) Whether in Christ there were several operations of the human nature? (3) Whether Christ by His human operation merited anything for Himself? (4) Whether He merited anything for us by it?

ARTICLE 1. Whether in Christ There Is Only One Operation of the Godhead and Manhood?

We proceed thus to the First Article: It would seem that in Christ there is but one operation of the Godhead and the Manhood.

Objection 1. For Dionysius says (Div. Nom. ii):¹ "The most loving operation of God is made manifest to us by the supersubstantial Word having taken flesh integrally and truly, and having operated and suffered whatsoever befits His human and Divine operation." But he here mentions only one human and Divine operation, which is called in Greek θεανδρική—that is, God-manlike. Hence it seems that there is but one composite operation in Christ.

Obj. 2. Further, there is but one operation of the principal and instrumental agent. Now the human nature in Christ was the instrument of the Divine, as was said above (Q. VII, A. 1, reply 3; Q. VIII, A. 1, reply 1; Q. XVIII, A. 1, reply 2). Hence the operations of the Divine and human natures in Christ are the same.

Obj. 3. Further, since in Christ there are two natures in one hypostasis or person, whatever pertains to the hypostasis or person is one and the same. But operation pertains to the hypostasis or person, for it is only a subsisting suppositum that operates; hence, according to the Philosopher² acts are of singulars. Hence in Christ there is only one operation of the Godhead and the Manhood.

Obj. 4. Further, as being belongs to a subsisting hypostasis, so also does operation. But on account of the unity of hypostasis there is only one being in Christ, as was above stated (Q. XVII, A. 2). Hence, on account of the same unity, there is one operation in Christ.

Obj. 5. Further, where there is one thing operated there is one operation. But the same thing was operated by the Godhead and the Manhood, as the healing of the lepers or the raising of the dead. Hence it seems that in Christ there is but one operation of the Godhead and the Manhood.

On the contrary, Ambrose says (De Fide ii, 8):³ "How can the same operation spring from different powers? Cannot the lesser operate as the greater? And can there be one operation where there are different substances?"

I answer that, The aforesaid heretics (Q. XVIII, A. 1), who placed one will in Christ placed one operation in Christ.⁴ Now in order better to understand their erroneous opinion, we must bear in mind that wherever there are several ordered agents, the inferior is moved by the superior, as in man the body is moved by the soul and the lower powers by the reason. And thus the actions and movements of the inferior principle are things operated rather than operations. Now what pertains to the highest principle is properly the operation; thus we say of man that to walk, which belongs to the feet, and to touch, which belongs to the hand, are things operated by the man—one of which is operated by the soul through the feet, the other through the hands. And because it is the same soul that operates through both there is only one indifferent operation, on the part of the thing operating, which is the first moving principle; but difference is found on the part of what is operated. Now, as in a mere man the body is moved by the soul, and the sensitive by the rational appetite, so in the Lord Jesus Christ the human nature is moved and ruled by the Divine. Hence they said that there is one indifferent operation on the part of the Godhead operating, but divers things operated, since the Godhead of Christ did one thing by Itself, as to uphold all things by the word of His power—and another thing by His human nature, as to walk in body. Hence the Sixth Council⁵ quotes the words of Severus the heretic,⁶ who said: "What things were done and wrought by the one Christ, differ greatly; for some are becoming to God, and some are human, as to walk bodily on the earth is indeed human, but to give hale steps to sickly limbs, wholly unable to walk on the ground, is becoming to God. Yet One—that is, the Incarnate Word—wrought one and the other—neither was this from one nature, and that from another; nor can we justly affirm that because there are distinct things operated there are therefore two operating natures and forms.”

But they were deceived in this, for what is moved by another has a twofold action: one which it has from its own form; the other, which it has according as it is moved by another; thus the operation of an axe of itself is to cleave, but according as it is moved by the craftsman, its operation is to make benches. Hence the operation which belongs to a thing by its form is proper to it, nor does it belong to the mover, except in so far as he makes use of this kind of thing for his work; thus to heat is the proper operation of fire, but not of a smith, except in so far as he makes use of fire for heating iron. But the operation which belongs to the thing only in so far as it is moved by another, is not different from the operation of the mover; thus to make a bench is not the work of the axe independently of the workman but the axe participates instrumentally in the operation of the workman. Hence, wheresoever the mover and the moved have different forms or operative powers, there must the proper operation of the mover and the proper operation of the moved be distinct, although the moved shares in the operation of the mover, and the mover makes use of the operation of the moved, and, consequently, each acts in communion with the other.

Therefore in Christ the human nature has its proper form and power whereby it acts, and so has the Divine. Hence the human nature has its proper operation distinct from the Divine operation, and conversely. Nevertheless, the Divine Nature makes use of the operation of the human nature, as of the operation of its instrument; and in the same way the human nature shares in the operation of the Divine Nature, as an instrument shares in the operation of the principal agent. And this is what Pope Leo says (Ep. ad Flavianum, xxviii, 4):¹ “Both forms (that is, both the Divine and the human nature in Christ) do what is proper to each in union with the other—that is, the Word operates what belongs to the Word, and the flesh carries out what belongs to flesh.”

But if there were only one operation of the Godhead and manhood in Christ, it would be necessary to say either that the human nature had not its proper form and power (for this could not possibly be said of the Divine), from which it would follow that in Christ there was only the Divine operation; or it would be necessary to say that from the Divine and human power there was made up in Christ of one power. Now both of these are impossible. For by the first the human nature in Christ is supposed to be imperfect, and by the second a confusion of the natures is supposed. Hence it is with reason that the Sixth Council (Act. 18)² condemned this opinion, and decreed as follows: “We glorify two natural, indivisible, unconvertible, unconfused, and inseparable operations in the same Lord Jesus Christ our true God,” that is, the Divine operation and the human operation.

Reply Obj. 1. Dionysius places in Christ a theandric—that is, a God-manlike or Divine-human—operation not by any confusion of the operations or powers of both natures, but because His Divine operation employs the human, and His human operation shares in the power of the Divine. Hence, as he says in a certain epistle (Ad Caium, iv),³ “what is of man He works beyond man; and this is shown by the Virgin conceiving supernaturally and by the unstable waters bearing up the weight of bodily feet.” Now it is clear that to be begotten belongs to human nature, and likewise to walk; yet both were in Christ supernaturally. So, too, He wrought Divine things humanly, as when He healed the leper with a touch. Hence in the same epistle he adds: “He performed Divine works not as God does, and human works not as man does, but, God having been made man, by a new operation of God and man.”

Now, that he understood there to be two operations in Christ, one of the Divine and the other of the human nature, is clear from what he says, Div. Nom. ii:⁴ “Whatever pertains to His human operation the Father and the Holy Ghost in no way share in, except, as one might say, by their most gracious and merciful will”—that is, in so far as the Father and the Holy Ghost in their mercy wished Christ to do and to suffer human things. And he adds: “He is truly the unchangeable God, and God’s Word by the sublime and unspeakable operation of God, which, being made man for us, He wrought.” Hence it is clear that the human operation, in which the Father and the Holy Ghost do not share except by Their merciful consent, is distinct from His operation as the Word of God, wherein the Father and the Holy Ghost share.

Reply Obj. 2. The instrument is said to do something through being moved by the principal agent; and yet, besides this, it can have its proper operation through its own form, as stated above of fire. And hence the action of the instrument as instrument is not different from the action of the principal agent; yet it may have another operation, according as it is a thing. Hence the operation of Christ's human nature, as the instrument of the Godhead, is not distinct from the operation of the Godhead, for the salvation with which the manhood of Christ saves us and that with which His Godhead saves us are not distinct; nevertheless, the human nature in Christ, since it is a certain nature, has a certain operation of its own distinct from the Divine, as stated above.

Reply Obj. 3. To operate belongs to a subsisting hypostasis, in accordance, however, with the form and nature from which the operation receives its species. Hence from the diversity of forms or natures spring the various species of operations, but from the unity of hypostasis springs the numerical unity as regards the operation of the species; thus fire has two operations specifically different, namely, to illuminate and to heat, from the difference of light and heat, and yet the illumination of the fire that illuminates at one and the same time is numerically one. So, likewise, in Christ there are necessarily two specifically different operations according to His two natures; nevertheless, each of the operations at one and the same time is numerically one in Christ, as one walking and one healing.

Reply Obj. 4. Being and operation belong to the person by reason of the nature, yet in a different manner. For being belongs to the very constitution of the person, and in this respect it has the nature of a term; consequently, unity of person requires unity of the complete and personal being. But operation is an effect of the person by reason of a form or nature. Hence plurality of operations is not incompatible with personal unity.

Reply Obj. 5. The proper work of the Divine operation is different from the proper work of the human operation. Thus to heal a leper is a proper work of the Divine operation, but to touch him is the proper work of the human operation. Now both these operations concur in one work, since one nature acts in union with the other, as stated above.

ARTICLE 2. Whether in Christ There Are Several Human Operations?

We proceed thus to the Second Article: It would seem that in Christ there are several human operations.

Objection 1. For Christ as man communicates with plants in His nutritive nature, with the brutes in His sensitive nature, and with the angels in His intellectual nature, even as other men do. Now the operation of a plant as plant and of an animal as animal are different. Therefore Christ as man has several operations.

Obj. 2. Further, powers and habits are distinguished by their acts. Now in Christ's soul there were various powers and habits; therefore also various operations.

Obj. 3. Further, instruments ought to be proportioned to their operations. Now the human body has various members of different form, and consequently fitted to various operations. Therefore in Christ there are various operations in the human nature.

On the contrary, As Damascene says (De Fide Orthod. iii. 15, 16),¹ "operation follows on the nature." But in Christ there is only one human nature. Therefore in Christ there is only one human operation.

I answer that, Since it is by his reason that man is what he is, that operation is called human absolutely which proceeds from the reason through the will, which is the rational appetite. Now if there is any operation in man which does not proceed from the reason and the will, it is not absolutely a human operation, but belongs to man by reason of some part of human nature; sometimes by reason of the nature of elementary bodies, as for example to be borne downwards; sometimes by reason of the force of the vegetative soul, as to be nourished, and to grow; sometimes by reason of the sensitive part, as to see and hear, to imagine and remember, to desire and to be angry. Now between these operations there is a difference. For the operations of the sensitive soul are to some extent obedient to reason, and consequently they are somewhat rational and human in so far as they obey reason, as is clear from the Philosopher.² But the operations that spring from the vegetative soul, or from the nature of elemental bodies, are not subject to reason; consequently they are nowise rational; nor simply human, but only as regards a part of human nature.

Now it was said (A. 1) that when a lower agent acts by its own form, the operations of the inferior and of the superior agent are distinct; but when the inferior agent acts only as moved by the superior agent, then the operation of the superior and the inferior agent is one. And hence in every mere man the operations of the elemental body and of the vegetative soul are distinct from the will's operation, which is properly human; so likewise the operations of the sensitive soul in that it is not moved by reason; but in so far as it is moved by reason, the operations of the sensitive and the rational part are the same. Now there is but one operation of the rational part if we consider the principle of the operation, which is the reason or will; but the operations are many if we consider their relationship to various objects. And there were some¹ who called this a diversity of the things operated rather than of operations, judging the unity of the operation solely from the operative principle. And it is in this respect that we are now considering the unity and plurality of operations in Christ.

Hence in every mere man there is but one operation which is properly called human, but besides this there are in a mere man certain other operations, which are not properly human, as was said above. But in the Man Jesus Christ there was no motion of the sensitive part which was not ordered by reason. Even the natural and bodily operations pertained in some respects to His will, since it was His will that His flesh should do and suffer what was proper to it, as stated above (Q. XVIII, A. 5). Much more, therefore, is there one operation in Christ than in any other man whatsoever.

Reply Obj. 1. The operations of the sensitive and nutritive parts are not strictly human, as stated above; yet in Christ these operations were more human than in others.

Reply Obj. 2. Powers and habits are diversified by comparison with their objects. Hence in this way the diversity of operations corresponds to the various powers and habits, as likewise to the various objects. Now we do not wish to exclude this diversity of operations from Christ's humanity, nor that which springs from a diversity of time, but only that which regards the first active principle, as was said above.

From this may be gathered the reply to the third objection.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the Human Action of Christ Could Be Meritorious to Him?

We proceed thus to the Third Article: It would seem that the human action of Christ could not be meritorious to Him.

Objection 1. For before His death Christ was a comprehensor even as He is now. But comprehensors do not merit, because the charity of the comprehensor belongs to the reward of Happiness, since enjoyment depends upon it. Hence it does not seem to be the principle of meriting, since merit and reward are not the same. Therefore Christ before His passion did not merit, even as He does not merit now.

Obj. 2. Further, no one merits what is due to him. But because Christ is the Son of God by nature the eternal inheritance is due to Him, which other men merit by their good works. And hence Christ Who from the beginning was the Word of God, could not merit anything for Himself.

Obj. 3. Further, whoever has the principal does not properly merit what flows from its possession. But Christ has the glory of the soul, from which, in the natural course, flowed the glory of the body, as Augustine says (Ep. ad Dios. cxviii),² though by a dispensation it was brought about that in Christ the glory of the soul should not overflow to the body. Hence Christ did not merit the glory of the body.

Obj. 4. Further, the manifestation of Christ's excellence is a good not of Christ Himself, but of those who know Him. Hence it is promised as a reward to such as love Christ that He will be manifested to them, according to John 14. 21: He that loveth Me, shall be loved of My Father, and I will love him and will manifest Myself to him. Therefore Christ did not merit the manifestation of His greatness.
